"She was remarkable for the vigor of her intellect and the firmness of her resolution. Left in early life the sole parent of a numerous family, she devoted herself with exemplary fidelity to the task of guiding and educating them. . . . A firm believer in the sacred truths of religion, she taught its principles to her children, and inculcated an early obedience to its injunctions. It is said by those who knew her intimately that she acquired and maintained a wonderful ascendancy over those around her. This true characteristic of genius attended her through life, and even in its decline, after her son had led his country to independence and had been called to preside over its councils, he approached her with the same reverence she had taught him to exhibit in early youth.

"Fellow-citizens! at your request and in your name, I now deposit this plate in the spot destined for it; and when the American citizen shall, in after ages, come up to this high and holy place and lay his hand upon this sacred column, may he recall the virtues of her who sleeps beneath, and depart with his affection purified and his piety strengthened, while he invokes blessings upon the memory of the mother of Washington."

Almost sixty years after panegyric and poem vibrated upon the listening air of that May-day, there stands above the corner-stone that which desecrates the spot. The hand that laid the marble block and that which set the engraved plate upon it were dust a generation ago; those who remain of the boy-soldiers are aged men, telling in quavering tones how the architect died without the sight of the stately pile he had planned.

Fredericksburg folks affect most seriously the tale that a Southern girl set the enterprise as a test of a Northern lover's devotion, and jilted him before the work was finished. The likelier story is that a reverse of fortune compelled Mr. Burrows to withhold the necessary funds.

It rests there still, prone at the base of the half-ruined pile, stained by time and weather, and chipped by vandal hammers, a sight as melancholy as any the sun shines on. A worthier memorial of the American matron whom the nations praised afar off is the sturdy boulder, concealed from the passing tourist by the wall that threw out Mary Washington's grave into the common where cattle browsed and village tramps sauntered and slumbered.

It was reserved for the women whose grandmothers were her contemporaries to right this wrong to her and to their sex. With no blare of trumpets in the way of public demonstration, and no protestation of what they meant to accomplish, the members of the National Mary Washington Memorial Association are moving steadily toward the desired end. [The writer of the above, proposed several years ago that every mother in America, bearing the name of "Mary" should subscribe twenty-five cents toward the erection of a memorial to Mary, the Mother of Washington. THE ABUSE OF TRUST.

ONE of the crying sins of this day is the abuse of trust. Every man during the course of his life,on a larger or smaller scale, has the property of others committed to his keeping. He is so far a safety deposit, he is an administrator,and holds in his hand the interest of the family of a deceased friend. Or, he is an attorney, and through his custody goes the payment from debtor to creditor,or he is the collector for a business house which compensates him for the responsibility; or he is a treasurer for a charitable institution and he holds alms contributed for the suffering; or he is an official of the city, or the State,or the nation,and taxes,and subsidies,and salaries, and supplies are in his keeping.

It is as solemn a trust as God can make it. It is concentred and multiplied confidences. On that man depends the support of a bereft household, or the morals of dependants, or the right movement of a thousand wheels of social mechanism. A man may do what he will with his own, but he who abuses trust funds, in that one act commits theft, falsehood, perjury,and becomes in all the intensity of the word a miscreant. How many widows and orphans there are with nothing between them and starvation, but a sewing-machine, or held up out of the vortex of destruction simply by the thread of a needle, and with their own hearts' blood, who a little while ago had, by father and husband, left them a competency. What is the matter? The administrators or the executors have sacrificed it—running risks with it that they would not have dared to encounter in their own private affairs.

How often is it that a man will earn a livelihood by the sweat of his brow, and then die, and within a few months all the estate goes into the stock-gambling rapids of Wall Street. How often is it that you have known the man to whom trust funds were committed, taking them out of the saving-banks and from trust companies, and administrators, turning old homesteads into hard cash, and then putting the entire estate in the vortex of speculation. Embezzlement is an easy word to pronounce, but it has ten thousand ramifications of horror.

Let me say to those in charge of trust funds: It is a compliment to you that you have been so intrusted; but I charge you, in the presence of God and the world, be careful, be as careful of the property of others as you are careful of your own. Above all,keep your own private account at the bank separate from your account as trustee of an estate, or trustee of an institution. That is the point at which thousands of people make shipwreck. They get the property of others mixed up with their own property, they put it into investment,and away it all goes,and they cannot return that which they borrowed. Then comes the explosion,and the money market is shaken, and the press denounces and the church thunders expulsion.

What a sad thing it would be, if after you are dead, your administrator should find out from the account-books,or from the lack of vouchers, that you not only were bankrupt in estate, but that you lost your soul.

RELIGION OUTDOORS.

WE like this new mode of mingling religion with summer pleasures. Soon the Methodists will be shaking out their tents and packing their lunch-baskets and buying their railroad and steamboat tickets for the camp-meeting grounds. Martha's Vineyard, Round Lake, Ocean Grove and Sea Cliff will soon mingle their psalms and prayers with the voice of surf and forest. The great leaders of Sabbath-schoolism are already marshaling meetings which will probably be the grandest religious picnics ever held since the five thousand sat down on the grass and had a surplus of provisions to take home to those who were too stupid to go. From the arrangements being made for those meetings, we judge there will be much consecrated enthusiasm.

Why not have all our churches and denominations take a summer airing? The breath of the pine woods or a wrestle with the waters would put an end to everything like morbid religion. One reason why the apostles had such healthy theology is that they went a-fishing. We would like to see the day when we will have Presbyterian camp-meetings, and Episcopalian camp-meetings,and Baptist camp-meetings, and Congregational camp-meetings, or, what would be still better, when, forgetful of all minor distinctions, we could have a church universal camp-meeting.

The question is coming up in all our households as to the best mode of summer vacation. We shall all need rest. The first thing to do is to measure the length of your purse; you cannot make a short purse reach around Saratoga and the White Mountains. There may be as much health, good cheer and recuperation in a country farmhouse, where the cows come up every night and yield milk without any chalk in it.

BLOOD REDEMPTION.

MONEY is good for a great many things,but it cannot do anything in the matter of the soul. You cannot buy your way through. Dollars mean nothing at the gate of mercy. If you could buy your salvation, heaven would be a great speculation. Bad men would go up and buy out the place, and leave us to shift for ourselves. But as money is not a lawful tender, what is? I will answer, Blood! Whose? Are we to go through the slaughter? Oh, no; it wants richer blood than ours. It wants a king's blood. It must be poured from royal arteries. It must be a sinless torrent. But where is the king? I see a great many thrones and a great many occupants, yet none seem to be coming down to the rescue. But after awhile the clock of night in Bethlehem strikes twelve,and the silver pendulum of a star swings across the sky,and I see the King of Heaven rising up, and he descends, and steps down from star to star, and from cloud to cloud, lower and lower, until he touches the sheep-covered hills, and then on to another hill, this last skull-covered; and there, at the sharp stroke of persecution, a rill incarnadine trickles down, and we who could not be redeemed by money are redeemed by precious and imperial blood.

We have in this day professed Christians who are so rarefied and etherealized that they do not want a religion of blood. What do you want? You seem to want a religion of brains. The Bible says,"In the blood is the life." No atonement without blood. Ought not the apostle to know? What did he say? "Ye are redeemed not with corruptible things, such as silver and gold; but by the precious blood of Christ." You put your lancet into the arm of our holy religion and withdraw the blood, and you leave it a mere corpse, fit only for the grave. Why did God command the priests of old to strike the knife into the kid, and the goat, and the pigeon,and the bullock,and the lamb? It was so that when the blood rushed out from these animals on the floor of the ancient tabernacle the people should be compelled to think of the coming carnage of the Son of God. No blood, no atonement.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

A friend in Virginia writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, desiring to be informed of any society or individual about to establish an industrial school in Virginia or Florida. He has some land which he would be pleased to present to a project of this character, if in the hands of proper parties.

"Reader," Willits, Cal., writes: The article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of June 7, about the Boys' Sunday hunting party in the West was very touching, and made one feel sad to think of children growing up without the privilege of church and Sunday Schools. But what would you think of a case that transpired here, on a recent Sunday, and is of common occurrence in this State. The young men of the town, and some from the neighboring county-seat, came out to church and Sunday School in the morning and in the afternoon they had a game of base-ball, that called together a larger crowd than both the churches combined. To one brought up in the East such a state of affairs seems shocking, but the people here have got so used to it that they think nothing of it.

Mrs. J. W. Headly, Pomeroy, O. Was Maximilian who was executed in Mexico, June 19, 1867, a Catholic?

Yes.

O. W. Hangan, Roland, Ia. Where can I obtain "Lectures on Preaching," by the late Rev. Phillips Brooks?

Inquire of Dutton & Co., publishers, N. Y.

A. Davis, New Bedford, Mass. Years ago I heard my father sing an old hymn, the only verse of which I recall is:

> Jesus while he dwelt below,
> As divine historians say,
> To a place would often go,
> Near to Kidron's brook it lay,
> And 'twas there he loved to be,
> Sorrowing in Gethsemane.

Would be grateful to you if you could induce some of your readers to supply the other verses.

I. Blessroull, Bayers, Pa. Can a man live a Christian life outside the church?

It is conceivable that he might, under peculiar circumstances. But why should he make the attempt? Christ insists that his followers shall confess him before men (Matt. 10: 32), and says that whoever is ashamed to do it, of him will he be ashamed (Mark 8: 38.) A man may confess Christ without joining a church, but that is the usual way of doing so and we think it is the best way.

Mrs. A. H. Ferriss, Bagot, Manitoba. Do you believe that at death there is instant transition to the glories of heaven?

So little is revealed to us about the conditions of the life beyond the grave, that it is almost presumptuous to speak of our ideas as "belief." We can only draw inferences from statements made in various parts of the Bible. The one which affords more hope of immediate transition than any other, is that of Paul,who said that "to depart and be with Christ was far better" (Phil. 1: 23). A man so active in the service of Christ as the apostle was,would not have considered it better to depart, if he did not expect to be with Christ immediately.

M. Hayton, Collinsville, Tex. I believe my children are with Christ as they died when they were quite young; now if I should fall into grievous sin, such as drunkenness or gambling, would it make them unhappy?

The description of heaven given in the Bible is not sufficiently detailed to warrant assertions as to the knowledge or occupations of its inhabitants. It is, however, so clearly intimated that sorrow does not enter there, that we may conclude that they would not be rendered unhappy in such a case as you suggest. The knowledge of your fall might be kept from them. We hope you are not contemplating such conduct. Though your children might not suffer, God would be displeased.

J. P. F. Burroughs, Richmond, Va. Will you please state the author of the following lines, and if this is all of the poem?

> Could I with ink the ocean fill,
> Were all the world of parchment made,
> Were every weed on earth a quill,
> And every man a scribe by trade,
> To write the love of God alone
> Would drain that mighty ocean dry.
> Nor could the scroll contain the whole,
> Though it were stretched from sky to sky.

Possibly some reader may be able to supply the information asked for.

S. B. Gilbert, Melon, Miss. Do you consider Paul's injunction (1. Corinthians 14: 34, 35), is a prohibition against women taking part in public worship?

It was for the Church at Corinth to which Paul was writing. In that city and at that time Christianity would have suffered a grievous reproach by women taking part in the services. We do not think the prohibition was intended to be permanent. Literally observed, it would exclude women from even singing in church.

W. L. Wimpler, Bruceville, Ind. 1. Does Christ refer to the Church in Matt. 13: 29? 2. How long after justification may the blessing of sanctification be expected?

1. Not to the Church,but the visible professing Church. 2. At once. Sanctification commences immediately and if the Christian yield himself to the influence of the Holy Spirit it will go on as long as he lives and he will continually grow in grace.

E. F. Evans, Worcester, N. Y. Was Mordecai justified in refusing to bow to Haman?

Yes if, as is probable, it would be regarded as an act of adoration. The Persians of that period were accustomed to worship their kings and rulers as gods and if Mordecai had bowed to Haman, the people might have thought the act one of worship?

M. F. Smith, Hope, Ga. What is the meaning of Anathema Maranatha. (1 Cor. 16: 22)?

Anathema means accursed. It is so translated in other parts of Paul's Epistles. Maranatha signifies, "the Lord cometh." The meaning of the phrase in the connection is not clear, nor can it be explained why Paul used the Aramaic word in a Greek Epistle. The most probable conjecture is that he meant "accursed at the Lord's coming."

Reader, Millersville, Pa. 1. Are our futures predestinated? 2. Please explain Rom. 9: 16, 18. Does it not contradict the declaration that whosoever will may come?

1. Not in the sense of compulsion. When you are deciding between two or more courses of action, which may be open to you, the fact of your being free to choose is clear to your own mind and you know that you are responsible for your action. That God foresees your future is equally clear,but the fact of his knowing what you will do does not diminish your responsibility. 2. No, it does not contradict it. Whosoever will may come; that is sure. The question which has caused controversy for hundreds of years is whether God withholds from some persons the attracting and moving influences which he exerts on others. The question is a barren one. It is presumptuous on man's part to sit in judgment on God. If he complies with the conditions of salvation he will be saved and the question of God's decrees may be wisely left until it is illuminated in the light of heaven.

P. W. Flint, Detroit, Mich. What is the age and origin of the English alphabet? When did it begin to be used in its present form?

The English alphabet is borrowed from the ancient Roman, which in turn was a modification of the Greek, the Greek being taken from the Phœnician and the Phœnician from the Syrian. Philologists claim to have traced the latter to the writings of a very ancient people who lived some 3000 years ago in a region of Northern India. It is believed that the first compact form of letters was the Egyptian hieroglyph. Originally a letter or sign represented an idea, but by degrees its representative value was diminished until at last a letter has come to represent a part of a syllable, which is a fraction of a word, the last being generally simply the part or fraction of an idea. The Anglo-Saxon alphabet was conformed to the Latin type early in the seventh century, so that the English alphabet may be said to be nearly 1,200 years old.

Peter V. Carlson, Vina, Cal. You did right. Make no compromise where duty and conscience are concerned.——J. B. Koch, Lake Odessa, Mich. There is no foundation for the story you mention.——Georgia L. Blackshear, Tennville, Ga. Procure and have him read a copy of "Trumpet Peals," by Dr. Talmage, published by Charles L. Webster & Co., N. Y.——G. L. W., Middletown, N. Y. Yes; we see nothing to prevent it, if you have stated the circumstances accurately.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE SILVER AGITATION.

FOR several months past financiers in several parts of the country have been urging that Congress should be assembled to repeal the Sherman law under which the government is required to buy a certain quantity of silver every month. Their demands have been emphasized by an event which took place on June 27. Until that date the Government of India was a large purchaser of silver. It received from private holders silver in bullion and returned it to them coined into rupees deducting two per cent. for the cost of coining it. That arrangement has now been discontinued. It may be supposed that the Government of India will continue to purchase silver for coining, but it will no longer take and coin all that is brought to it. Gold is to be introduced and in order that the people may not be inconvenienced and puzzled by the change, the Government has temporarily fixed its value in relation to silver. The rupee will be worth thirty-two cents. This action leaves the United States alone in the world as a large purchaser for coinage. The sudden closing of the great market for silver in India caused a heavy decline in the value of the metal. The rate per ounce fell ten cents in three days and on June 29, sufficient metal to make a standard silver dollar could be bought for fifty-four cents. It is obvious that, while our own citizens may continue to accept the coin as a dollar, it could not be used in transactions with foreign nations as of its face value. The coin, therefore, becomes merely a token of fictitious value. So long as the United States Government will receive them and give gold coins for them, they will be worth a dollar to our own citizens but should it ever decline to do so, the coins will be worth only their intrinsic value, which, just now is little more than one half their face value. The compulsory monthly purchase of silver is therefore a loss to the nation and a gain only to the silver producers. Congress will, therefore, when it meets, be asked to relieve the Government by repealing the law. It is regarded as discreditable to be using a coin which is worth so much less than it professes to be worth. The standard coin of a nation should be worth so near its face value that other nations will accept it at that rate. They will receive our gold coins in that way. But we should never forget that the time is coming for every one when all standards of the kind will cease to operate and even gold will be esteemed worthless. (Luke 12: 20.)

The Cost of the Discovery of America.

AN article on the discovery of America has recently appeared in the Globus, a German periodical. Prof. Ruge is the writer and he gives there the results of some examinations he has made in the Spanish archives. He states that in the original documents concerning the voyage of Columbus, the contribution of the Queen toward the expedition was given invariably as 1,140,000 maravedis. One hundred years ago a maravedi was the equivalent of about one-fifth of a cent, but in the fifteenth century, before the coin had been debased, he learned, it was worth almost three-fourths of a cent. In the coinage of the present time, therefore, Queen Isabella's contribution was approximately $7,500. The annual salaries of officers of the first transatlantic fleet are calculated by Prof. Ruge to have been: Admiral, $320; Captain, $192; pilot, $135 to 153; surgeon, $38. Never in the world's history has there been so great a disproportion between the value of a discovery and its cost. But the cost was not covered by the expenditure in money. It included the faith and self-sacrifice of a brave man. It is by those qualities and not by money that the world has always gained its choicest treasures. The greatest of all boons—the heavenly world beyond the grave was placed within its reach, "not by corruptible things, as silver and gold . . . but by the precious blood of Christ. (1. Pet. 1:18.)

A Human Trolley.

A STRANGE spectacle was seen in Baltimore, Md., a few days ago. It was that of a man standing on the top of a moving street car in the place of a trolley. One of the large electric cars had met with an accident in Lexington Street and had lost the rod which carries the motive power from the electric wire overhead to the mechanism under the car. It happened at a time when the traffic was heavy and there was soon a block extending about half a mile. A lineman who was passing, saw the trouble and climbed to the top of the car. He had a long piece of insulated wire with him and he stripped the insulating material from both ends. One end he thrust through a hole in the roof and connected it. The other end he held against the trolley wire. The car moved, and in that way it ran to the end of the route without accident. The lineman's situation was a novel one and attracted much attention as he stood on the car-roof amid pyramids of sparks and lightning-like flashes from the trolley wire. People who saw it thought the man would surely be killed, but he escaped without injury. He knew that so long as he grasped the wire only where it was insulated, he was safe. His service, therefore, lacked the heroic quality which it seemed to have and which exists in some services that are lightly esteemed. The men who toil for Christ in the slums of our great cities, or go into heathen lands to tell the people of salvation through Jesus really do put their lives in peril that the Gospel chariot may go forward. (Hab. 3: 8.)

A Life Owed to a Bible Reading.

IN a sketch of the life of Col. P. Donan the western orator, which appears in a Pittsburg journal, it is stated that the Colonel's life was once saved by his giving a Sunday morning to Bible reading instead of a game at cards. Some years ago during a journey from New Orleans to St. Louis, he was invited by some friends on board the steamer to join them in a game of poker in the cabin. It was Sunday morning and although the Colonel made no profession of religion, his early training made the suggestion seem shocking to him. He refused, but his friends persisted, and to prevent further pressure he retired to his state-room. While there he analyzed his feelings and it seemed to him that he had objected to the game somewhat inconsistently. He was not a Christian, yet he was denying himself on Christian scruples. He remembered that he had a Bible in one of his valises, given him by a Christian friend. He had promised to read it, but had not yet done so. He thought he would look into it at once and see where he stood. He found it and became interested. The poker game was forgotten and he read for more than an hour. He was aroused at last by a terrific explosion which shook the steamer from stem to stern. He ran to the deck and as he passed the cabin he saw that the explosion had been just under it and every one of the friends who had made up the poker party was dead. The steamer was sinking, but Colonel Donan managed to get a place on one of the boats with the other passengers and was picked up three miles down stream. Probably few persons owe their lives as he did to a Bible reading, but there must be an immense number who owe to it the salvation of their souls which is much more important. (John 5: 39.)

The Release of the Anarchists.

THE pardon of the three anarchists who were condemned to imprisonment for the murder of police officers in Chicago on May 4, 1886, has caused widespread indignation. Governor Altgeld defends his exercise of executive clemency in a long message of seventeen thousand words. The defence increases the public indignation excited by his action. The Governor does not regard the pardon as an act of mercy but of justice. He denounces the conduct of the judge and the jury who tried the prisoners, and the public officers who were employed to prosecute them. Grave apprehensions are expressed by the press and by private citizens of evil results which may be produced by the Governor's action and still more by his defence. It is feared that the anarchists, who were terrorized by the result of the trial and have since restrained their loud defiance of law and order may again become violent and do mischief. The fact of their rejoicing over the release of their comrades and the tone in which they discuss the Governor's message are indications that there is a substantial basis for public apprehension. They are evidently encouraged by the sentiments Governor Altgeld expresses, and regard him as in sympathy with them. The situation is ominous and the public is deeply concerned at the inferences the enemies of social order are drawing from the message. There is a general impression that society and social institutions will be in danger if the Governor is opposed to the punishment of such evildoers. This fact is clearly perceived in the case of a State and its Governor, and it is much to be wished that there was a like clear perception in the case of the whole world. Men forget that God as a righteous Ruler must punish sin or they would come to think he was altogether such an one as themselves. (Ps. 50: 21.)

A Celestial Metal.

AN analysis of the ærolite which, on April 8, fell on Ossawatomie, Kan., injuring the statue of John Brown, which Horace Greeley erected there, has given interesting results. The analysis was made by United States Assayer Joplin. He found in it igneous rock, iron and graphite; but about one fourth of the mass consisted of a metal unknown to the professor, and, as he believes, without duplicate on earth. It is of minute crystals, perfectly white, resembling snow in appearance; but its specific gravity is four times as great as that of gold. It is both malleable and ductile, but could not be worked without great power, as it is exceedingly tough. It is very sensitive to electricity. When a single wire connected with an electric fan was applied to it, the strange stuff started, was convulsed like some living thing and as suddenly became quiescent. The most interesting result of the analysis, however, was furnished by the spectroscope. Its rays, when the metal was subjected to great heat, gave the same lines as those found in the spectrum of the sun, to the source of which the name, Helium, has been given. No one knows what kind of metal helium is; the only thing known about it, is that it exists in the sun and that no metal on earth known to scientists gives the same lines in the spectrum. It seems probable that this crystalline substance is helium, and if so, the question arises whether the ærolite from which it was obtained was cast off from the sun or from some planet or star of like composition. Of its celestial origin there can be no question since its elements are not of the earth. The Christian's character ought always to bear a like test. If his love for his enemies, his kindness and forbearance and his general helpfulness were conspicuous, the world would know that his religion is a heavenly thing. (John 17: 16.)

A Novel Remedy for Nervousness.

THE subject of the prevalence of nervous prostration was discussed a few days ago in a woman's club at Boston, Mass. Among the remedies suggested, was one which one of the members said she had found to be an unfailing cure. Her theory was based on the principle that absolute rest is the one essential to success. When the malady reached the stage of nervous exhaustion, she prevented it going on to nervous prostration by applying her remedy promptly. It consisted in returning as far as possible to an infantile condition. She puts on a pink and blue flannel wrapper with narrow ribbons and frills of the shape worn by very little children. Then enveloping her face and head in new flannel, the touch of which babies seem to like but which is not usually pleasant to grown people in normal health, she lies down and banishing adult thoughts, lets her mind dwell on trivial, childish matters. Stories, nursery rhymes and infantile amusements are recalled by her memory and she tries to bring her mind as far as possible into the condition it was in, in her infancy. She continues this course until the tired nerves recover their strength by inaction. Although her mode of applying the principle may appear childish, the principle itself is sound. It is equally efficacious in some spiritual maladies. It is not by questioning and deep thought and research that men emerge from scepticism but by childlike faith in God as their Father. (Luke 18: 17.)

An Unnatural Informer.

A COURT-OFFICER in Jersey City, N. J., in the course of some reminiscences of queer litigants and lawyers, writes that some seven or eight years ago an unnatural application was made to the court. It was made by a man who claimed that he was entitled to a reward of thirty dollars. He had given information which led to the capture of a deserter from the army and he understood that he was entitled to the reward. On reference to the record it was found that the reward had already been paid to the policeman, who arrested the deserter, and he appeared to have deserved it, as he had a long chase after the man. During the dispute which ensued, a remark was made which caused the judge to make an exclamation of surprise. Addressing the applicant he asked, "Who did you say the deserter is?" The man blushed and hung his head. "He is my brother," he said at last. "Do you mean," inquired the judge, "that you informed against your own brother?" The man stammered, but finally admitted that he had done so. He expected that the brother would be arrested and somebody would get the reward, and as he wanted money he thought he might as well have it as anyone else. "Well," said the judge, "I am glad you are not to get it; you ought to be ashamed of yourself." The majority of people will be of the judge's opinion A man who would betray his own brother for the sake of money must be the meanest of mean men. Yet it must be infinitely worse to betray Christ who died for us, and that sin is committed by any Christian who in order to get gain is false to his Lord. (Zech. 13:6

Evangelist E. P. Telford has, during the past six weeks, been holding successful meetings in Lawrence and Milford, Mass. He is now in Nova Scotia, where he will remain to the end of July. In August he expects to be again in New York. Letters addressed to him at this office will be forwarded to him.

The Second Annual Convention of the Christian Alliance, of which Rev. A. B. Simpson is President, will be held at Asbury Park, N. J., July 8–16. Rev. F. L. Chapell of Boston and Rev. F. W. Farr of New York will speak each day and many other friends of the Alliance are expected to be present and participate in the proceedings.

The new home at Tappan, N.Y. for Destitute Girls, in connection with the Door of Hope in New York, was formally dedicated on June 1. Dr. Kittredge of the Madison Avenue Reformed Church officiated and Mrs. E. M. Whittemore gave an interesting account of the circumstances which had placed it within her power to open the home.

Four copies of the New Testament are given away on an average daily by a citizen of Syracuse, N. Y. He formerly smoked four cigars a day, but as he found that the cost of a Testament and a cigar were the same, he decided to spend the cigar money in Testaments. A short time ago a young man paid a visit to Syracuse to thank him for the copy given to him. He said the book had led him to Christ.

The university Settlement, 26 Delancey St., New York, makes an appeal for plants and flowers for the tenement houses of the city. Hitherto, the New York Fruit and Flower Mission has supplied the need, but the applications of the poor and sick for flowers are constantly increasing, and therefore arrangements have been made with the Express Companies to bring flowers and plants free to the Settlement from villages near the city.

A Leadville pastor writing to a contemporary says: One of the interesting features of the work of Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, at Leadville, Col., was a service held in a large saloon and dance hall, by invitation of the proprietor, on on Sunday afternoon. About one thousand people crowded in to hear the Gospel preached and sung. The best order prevailed throughout the service, and many were seen in tears. Fully one hundred men expressed a desire to turn from their sins to God.

A suitable grave in Greenwood Cemetery has at last been provided for the remains of Prof. Richard A. Proctor, the eminent astronomer, who died in New York about four years ago. When Prof. Proctor died, there was embarrassment as to the funeral; and Rev. Stephen Merritt, with his characteristic generosity, allowed the body to be buried in his own family lot in Greenwood. The circumstances recently came to the ears of Mr. George W. Childs of Philadelphia, who at once purchased a lot for the reception of the body. He will also erect a granite monument over the grave.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

THE DYING LAD AND THE LIVING WELL.

Sermon preached before the Tremont Temple Church, now meeting in Music Hall, Boston, last Sunday evening, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D. Text: Gen. 21: 19, "And God opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water; and she went, and filled the bottle with water, and gave the lad drink."

this is the first Sunday that I have had the honor and pleasure of meeting you since Tremont Temple was destroyed by fire, it is fitting that I should extend to you both sincere sympathy and hearty congratulation. You are to be congratulated on the enterprise, heroism and consecration which you showed while Boston was gazing in sorrow on the smouldering ruins of the Temple. Under the inspiring leadership of Dr. G. C. Lorimer, your eloquent pastor, you continued your services almost without interruption, and laid plans for a larger work in connection with the Temple than ever before in its history. I sincerely hope and pray that God may reward your faith and labor, and may make your future house more resplendent with his glory than was even the former. As these sermons are to be printed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and so will have a much wider circulation than even the great audience of hearers now assembled, I ask their prayers and yours that God may guide the leaders in the work of the Temple, so that it shall ever stand as a great church for strangers, a great home for the homeless, and be in the future, as in the past, wonderfully honored of God in saving souls and in honoring Christ. As, in the providence of God, I am to be with you for six Sundays, it has seemed to me fitting that I should arrange my plans for a series of sermons, at least for Sunday evenings.

Biblical Waters.

For many years it has been in my mind to preach a series of Sunday evening discourses during the heated term on the wells, fountains and springs of the Bible. Never before until recently have I attempted to carry out this long-cherished purpose. It has seemed to me that no season of the year could be so appropriate for such a series of sermons as that now contemplated, as the summer season. We shall hear in this series of sermons the sweet music of the splash and the gurgle of the water. We shall see the crystal stream flowing from these open wells, springs and fountains. We shall see the cattle with their heaving sighs come to dip their noses into the crystal stream that their heated bodies may be refreshed. We shall see weary people coming with their whole families at times, and sometimes as individuals, that their thirst may be quenched, their bodies refreshed and their spirits revived. It is difficult for us in this northern clime to appreciate fully the importance attached in Oriental countries to fountains, springs and wells. Our climate is too humid. Water with us is too abundant for us to appreciate it as do those living in Oriental lands. With Eastern people water is a luxury. They become expert as judges of good water. There are shops in Constantinople where nothing but water is sold; the prices vary according to the springs from which it is brought. In those countries and in earlier times battles were fought for forts were erected in order that this tribe or that might retain possession of a well for which the tribe had bravely fought through bloody wars. It was common then and common still in wars, if the enemy is forced to retreat, to fill up the wells with stones, with sand, and sometimes with the dead bodies of unclean animals. Instances are on record in recent history where this practice has been resorted to. We know, too, that the Turkish Government has a treaty with certain Arab tribes, not to fill up the wells with stones or sand. These Arab tribes receive from the government a certain amount of money, and a certain number of garments each year as a bribe that they shall not fill up these wells along the route of Mohammedans pursuing their journey to their sacred places.

The text selected for this evening brings before us a strange story of primitive times and ancient manners. Hagar and Ishmael on the one side, and Abraham and Sarah on the other, are the chief characters to be introduced. We know that the word Hagar means a stranger, and we know also that she became an inmate of Abraham's family although a native of Egypt, and the name continued to be applied to her after she had been in the patriarch's household and was no longer a stranger. She was formerly one of the female slaves given by Pharaoh to Abraham during his visit to Egypt. She thus became Sarah's maid, and was to a great degree under her control. From her servile condition in Abraham's house she has risen into immortality because so closely associated with the history of this ancient patriarch. By an unwise expedient Sarah thus gave unexpected honor to the Egyptian maid; but for Hagar. Her head was turned by the dizzy height to which she was exalted. Her promotion led her to treat her mistress with disrespect and even insolence, and Sarah in turn manifested toward her maid all the peevishness, petulance, and envy of which an angry woman's nature is capable. Sarah, doubtless, repented of her rash act, and she certainly endeavored to put all the blame upon Abraham himself. Abraham seems to have given her almost unlimited power in these critical circumstances.

It is still true in countries where polygamy is permitted that the principal wife has authority over all the other wives. Some commentators believe that Sarah even resorted to corporal punishment, but the word which gives that suggestion is capable of a more lenient interpretation. In any case Hagar finally determined on flight. Perhaps her intention was to return to her relatives in Egypt; she certainly went in the way leading to that country. This path led her to what was afterward called Shur. She had to traverse a tract of sandy country and was expose to many trials on her journey. In this lonely region while waiting by a fountain to replenish her supply of water the angel of the Lord met her, gave her encouraging promises, and commanded her to return to her mistress. As the result of this heavenly visitation the place was afterward named Beer-lahai-roi, "the well of the visible God." Hagar returned to the family of the patriarch and her child was named Ishmael, meaning "God hath heard." In these two names she embodied the experiences of that sad hour in her checkered life.

Superseded.

After the lapse of fourteen years from the birth of Ishmael, Isaac, the child of promise, is born. Three more years, as it is supposed, pass and the festival of the weaning of Isaac is held. Ishmael is now a boy, according to the best interpretation of the narrative, of seventeen years of age. He appreciates fully his changed relations to the family of Abraham and to the promised inheritance. Doubtless he is also conscious that Sarah's affection is now lavished upon another, and that he is the object of her neglect, if not of her dislike. At this festival Isaac is dressed in the sacred and symbolic robe indicative of his claim to the birthright; he was also formally recognized as the heir of the tribe. It was and is the practice in the East that the son of a slave or secondary wife is always superseded by the son of a free woman, though much younger than the child of the bondwoman. All these changed relations Ishmael now understood. He disturbed the peace of the festival by mocking the son of Sarah. We know not the nature of his conduct, but the word translated "mocking" is a word of varied meanings. Probably here it can be best represented by some form of wanton teasing, by gestures and remarks peculiarly calculated to annoy Isaac and to enrage Sarah. Perhaps he reflected on Sarah's great age; it is certain he resorted to some of the many ways in which the boy of larger growth can enrage the smaller boy, and thus that boy's parents, and especially the mother. Nothing could satisfy Sarah from that moment but that Hagar should be driven from the family. Sarah's conduct was that of an ambitious and peevish woman. Hagar was, according to the custom of the country, Abraham's lawful, though secondary, wife. She ought not to have been given up to the caprice and jealousy of a fierce woman such as Sarah then was. She had been guilty of a culpable expedient, then of disobedience to Abraham, and finally of irreverence toward God. We are not called upon to justify the conduct of Sarah even though she occupies so honored a place in Hebrew history. Doubtless she intended that should be equivalent to some form of legal repudiation or divorce. We cannnot rightly understand her purpose except we see in it the determination to exclude Ishmael, by a legal act, from all share in the inheritance. This is the true significance of the spirit she showed and the plans which she inaugurated. This explanation throws light upon Abraham's unwillingness to carry out the purpose of Sarah. Her thoughts were now fixed exclusively on Isaac; she considered Ishmael as a dangerous rival, and she determined to punish him and his mother. But for Ishmael Abraham cherished feelings of paternal regard, and he was much grieved at Sarah's unholy temper and unrighteous conduct. Not until God indicated his wish was Abraham ready to co-operate in Sarah's plans. There is, of course, a deep religious truth, a profound Gospel mystery in these providences. This truth the apostle Paul teaches when he sets before us this whole history as an instructive allegory.

We now see Hagar and Ishmael cast out, and we cannot but feel that Sarah is too imperious, too precipitate, and that she has acted in a manner unworthy of her as a noble woman and as the wife of Abraham. Dr. Parker expresses the thought which almost all readers of this narrative have cherished when he says, that our first feeling is that Hagar and Ishmael were most cruelly used. We must not, however, suppose that Abraham dismissed them without proper foresight as to Their Journey.

God was also in the whole narrative disposing Hagar to go quietly of her own desire and Ishmael to yield his will to that of his parents. Had Hagar resisted the story would have degenerated into a mere quarrel between jealous women. But God was controlling all these events for the fulfilment of his promise and for the establishment of his Church. Our hearts go out in tenderness toward Hagar as she starts upon her lonely journey in the wilderness. Sarah is left as the mistress of the home, and Hagar goes out as a wanderer in the wilderness. Isaac is the beloved child of promise, and Ishmael goes out in weakness and loneliness on his long, strange career.

We are greatly indebted to the painters and poets for our conceptions of Scripture narratives. To Milton rather than to the Bible many are indebted for their conceptions of Satan, and of angels, of heaven, and of hell; but the painters are often teachers of error rather than of truth. In a famous painting in Dresden of the expulsiou of Hagar and Ishmael, Abraham, Sarah and Isaac are in the background, and Isaac is represented as very little younger and smaller than Ishmael; but we know that Ishmael at this time was at least seventeen years old and about fourteen years older than Isaac. According to the customs of the time, there really was no cruelty on the part of Abraham in sending the mother and boy out on their journey after he had furnished them with bread and water sufficient, as it was supposed, to last them until they reached the next well.

Thirst in the Desert.

We go out with them on their desert journey. They are traveling over a plain of sand and stones. Here and there are some scattered shrubs of thorn and occasional forms of other vegetation. But the sun burns fiercely as its rays fall on these lonely travelers. To be without water in a burning desert is a condition of indescribable misery. It is said that the eyes become inflamed, that the tongue and lips swell, that strange sounds are heard and that the brain finally becomes dull and dizzy. A more perfect picture of distress than that of this mother and son it would be difficult for us anywhere to find. We can well imagine the bitter cries and flowing tears of this heart-broken mother; we can also hear the groans of the famishing boy The hopelessness of the case seems to be complete. Apparently there is no ear to hear, no eye to pity, and no hand to help. Humanly speaking, their case is simply desperate. They seem to have missed their way in the wilderness, and now burning with fever, parched with thirst, and apparently deserted of God and man they sink in despair; but God, who feeds the ravens and who watches the fall of the sparrow, has not forgotten this mother and son in their wretched condition. With a true mother's heart, Hagar cannot bear to see the sufferings of her child; she, therefore, casts him groaning, panting and dying under one of the shrubs, while she at the distance of a bow-shot sat over against him in her loneliness and sorrow, lifting up her face in anguish as her tears copiously fall. The angel of the Lord now appears for their deliverance. He directs them to a fountain which they had not discovered, hidden as it was by the brushwood. From this fountain they draw refreshing draughts. They fill the bottles and mother and son are graciously revived.

From this ancient story practical lessons for daily life can be learned. We, too, are travelers over a desert waste. This world is not our home! There are times when on us as on Hagar the sun beats with scorching heat; there are times when our water, like hers, is spent, and when for us, as for her, there is apparently no helper.

God is Training Us

by these wilderness experiences. Only as we tread rough path with brave hearts can we gain strength for noble deeds. Only as we manfully bear the cross can we triumphantly wear the crown. Sorrow when sanctified refines, ennobles, and exalts daily life. Trial when bravely borne develops character and trains us for worthy achievement. Let us never lose heart in life's journey. God will never leave nor forsake those who put their trust in him.

We may learn, as a second lesson, that appropriate supplies are near at hand. It is evermore true that "man's extremity is God's opportunity." How glorious is it to read that "God opened her eyes and she saw a well of water;" how blessed to know that "God heard the voice of the lad." Nothing is said expressly of any formal prayer which Ishmael offered; he probably simply uttered his needs in sobs, in sighs and groans. His suffering condition was itself a voice to the compassion of God. Many a prayer is only a groan. Many a voice is only a tear. God hears the groan and sees the tear, and one day those groans will be melodious music and those tears richest jewels in the thought of God. God is not deaf, he is not blind, he is not dead. Near Crete there was an image of Jupiter without ears. That was an appropriate representation of a heathen god; but our God has ears to hear, a heart to feel, and a hand to help. There is no wilderness so lonely as to deprive us of his presence. Oh, no; Hagar, the lad will not die but live; thou thyself art the object of God's thought and the subject of God's Fatherly Care.

With the angel of God out of heaven we say, "What aileth thee, Hagar, fear not for God hath heard the voice of the lad where he is." See her now lifting up the lad. See her gazing upon the well of water. See her giving the lad the inspiring draught. Have good courage, Oh, men and women! for God's well of needed supplies is near at hand. If Hagar had but looked a little farther she need not have cast away her boy in sorrow and have thrown herself down in despair. Help was near did she but know, had she but looked. Blessed is the well which furnishes supplies for our great temporal and spiritual need!

A third lesson is that for Hagar and for us the supply is abundant and free. There was sufficient for the needs of herself and her son, and for the needs of thousands beside. For us the water of life flows full and free. On the last great day of the feast our blessed Lord stood and cried saying, "If any man thirst let him come unto me and drink." He was himself a well of water for every thirsty soul. Before the record of Revelation is closed the Lord himself again appears, saying, "And the spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will let him take the water of life freely." To-night, as the servant of God, I invite you to this fountain of living water. You need not die but live. Behold the flowing stream, arise, drink and rejoice. To your lips I now put the cup, knowing if you but drink of this water you shall never thirst again; for Christ hath said, "But whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life."

Among the Hindu Poor.

Multitudes of Aborigines, almost Unclothed, living in Wretched Buildings—Their Morals and Religion

MEASURED by any standard of actual possessions, says a writer in the Pauline Mission Message, the aboriginal and unmixed Hindu population is poor indeed. It has often been a wonder to us that the laboring classes among Hindus build so poorly, and one is not less surprised to see the comparatively superior houses the Koi takes the pains to build. A man can rarely stand in a poor Hindu's one to three-rupee house, he nearly always can comfortably do so in the Koiwar's more capacious, better-roofed home. But this house is about all. Seldom do brass cooking vessels appear in the hands of the Kois. The most common earthenware, cheap, easily broken and quickly replaced, do them. Better utensils are seen among even the poor Hindus. Here and there are flocks, but a few fowls, perhaps a goat or two, a dog, and one or two genuine "scalawag" pigs make up a Koi estate. In the west the men dress better than in Bastar. The women go with the upper body only imperfectly covered by a cloth that covers the lower body, one end of which is thrown up over one shoulder from the front.

In the villages of Bastar we find multitudes with no more than a piece of cloth three feet by nine inches, a very scant covering for the human frame. Our hearts have been touched with pity many a time as men, women and children have come out to hear us preach, sing and pray. It is noticeable that the natural modesty of mankind is not wholly lost even among the most barbarous tribes, or under the vilest of heathen systems. We first thought such nudity would prove the depravity of the people. But to our surprise we did not find any more immorality among the aboriginee than the Hindu. Children up to eight or ten years are usually utterly naked. Among the Hindus the marriage relation is very lightly esteemed. The Koi, on the other hand, may polygamise, but generally he has but one wife.

Notwithstanding the apparent poverty of the aborigines among whom we have travelled, they seem remarkably happy. Almost every night you hear the village song and the tom-tom. This is to amuse themselves and frighten away the wild beasts that abound about them and are the plague of their stock pens. Whatever else the people have or have not, they get and use tobacco. They grow it and its use by both sexes is everywhere seen. Even little children indulge in the poison. Drinking under the British "out-still system" is fearfully prevalent along the Godavery and drunkenness is spreading greatly in that vicinity; up to a recent date the people of Bastar have been comparatively free from this vice. But the British excise system is set up, and the mohwa tree, the flower of which yields liquor, abounds.

Five thousand people meet in Jagdapur every Sunday market-day. These weekly bazaars afford a fine opportunity for evangelizing. Much of the grain carrying is done on the heads of women, or on men's shoulders.

The aboriginee wears plenty of jewelry. Men put on most of it. We frequently see from ten to one hundred different articles of ornament. Naked they may be, but they must must have jewelry. We have seen thirty-eight rings in a man's two ears on a feast day.

The great respect apparently shown to woman among the aborigines is striking. She seems to be reckoned fairly man's equal. This greatly simplifies missionary work among them. Our preachers can at the same time with equal facility reach both men and women. At Yellandu three-fifths of all who hear our preachers are women. The aboriginee either in the west or east builds no temple to his gods. These people revere gods they esteem to dwell in the hills. They worship the five brother kings, of whom Beem Der and Dharma Raj are their favorites. They sacrifice to appease the Hindu small-pox goddess, but do this in the open air. Every high hill is deemed sacred, and it is difficult to get one of these people to ascend one of the higher hills. They have no idols so-called. The last man among them will tell you "God is above." When you ask him why he does not worship him and him only he frankly says because he does just what his father taught him.

Everywhere the magic-man is dreaded, and he takes good care to fleece the people well for his own profit. Jagdapur is full of temples and literally somebody has made "priests of the common people" here. Such is the country, the people, their history, their customs, condition, and religion told but in part.

A PRAYER.

HELP me to work for thee:
Give me some bit of sod,
All bare and brown,
Where I thy precious seed
May scatter down,
Thy Gospel, rich and free.

For me thou gavest life,
While men around are falling
Day by day
In death and sin, help me,
O Lord, I pray,
Save some one in the strife.

The harvest hour is brief,
Though I must glean o'er fields
Anear and far,
In morning's dew, and 'neath
The evening star,
Let me bring in some sheaf.

When thy "Well done" to hear,
I wait with thirsting heart
Before thy throne,
May some whom I thy Boundless love have shown,
Stand with me there.

—WINONA BOYDSTON.

COME, WALK WITH ME IN THE LIGHT!

"COME, walk with me in the light!"
Such is the gentle cry
Of One of presence bright,
In wooing accents kind.
"With me, O Lord, abide!"
My spirit doth reply,
"That ever near thy side,
I perfect peace may find!"

"If you always abide
In love and faith in me,
And in my words confide
Well them to keep and do;
Then ask whate'er you will
In childlike faith that he,
My Father, will fulfil,
And it is done to you."

"In thee, O Lord, my Stay
My Trust, I would abide,
Thy words in me alway
To be my lamp and light;
That I may ever dwell
With thee, my Guard, my Guide,
And, with rejoicing, tell
Of all thy wondrous might!"

The Ten Virgins.

The Meaning of the Parable, and the Significance of the Oil.

BY THOMAS NEWBERRY.

THE word "then" connects this parable of the Virgins (Matt. 25: 1-15), with the preceding one, in which the Lord speaks of his return, but in this he takes a comprehensive view of the whole period of his absence in one particular aspect. The term "kingdom of heaven," or more properly "the kingdom of heavens," is peculiar to the Gospel of Matthew. In the other Gospels it is spoken of as "the kingdom of God." "The mystery of the kingdom of the heavens" relates to the whole period in which Christ, born King of the Jews, rejected by his people Israel, who refused to have him to reign over them, is seated with the Father on his throne in the heavens.

One similitude of this kingdom is given by the Lord in this parable; it is compared to ten virgins, five of whom were wise and five foolish, as representing those who own him as Lord and are expecting his return. These compose what is known as Christendom, who acknowledge Israel's rejected King from the time when Messiah was cut off at the end of the sixty-ninth week till the commencement of the seventieth week of Daniel's prophecy.

The whole professing Church is represented by the ten virgins, five wise and five foolish. In most of the Lord's parables we find the same twofold division, as the wheat and tares, the good and bad fish, the faithful and unfaithful servants. What characterized the foolish virgins is, that they took the lamp of profession, acknowledging the Lordship of Christ, and the hope of his return, but were destitute of spiritual reality and power. "They took no oil with themselves." Oil is the emblem of the Holy Spirit, the unction from the Holy One. The foolish take the lamp of profession first, but neglect the oil; the wise, on the other hand, make the possession of the oil in the vessel their first concern (the vessel is the heart), realizing the indwelling of the Holy Ghost and his testimony within; to this they added the outward profession of the hope of his return.

The Lord foresaw and foretold this delay, as he says in verse 19, "After a long time the lord of those servants cometh, and reckoneth with them." He would have his disciples wait as well as watch, but the Church was not prepared for this prolonged delay, which has extended already over eighteen hundred years. The Ephesian Church early lost her first love, the love of her espousals; and the doctrine of a spiritual coming and reign, instead of a personal and real, early changed the character of the believer's hope. The dark ages was the time of profoundest slumber to the whole professing Church, but even since the time of the Reformation the Church has been dreaming of converting the world previous to, and independent of, her Lord's return.

Previously there had been many cries, such as, the end of the world had come, or the great day of judgment was coming, or the kingdom was going to be set up. Now it is, "Behold, the bridegroom cometh." Behold! Take notice. Mark well. It is not Antichrist, nor the great tribulation, but it is the coming of Christ in his especial character as Bridegroom to receive his Church before he comes to take the kingdom. This is his coming as the Morning Star, before he rises as Sun of Righteousness on the world. It is within the present century that this testimony has gone forth.

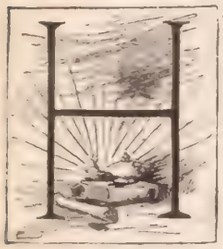
It is not to be received simply as a doctrine, but as a practical truth, for "he that hath this hope purifieth himself even as he is pure." It is designed to separate from everything that would be inconsistent with the expectation of meeting him, that we might be found of him in peace, without spot and blameless.

The doctrine of the Bridegroom's coming may be discussed and reasoned about, but apart from the supply of the Spirit of Christ the consideration will lead to no practical or permanent result. There may be a transitory excitement, but it will soon pass off. The foolish virgins are conscious of this, "our lamps go out," we cannot keep them burning. The torch-bearers in the East are furnished with a vessel from which they pour a fresh supply from time to time, and thus keep up the light. Those who possess the Spirit know that they have only a sufficiency for themselves.

Who are those that sell? Jehovah is the fountain of living waters (Jer. 2: 13; Rev. 21: 5-7). The fulness of the Spirit is treasured up in Christ. He who communicates is the Holy Ghost who invites to buy without money and without price. Whatever profession there may be, if there is not the oil in the vessel when the Lord comes, the door will be shut, for "if any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of his."

FELLOWSHIP IN WORK.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing July 23. Acts 18: 3; John 17: 20-26



HAS Christ's prayer been answered? As we look around and notice the jealous rivalry of the sects, the exclusiveness, the dislike of each other and the bitterness with which they assail each other, it does not seem that God has yet granted that prayer, which was almost his dying petition. "That they all may be one," was the intense desire of that loving heart. He was leaving them alone, face to face with a hostile, contemptuous world, and he pleaded with God that they might stand together. It was not long, however, before divisions came, which but for the strange experience that Peter went through on the house-top, might have rent the infant Church in twain. The later divisions, which came as the years passed, were not so easily adjusted. Questions of church discipline and government, and differences on doctrine separated the brethren. The bond which united them was forgotten; and the wall that divided them was ever present in their minds and it has continued so to this day. It is impossible that men should think alike on so large a subject as theology. The differences of mental constitution, of education and circumstances must produce differences of opinion. That those who are of the same mind should congregate together is natural and is in the interests of peace; but that one body should assail another body, as insincere, or as ignorant or obstinate, is unnatural between brethren. Yet these assaults are continually made and proselytes are more valued than converts. One of the most encouraging signs of the times is the improvement in this matter which the last few years have witnessed. The churches have been slowly and tentatively making the discovery that practical union in practical work is possible. It is the glory of Christian Endeavor that it has done much to promote that union. No power nor device of the enemy, no jealousy between those who are regarded as pillars in the churches, can ever take out of the memories and hearts of the young people the experiences they have had in the great Conventions, when they have found brethren and sisters of other denominations one with them in Christian effort. "Because they were of one craft they abode together and wrought," as the three Christians did long ago in Corinth. Those recollections will live and the churches will draw nearer together in the coming time, when these young people come to the leadership. The excellence of the respective methods will be recognized and work will be assigned to this section or the other, for which it is specially adapted. What the infantry cannot do, the cavalry may compass, and what neither can do may be done by the artillery; but the one great achievement to be hoped for is for each branch of Christ's army to look on the other branches as brothers and to march against the common foe, shoulder to shoulder in loving confidence.

AN IRISH Y. M. C. A.

The Kingstown, Ireland, Y.M.C.A. issues a good report of the various operations. The evangelistic meetings have been worked vigorously, and with encouraging results, and many have been won for the Saviour. An interesting feature has been the frequent attendance of sailors and soldiers. The missionary branch has been accompanied by much interest, and three members of the Association have gone to Mr. Moody's College as missionary students. The employment agency and other branches have gone on well. This year has been rich in soul-saving results.

THE B. Y. P. U. CONVENTION

On this page we publish a picture of Tomlinson Hall, Indianapolis, in which the third International Convention of the Baptist Young People's Union will be held this week. With this we give a portrait of Mr. John H. Chapman, of Chicago, who is President of the Union. The Convention assembles at half-past three on Thursday afternoon, July 13. The delegates will be welcomed by E. E. Stevenson, Esq., on behalf of the Young People's Unions of Indianapolis, and by Rev. W. F. Taylor on behalf of the Baptist Churches of the city. Responses will be made by Rev. C. A. Barbour, of Rochester, N. Y.; Prof. L. D. Inskeep, Oakland, Cal.; Rev. L. L. Henson, Baltimore, Md.; and Rev. Donald Grant, of Montreal. At the evening session Dr. F. L. Wilkins will read the report, Rev. A. J. Dickinson, of Selma, Ala., will speak on "The Movement and the Local Church," and Dr. P. S. Henson, of Chicago, on "The Federation of the American Baptist Home Missionary Society. His subject is, "The Perils of the Republic from a Christian Standpoint." That this will be one of the most important features of the Convention is generally admitted. The session will close with an Open Parliament on "The Monthly Symposium." Three "Workers' Conferences" will be held simultaneously in the interval between the afternoon and evening sessions. One of these on Junior Work will assemble in the First Presbyterian Church; a second on Local Young People's Work will meet in the First Baptist Church and a third will meet in the Meridian St. M.E. Church to discuss Federative Work, Associational, State or Provincial and International. Dr. W. M. Lawrence of Chicago will preside at the third conference which is expected to have important results on the work of the ensuing year. At the evening session the Educational plans for 1893-94 will be announced and explained by Dr. F. L. Wilkins, the General Secretary. This will be followed by three addresses. Rev. M. R. Deming of New York will speak on "The Boys' Brigade"; Rev. G. W. Truett of Waco, Texas, on "Conviction" and Rev. George C. Lorimer, D.D., of Boston, Mass., on "Young People who are too Timid to Fight."

On Saturday, Rev. G. R. Robbins of Cincinnati conducts the sunrise prayer-meeting. The early part of the regular session of the Convention will be devoted to Committee reports and general business, after which there will be an Open Parliament on "The Conquest Meeting," conducted by Rev. Frank S. Dobbins of Philadelphia. Next comes an address by Rev. R.R. McKay of Brampton, Ont., and the session will close with a conference at which the reports of the Chairmen of the Friday Afternoon Conferences will be received. At the afternoon session there will be a symposium on the general topic, "Our Lesser Federations, their Benefits and Needs." Afterward papers will be read by Mr. Norman G. Lennington of Chicago, on "The Suburban Union"; Mr. A. L. Bates of Kansas City, Mo., and the Future of the Baptist Churches in America."

TOMLINSON HALL, INDIANAPOLIS, WHERE THE B. Y. P. U. CONVENTION IS HELD THIS WEEK.

Friday's proceedings commence with a prayer-meeting at 6:30 A. M., in the First Baptist Church. At 9:30 there will be a business meeting to discuss the Annual Report and the Junior Organization, after which Dr. H. M. King, of Providence, R. I., will deliver an address entitled "Religious Liberty the Trophy of the Baptists." The session will close with the ceremony of the "Salutation of the Flags." At the afternoon session Prof. A. G. Slocum, LL. D., of Kalamazoo, will conduct a Prayer service for young people in colleges, after which the Prize Banners will be presented, and the awards declared for excellence of record in the Study of the Life of Christ and in the Daily Bible readings. This pleasant duty will be followed by the Election of Officers.

At 3.30 P.M. a paper will be read which will be sure to attract a deep national interest. Its author is Dr. T. J. Morgan, who was Commissioner of Indian Affairs under the Harrison Administration and is now General Secretary on "The City Union," and Rev. J. K. Wilson of Taunton, Mass., on "The State or Provincial Union." In the evening there will be no meeting in the Hall, but four mass-meetings will be held simultaneously in as many churches. They will be distinguished by the color of the badges worn respectively by the four geographical sections as follows: Delegates from the Northern States east of the Mississippi, will wear gold badges and will meet in Roberts Park M. E. Church; from Northern States west of the Mississippi, blue badges, in the First Presbyterian Church; from Southern States, olive green badges, in the First Baptist Church; from Canada, red badges, in the Second Presbyterian Church. A committee is organized for each section which will prepare a programme for its own mass-meeting

On Sunday, Rev. W. H. Geisweit of Minneapolis conducts a prayer meeting in Tomlinson Hall at nine o'clock. There will be no morning session, but in the afternoon a meeting will be held at which three papers will be read. The general topic will be, "The Vision of Christ as Outlined in the Great Commission: Its Scope, Its Motive, Its Prophecy." The speakers will be Rev. Lemuel C. Barnes of Pittsburg, Pa.; Mr. Mornay Williams of New York, and Rev. Wm. M. Upcraft of China. The great Junior Rally of the Convention also will be held in the afternoon in the First Baptist Church. The last session of the Convention will be held at 7:15 P.M, when the President will give his New Year's address and Rev. A. C. Dixon, D.D. of Brooklyn will preach the Convention Sermon. The closing exercise will be the great Consecration Meeting which is usually the most impressive and memorable of all the scenes of a religious Convention.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR IN TURKEY.

In a letter describing his visit to Constantinople, which Dr. F. E. Clark sends to the Golden Rule, he thus describes an evening spent in the American college for girls at Scutari: Here is a Christian institution of the very highest grade, planted right in the heart of Islamism. Here is a college that can in many ways take rank with Wellesley, Smith, and Vassar, in the land of the Turk himself. The harems of the Sultan are all about, within a pistol-shot of the college in every direction; and yet here is a large company of girls receiving a sensible, American, Christian Education, under the control of the gifted president of the college.

In the course of this evening reception songs in Bulgarian, Turkish, Greek, Armenian and English were sung. As a place in which to obtain proficiency in modern languages I do not know of a better college in all the world than this missionary college of the Golden Horn. Best of all, a strong religious influence is here exerted, and the flourishing Christian Endeavor society finds itself in a congenial atmosphere.

IN HIS NAME.

We meet a little while together
In His Name,
We pray and praise; oft' wonder whether
'Tis in vain.
Nay; for in Holy Writ we see
How He blesses two or three,
If their meetings only be
In His Name.

That blessing Lord may we receive
In Thy Name.
Thy promises we all believe
And this one claim.
Be with us Lord, Thy Word to teach,
Thy Holy Spirit give to each
As we the precious Scriptures search,
In Thy Name.

Then Lord our words and deeds shall be Done in Thy Name,
Our lives be shining lights for Thee
This be our aim.
E'en let all our pleasures be Consecrated Lord to Thee,
And through all eternity
We'll praise Thy Name.

Then let us sow the precious seed
In His Name,
Help and comfort those in need
For this He came.
Toil on; we have His presence nigh,
Pray on; he hears our humble cry.
Ah! do you ask the reason why?
'Tis in His Name.

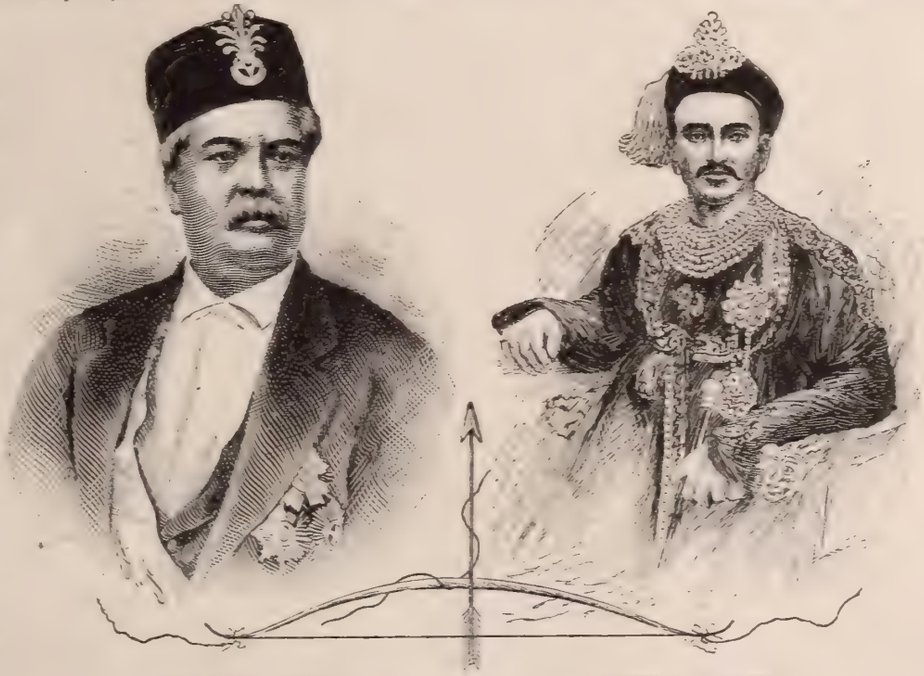
More Royal Guests.

The Sultan of Johore and the Guikwar of Baroda to Visit us.

JUST as the Spanish princess Eulalia and her friends are departing from these shores, comes the news that we are to have another group of royalties with us presently. This party comes from the far East, one being his Highness, Syaji Rao, the Maharajah Guikwar of Baroda, India, and the other the Sultan of Johore, in the Malay Peninsula, two potentates of great wealth but small territories. The Guikwar is the ruler of 2,500,000 subjects and his annual income is in the neighborhood of $7,500,000. He is a comparatively young prince, and the story of his accession to the throne is an interesting one. Mulhar Rao, who was Guikwar in 1875, was implicated in an attempt to poison the English Political Resident, Col. Phayre and was accordingly deposed through British influence. Gopal Rao, a boy of twelve, was then chosen as his successor. The lad had never dreamed of a throne, and was therefore totally surprised when he was summoned to be crowned and invited to assume the royal functions under the title of Syaji Rao III. Like other Indian princes who are subject to the supreme authority of Britain, his responsibilities were somewhat limited and he had consequently abundant opportunities for culture. He is well educated and has travelled much and when in American costume will attract no special attention among other gentlemen. He has been a stanch friend of education in Baroda and has opened public schools there at the rate of thirty a year for several years. There are 3,500 towns and villages under his rule, and he hopes ultimately to have schools throughout his entire domain. He is opposed to the barbarous system of child marriages still prevalent in India, and has done much to promote the moral welfare of his people. While in this country he will visit the Chicago Exposition.



THE SULTAN OF JOHORE. THE GUIKWAR OF BARODA

ROYAL GUESTS FROM THE EAST COMING TO VISIT US.

The Sultan of Johore is a Malay potentate whose domain has till lately been comparatively little known to Europeans or Americans. Far ahead of his predecessors in intelligence and enterprise, the present Rajah, who is now in his sixtieth year, has visited many civilized countries and takes a keen interest in the development of his own. Johore, the capital city, is a flourishing little settlement near Singapore, with schools and other indications of progress. The entire population of the territory probably does not exceed 100,000, many being Malays and Chinese. In olden times, the Sultans of Johore had a much more extensive territory, but lost it gradually through conquest. It was the grandfather of the present ruler—Abdulrahman Tumongong—who ceded Singapore to the British. The present Sultan, although his revenues are not as large as those of the Guikwar of Baroda, lives in the style of a true potentate of the Orient, in a great palace which is a rich type of Eastern luxury. He owns a modern-built yacht which he uses both for business and recreation. His people, with the exception of the official class, live mostly in wooden, hut-like structures built near the water and often on piles reaching out into the Strait of Malacca.

Our new occidental civilization will be a wonderful revelation to these old-world princes and may be the means of impressing them with many ideas that will yet benefit their own people. Like the Guikwar, the Sultan proposes to see the great Exposition, and to carry home with him an intelligent idea of the magnitude, influence, art and industries of the United States, which is thus in turn, becoming an educator to some of the oldest countries in the world.

Tired Women.

To judge from the varied, minute, ever-increasing details we hear, writes Lucy K. Fleming, the tired woman is supposed to be a creature entirely deficient in the usual amount of common-sense sparsely, we admit, portioned out to humankind; she is reckoned without ingenuity, tact, or taste. No allowance whatever, is made for the inconsiderate demands or necessary interruptions of her everyday life. Her husband, children, friends, and neighbors are usually assumed to stand ready to make any sacrifice in reason to rescue her from her self-imposed weariness, when, in truth, too frequently those nearest and dearest to her usually so arrange their affairs as to prolong her twelve or fourteen hours' labor, without the word "hold! enough;" and no system of eight hours enters in the day's work of the average wife and mother.

Happy Old People.

THERE was a company of congenial women before an open fire over 5 o'clock tea, and one of them was saying how she hated to grow old and lose her zest in life and its belongings. Then a fresh-faced matron, with a pair of steady, true eyes, spoke out with her native vehemence.

"Nonsense, what do the years bring but greater treasures and greater capacity to enjoy them? Do you suppose I guessed anything about real happiness in what we called 'youth's happy days?' Why, every year that I have been a wife and a mother I have known constantly-increasing joy; can better appreciate what life offers me.

"Every day I value and delight in my friends more and more; every day I take on a wisdom of experience that gives me a sense of power again; what may come, and as to the future and old age, why, I never think of it to dread it.

"I shall not be old to-morrow, I say to myself, and what is the future but always only to-morrow? By and by when I do sit in the chimney corner and knit and watch the children's children play around me, I am sure I shall think: How happy and safe am I, and what a beautiful thing life is, particularly the close of it!"

Children and the Church.

THERE is, at this time of the year, a disposition on the part of "grown-up" as well as young folks to make church duties as light as possible. Even the old heads will remember the dreamy, drowsy season in the country:

> The flower-time o' the year,
> How I used to love it!
> When my feet were bare and younger,
> How they used to whisk with hunger,
> Dew from meadow grasses;
> Those were days without alloy,
> I was but a barefoot boy,
> But the years have left this gain:
> Memories of the tinkle, tinkle,
> Of the old-time dreamy dinkle,
> As the cows came up the lane,
> Bess and Moll came up the lane.

But the charms of the summer should not be permitted to come between us and the regular attendance at church, and we should endeavor to keep alive the child interest. The best way of winning the interest and affection of children for the church is by convincing them that it is profoundly in spiritual earnest, says a philosophic and reverend writer. They know the difference as well as their elders know it between a church that is zealous and one which is indifferent. Moreover, the signs of its life must be those of true religious life. Picnics and other entertainments have their uses, but the chief thing which holds a child to a church is his consciousness that all its methods and measures have his soul's good in view. He knows that a true church ought to have this object, and he does not respect one which seems to make any other chief. It is a happy omen that so many children are in the modern church. There ought to be, and there might be many more. Children must not be expected to be mature Christians at first, but they often prove to be as truly consecrated as their elders, and as the rule the younger one dedicates his heart and life to Jesus Christ, the sounder, sweeter and richer his later Christian experience proves to be.

Painters' Love for Children.

MOST of the ancient artists tried their hand at the Virgin and the Child, writes Dr. Talmage, always evincing their own nationality in the style of infantile beauty selected. The Dutch school gives a Dutch child, the Roman school a Roman child, the Spanish school a Spanish child. Rubens' Christ was not born at Bethlehem, but at Antwerp. And as parents are not apt to undervalue their children, it is probable that they took the model which sat in their own nursery, gathering around it their own ideal of the infant Jesus. Francesco Tacconi represents the Holy Child as very thoughtful, a young philosopher at one year of age, with very red hair. Vivarini gives us a startled child. Duccio paints for us a child wrapped up in admiration of its mother. But Lo Spagna gives us the look of a glad child that would romp if it were not afraid of jumping out of the picture. Why not a glad child? The burdens had not yet rolled over on him. Though a bachelor, Raphael knew the worth of children in a picture. With their little hands they open the inside door of the heart, and let us pass in, when otherwise we might have been kept standing on the cold steps, looking at the corbeils and caryatides of the outside architecture. It was a little maid that directed Naaman to the Jordan for healing, and it is a child in the picture that shows the leper of harsh criticism where to wash his scales off.

CHILDREN AND THE BIBLE.

CONNECTED with the religious training of childhood many practical questions spring up, such as the teaching of prayer, Bible-reading and Sunday observance, writes Rev. E. Lyttleton in Mothers and Sons. My experience of children has been far too slight to enable me to speak at all clearly on such subjects, and again I feel that the grasp of the main fact—the all-importance of the idea of God planted by the earliest lessons—will probably solve the practical problems satisfactorily, though very diversely in different homes. As to prayer, this only will I say, that it is quite impossible to be too careful about reverence. Of course there is the danger of a shock when the child is brought face to face with the irreverence of others. But this may be anticipated by a warning. Further, if a child's prayer is to be natural, it must express his own hopes and fears, not those of grown-up people.

The teaching of the Bible stories ought not in these days to present any great difficulty. If a child shows irreverence in speaking of what he has been told, it must be best to try and get him gradually to adopt a right tone, rather than rebuke him; and yet this will be necessary at times. Consult on all these points the wisest and holiest women of your acquaintance. Previous to the Bible lessons will come the first statement of the existence of God, and of the kingdom of evil and the creation of man. I would suggest that the mother should present the truths as portions of a partial revelation, so that when the first impossible question is launched at her—and that will take place early—there may be no great shock to the child when the answer comes that "Mother doesn't know." Sometimes the bewilderment of early manhood is caused by the discovery that there are things of which the Church owns herself ignorant, and to guard against this it is well to show a child that we may stray too far in speculation. He may be thereby discouraged from hereafter expending his strength and confusing his brain over obviously insoluble problems—a desperately common form of wasting time. The object of the teaching should be first to show the limits of revelation, and to instil concerning all that lies beyond them a spirit of trustful patience; secondly, to show that within these limits we accept what is given, and apply it honestly in our lives.

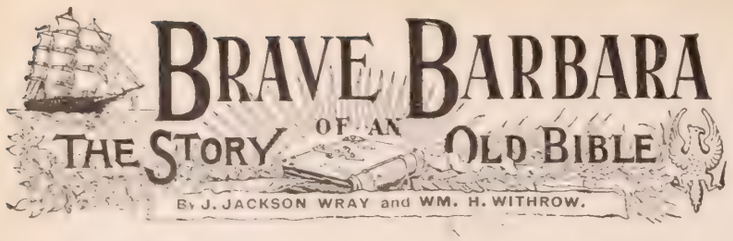
MY ARBOR OF LOVE.

Written for The Christian Herald.

I'M alone in my arbor of love,
Awaiting the unfailing Guest,
That beautiful white-winged Dove,
The Spirit of God in my breast.
He enters and all things are changed,
The gloom and the doubts drop away,
And blessings that sin has estranged,
Return like a beautiful day.

Imperial thrones are but dross,
And titles and honors are naught,
When he, of the thorn and the Cross,
Has filled up my breast with this thought,
The smallness of self,—I behold,
And wonder such grace is for me,
While mercies in measures untold,
Roll up, like the waves of the sea.

E'en prisons and walls cannot keep,
My soul from her jubilant flight,
As filled with God's Spirit I sweep,
Away to his infinite light,
And sickness and death are the door
Which open to joys that I see.
I know 'tis the bright Eden shore,
And all its delights are for me. —J. A. H.



CHAPTER XVIII.

FAMILY PRIDE.

ONE of the most striking results of the camp-meeting was the effect produced upon the Indians who had gathered there mainly out of curiosity or the hope of gain. It seems that Tookalusca and his sister had found in Lucky Mike not only a faithful friend and comrade in their new life at the Settlement, and a "brother" both tender and true in their new-found Christian faith, but also an eager and diligent pupil in the learning of the Ojibbeway tongue. So ready a scholar was he that when the camp-meeting brought some scores of red-skins together, no white-skin was more welcome in the Indian tents. No one could more easily hold intercourse with these children of the forest than Brave Barbara's loving and faithful henchman who had served her so loyally, and followed her varying fortunes so faithfully, from the day that, as Onlucky Mike, he was a wild and half-barbarous waif, leading the life of an outlaw among the bogs of Munster.

This altogether unique and remarkable gathering, the first great camp-meeting of the Canadian Dominion, resulted, almost immediately, in a large accession to the numbers of the fast-growing Methodist Connection. This was the case, not only in the various settlements on the St. Lawrence river among which this singular "camp" was pitched, but throughout the province of Ontario. It seemed as though the "glorious bonfire of salvation," as somebody calls it, which was kindled among the forest trees around the Heck Farm, had set the whole land aflame. From that central flame, thousands of living brands, set alight of God, were borne east, west, north and south. Many a little church of faithful souls was established, and new beacon-fires were kindled over all the land. All this, humanly speaking was owing to this rare heroine of humble life, Barbara Heck—Brave Barbara, as she has been rightly named—more than to any other single agent beneath the sun. To her unflinching faith, courage and perseverance, the New World owes it that the Gospel flag was so bravely unfurled through all its borders.

Of course, there was much diversity of opinion, even among the neighbors, as to the enthusiastic and emotional inroad into the lifeless and conventional religion of the day. That excellent and soberly self-possessed Quaker gentleman, Josiah Whiteside, was disturbed by a good many searchings of heart on the subject. He had been very willing to give ready and liberal help as a neighbor, in making preparations for the great festival. But he could not enter into the religious engagements of the time; nor was he at all sure that these were altogether according to the mind of God.

These exciting and excitable manifestations were altogether foreign to the training and the habits of a life-time. To go from his own little Quaker meeting, where the usual routine was to spend a silent hour in communing with his own heart and with God, and then to go into the noisy hurly-burly of a Methodist revival was almost enough to make his white hair stand on end. His rebuke, however—if rebuke it could be called,—partook of the quiet characteristics of the man.

"I judge no man," said he, when the younger members of his household sought to get his mind upon the subject. "Neither is it [illegible] that my mind does not approve."

"But though your mind does not say Yea to these stirring services, thy heart does not say Nay thereto, Josiah; and may it not be [illegible] head." So spake his wife, Hannah, a fine-[illegible]

"It may be so," said Josiah, shaking his head dubiously; "yet I much misdoubt me that where the heart pulls one way and the mind another, there will be heart-ache if the mind cannot give a verdict of consent."

"But why should not the heart and the mind go together?" said Sarah, the elder and attractive daughter of this estimable pair. "It [illegible] to me that if the mind moves Godward and the heart be warm with desire for him, the heart may well make the mind run faster, and both may be inclined to show it in a livlier worship, and speak his praises in a louder voice."

As Sarah uttered these words she blushed deeply, dropping her head low as if to hide the evidence of strong feeling. She had spoken with quite unusual force and freedom. Then she suddenly remembered the "proprieties" that had restrained her for a life-time and lifted her fair face to her father's and said with a slight deprecating smile,

"Nay, father, surely I did speak without thought—"

"And as one of the foolish women speaketh," said Josiah, but there was no frown upon his brow, and according to Sarah's thinking, there was a softness and an undefinable something in the grey eyes that did not usually appear when such subjects were spoken of."

"Methinks that thy remark, my daughter, doth betoken that thy heath speaketh, whether thy mind—"

At this point Sarah arose, and her mother, who had seen for some time what had escaped her husband's less observant eyes, made haste to cover her flustered girl's retreat. Josiah seemed surprised.

"What ails the girl, Hannah?" quoth he turning an inquiring look on his wife. What stirs her feeling so deeply, and makes her color rise so high? I wot not that I spake unkindly."

"Neither didst thou," said Hannah, "but that ails Sarah which once ailed thee and me, and in the days when our hearts were 'warm' and our years were young. What thine eyes have failed to see mine have long since discerned. That our sweet girl hath lost her heart and has found the heart of Samuel Heck instead; an accident of a similar kind hath happened to the young man. For a long time hath this thing been true, but the meeting at which thou dost gird has brought the two together more closely still. But say, my husband, is this thing an accident, or is the Lord in it?"

My time and space will not permit me to tell the story fully, how Josiah Whiteside was led to enlarge his views concerning the variety of ways in which God can speak to the human heart, and the ways in which the human heart may speak to God; how the eldest son of Brave Barbara and her good man Paul, prospered in his wooing, and how the Quaker maiden, Sarah Whiteside, became his wife, and the mother of children, some of whose descendants are living at this day. A race of men, these Hecks, notable for sterling worth, and all the more so, we may depend upon it, for the blending of Methodist and Quaker in their ancestry more than a hundred years ago.

The influence of the great camp-meeting was not at all conciliatory in the case of that stern and stalwart old soldier, Colonel Pemberton. He became more than ever opposed to Methodism, and his modes of speech regarding it grew more and more emphatic and objurgatory. This was a great grief to Mrs. Pemberton, who was a woman, of a different spirit, and who in this matter was seconded by their eldest daughter Blanche.

This young lady, possessed of remarkable beauty, highly educated, and gifted with unusual accomplishments, thanks to mental endowments of a very extraordinary kind, was the object of Colonel Pemberton's aristocratic pride, the subject of great expectations; and he did not scruple to aver that she was evidently destined to a position among the highest ladies of the land. Indeed, it was known that for some time the old Virginian aristocrat had been saving money to send his daughter to England, that, by the aid of British relatives, she might emulate the career of her own mother, who had been one of the maids of honor to Queen Anne.

But the Colonel had forgotten, not only that Queen Anne was dead, but that times change, and that the minds of young ladies do the same. And so it was that the Colonel's "peerless Blanche," as he used to call her, was "her mother's child," and was built on the lines of that genial, pious, unambitious and charitably disposed lady. Mrs. Pemberton was known both far and near as "one of God's favorites, and a true friend of the needy and poor." That is the record of this estimable woman as it has come down to me.

In one thing, however, Miss Blanche did very considerably differ from her quiet and somewhat shrinking mamma. She could take her stand, speak her mind and stick to it, and not even the irascible old Colonel himself could drive her from her guns or dislodge her from whatever position her heart and conscience, her sympathies and sense of right bade her take up.

"'It never rains but it pours,' they say. First Redgie, then Blanche! Well, well, if I am bereaved of my children I am bereaved!" the Colonel said as he left the house after one of these outbreaks to look after his stables.

The Colonel's shot had reached the heart of his strong-willed, and, as he thought of his too self-assertive daughter. Blanche loved her parents dearly, and although her affections turned more tenderly and lovingly around her gentle mother, she had a warm and filial regard for her father who had ever lavished love upon herself, who had ever evinced a proud delight in her, and whose splendid qualities as a man, a master, a citizen and a subject she greatly reverenced.

Despite the Colonel's sharp speech, Blanche did not fail to notice a certain tremor in his voice, and a certain involuntary motion of the lips that told the secret of feelings deeply stirred beneath; and his apt quotation from the plaintive speech of broken-hearted Jacob, melted the maiden into penitence and distress.

The early Methodist preachers not only proclaimed their glad evangel on the highways, in barns and houses, wherever an opportunity occurred; but they also visited diligently, from house to house, seeking, by their social interest in the community, to deepen and fix the impressions made by their public ministry.

The house of Colonel Pemberton was never neglected or passed by in these domiciliary visits. Mrs. Pemberton received them with much favor, and, indeed, she was not slow to acknowledge how greatly she was thus aided and comforted in her religious life. Miss Blanche was even more effusive in her welcomes, for she was diligently seeking after God, if haply she might find him. And in the interests of Reginald Pemberton, who was now an effective backwoods "round preacher," after the pattern of the time, Messrs. Losee and Dunham were intent in making and keeping the Pemberton mansion an open door.

The gallant Colonel bore little love to the Methodist itinerants; still, his Virginian hospitality, and his instincts as a gentleman, and the invariable Canadian custom of making welcome the guests who were sparse enough at any time, led him to give them greeting, though at times a constrained one to his roof and table. Mrs. Pemberton, though not a Methodist, was a godly woman; and the visits of these good men and energetic evangelists, and any tidings they could bring her of her wandering boy, exiled as he was from his father's house, was as good news from a far country, or as water to a thirsty soul.

"The Colonel himself," said William Losee to his colleague, on one occasion, "does not like either ourselves, our visit, or our Methodism. Indeed, it seems to me that if it was not for Mrs. Pemberton and her charming daughter, we might venture, with a good conscience, to pass the proud and prejudiced squire by, and go on to those who are free to give us a warmer welcome."

"True, and yet scarcely true," said Daniel Dunham, as a smile parted his lips and showed a perfect and beautiful array of teeth. "It is true that the Colonel is cranky and, at times, unpleasant—but it is not true that we ought, under any circumstances, to let the fretful and, sooth to say, the cross-grained Colonel lapse from our best attentions and our sincere concern. John Wesley says that we are to go to those who need us most; and surely, the Colonel of all the household is the one who stands in need of something better than that which governs his unhappy mind."

"Well, you are right enough there," said William Losee. "Certainly the way to put an end to an enmity is to meet it with superior strength and tenacity in the shape of persevering, patient, and forbearing friendship."

"Right, William," said Daniel, "you have read your poets; do you remember this:

> The fine old noble way to kill a foe
> Is not to rail him, vow with loudest breath
> Such hate him that he shall decease or be so,
> And the old Roman Spectator used to say
> His best foe got his life for nobleness, for when > He mentioned them that, he killed them then"

"And this is what we'll do with the crusty Colonel, Daniel: isn't it? Not only for our Master's sake and his own, but for Mrs. Pemberton's—"

"And Miss Blanche's," added Dunham, with an effusiveness of tone which was much more tell-tale than he knew.

"We'll kill him with kindness," continued Losee; "and that splendid young fellow, Reginald—what a glorious thing it would be to win for him a welcome to his father's heart again!" "That is the doctrine that our true and noble sister in the Lord, Mistress Heck, is always preaching to me," said Daniel Dunham. "Her mind is seldom free from anxious interest in young Pemberton's home relations. I daresay that Gracie's pale face and her failure of spirits has something to do with that; for her daughter, it is clear, is bound up in the lad, and the old Colonel's definite objection to the match is held by Mistress Barbara to be a bar to their union."

Meanwhile, Reginald Pemberton, the exiled son of the iron-willed Colonel, was doing happy and effective duty "in the station of life to which his Master had called him." His was an unusually hard row to hoe, even among the trying experiences which befell the early backwoods evangelists of that now distant day.

The news that he had forsaken his home had followed him from place to place. At times, his youthful energy and his ardent spirit all but failed him, and he felt sorely tempted not only to look back from the furrow he had been painfully, yet successfully turning, but to withdraw his hands from the blistering plough, and retire into private life.

The thought of the possibility, then, of creeping unto his father's heart again; the thought of nestling once more to his mother's heart—for his love to her was a passion—and the thought of gaining Gracie, the darling to whom his soul had been faithful all the while, had almost proved too much for the heroic in him. But he resolved, ere he finally flung himself, under any juniper tree, to seek an interview with Barbara, in whose wisdom, grace and authority he had unflinching faith.

Reginald paid a secret visit to Heck Farm, traveling night and day, through bog and briar, forest, flood, and fell, in order to interfere as little as possible with the "appointments" of his "round." As may be expected, by the time he had reached his destination, both himself and his tired steed presented anything but a creditable appearance. As he afterwards declared, his saddle-bags were the only decent feature of the case, and they were almost as empty as the stomach of the rider.

It must be remembered that in one respect Reginald was a banished man from New Ballygran as well as from his home. Barbara loved the honest and ingenuous youth, and fully believed him to be an appointed servant of Jesus in the new crusade against the devil. She had in her heart no objections, but real preferences, in regard to his desire to make her beloved Gracie his wife. But Gracie was too good and too precious to go into anybody's family on aught but loving terms. Therefore Reginald was forbidden to write to his lady-love, was forbidden to come and see her, and was told by Barbara that there was nothing for him but to "bide his time."

And yet here he was, a weary wanderer in plight forlorn! Barbara, like her own noble self, greeted the haggard youth with a kiss of welcome. Reginald told his story; poured into the ears of Brave Barbara all his sorrows, all the record of his heart-aches, and wound up by asking her whether she did not honestly think that the best thing he could do was to go home again to his father, and lapse into silence so far as Gospel labor was concerned.

Then Barbara, looking upon him, loved him. In her heart she fully sympathized with him, and, there and then, could not help breathing to him who hears, a "God help him!" that reached heaven. But she knew her duty, and she knew his. Masking as best she might, any sympathetic seeming, though her heart went strongly out to him, she put on the aspect of serious rebuke, and gravely shaking her head addressed him thus:

"Reginald Pemberton, this is not a matter in which your own private feelings, nor the opinions of Barbara Heck, nor those of anybody else, are to settle the question. Both you and I are sworn in heart and conscience to take the Word of God alone to be the law of our life and the guide of our conduct; and 'what saith the Scriptures?' is of more importance than aught else. Besides, both you and I are under vows of honor to be true to the Word of God."

So saying, Brave Barbara went to the "dresser," which flanked the wall of the living-room, and took from its honored place beneath the trencher-rack, the old German Bible. Bowing her silvering hairs above the sacred Book, she read to him:

"Every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father or mother, or children, or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive an hundredfold, and shall inherit everlasting life."

"Go thou and preach the kingdom of God. No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God."

BECOMING A CHRISTIAN.*

"GOING to church ought not to be a matter of liking or not liking the minister, you know," said Dr. Forsythe, with his kind smile. "We are supposed to go to church to worship God; but I grant you that most people think too much of the minister part—as to whether he is agreeable or not, I mean. But my question reminds me of a more important one which I have been intending to ask for some time, how is it with Caroline Bryant, is she a Christian?"

Silence, for what seemed to Caroline a long, embarrassing time; then she said, speaking low, "I don't know, Dr. Forsythe; I know I was not when I was at home. Mother and Daisy and Ben are, and I know it used to almost provoke me sometimes that Ben thought so much about these things. He didn't seem to belong to me so much, you know. But since I have come here, and have heard little Dorothy read in the Bible, and heard her pray, and heard you pray, Dr. Forsythe, I feel very differently. But I don't feel at all sure that I am a Christian. I want to be, I think I try to be; but I am not even quite sure what it is to be a Christian."

"It is a very simple matter," said Dr. Forsythe; "and one that can be decided in a few minutes. You may not be a Christian now, but if you honestly want to be, there is no reason in the world why you should not become one before you leave this carriage to-night."

Caroline looked her surprise. "I thought Christians had to be very different from other people."

"A Christian," said the doctor, "is one who takes the Lord Jesus Christ for his pattern, and tries to think and speak and act as he would have him. Now you can see that it rests with you to decide whether you desire to do this, and intend to do it. Sometimes people have a passing wish to become Christians, but it is not strong enough to stay with them and rule their lives. They do not come to a positive decision. They think, and hope, and say 'Perhaps' to-day, and to-morrow forget all about it; and the next day think a little again, but fail to bring themselves to that one point where the soul says, with all the power that is in it, 'I will.' Just as soon as you reach that point, my dear Caroline, you become a Christian."

But Caroline still looked bewildered. "Do not people have to have their hearts changed?" she asked timidly.

"Indeed, they do; but that is the Lord's part; we have nothing to do with it. What he has given to us is to decide. Let me see if I cannot make it plain by illustration. You know when I asked you to come and stay with us at our house, and care for Dorothy, and be a helper to us all, you thought about it a great deal and were doubtful. One hour you felt as if you would come, and the next hour as if you would not for anything; and I, meantime, did not know what your decision was, could not plan for you in any way. But there came a moment when the thing was settled, when you said to me, 'I will come, Dr. Forsythe, and do the best I can.' Do you not see that there was one moment when the question was unsettled, and the next it was settled, so far as you were concerned, and for that matter so far as I was concerned? For the moment I received your answer I knew how to arrange.

"The illustration is faulty, for our Father in heaven knows what the decision will be. Nevertheless, from our side it is plain enough. He has seen fit to give this part of the matter to us. We must come to a conclusion. We must decide, and once for all, that as for us we are resolved to take Jesus Christ as our pattern and serve him as well as we can. The question is, is Caroline Bryant resolved to do this? Does she mean to decide it to-night?"

Silence for a minute, then Caroline's voice, low but firm, "I want to be, Dr. Forsythe." He turned his kind gray eyes upon her and smiled.

"The question is, will you?" he said. "Are you so sure you want to that you are willing to bow your head now and here, and say: 'Jesus Christ, I have decided to take thee as my pattern, to try to serve thee in all that I say or do or think. Wilt thou take me from this moment and make me thine own?'"

It required a struggle to answer. Caroline felt that she was willing to say the words, but to say them before Dr. Forsythe was another matter. She hesitated and looked up at him pitifully, with eyes full of tears.

THE CHURCH AND THE SALOON.*

THE reproach and weakness of the Church is can't—"can't elect," "can't enforce," "can't prevent"; the saloon-keeper is a man who can, and he does, and he will, until Christian voters leave off their "t." In Minnesota it takes a brave bird to stand the winter; at my window one evening, when the mercury was falling rapidly and the fine snow flew like powdered glass, a blue-jay swung on the tree-top and shouted, "Hit-him-a-lick, hit-him-a-lick," and away down on the icy trunk a sap-sucker piped back, "Can't." The next morning the sap-sucker lay dead on the drift, but the jay swung in the dizzy top and shouted, "Hit-him-a-lick!" but of course the sap-sucker couldn't. The Church is overstocked with sap-suckers. Many of our Christian men are brave enough, but are waiting for light, as to methods, not reflecting that power and light are so correlated that when you get one you have the other, as in the case of an electric motor; when the trolley is on the wire overhead, it goes and has light. You say you can't see? You are disconnected; reach up, and touch God and you will see because you go.

In one view it is humiliating, but hopeful in another, that Christians fight best on the defensive, and so the very audacity of the liquor traffic is encouraging. It will make even our weakest brethren stand, presently, and a coward, cornered, makes work for the coroner.

The trend of population is to cities; the trend of cities is to the political enthronement of the vicious, and the trend of the vicious is to lower drifts of baseness. The cause is alcoholic in the main. The cardiac artery of the municipal body politic is the liquor traffic, pulsing with the rhythm and resistless might of law, pumping torpor into the industries, poverty into the home, paralysis into the spine, and insanity, vice and crime into the brain of citizenship, and never resting, any more than the heart of a man rests on this side of the grave, and all this hellish enginery has piety for its balance-wheel, for I need scarcely remind you that every recognized saloon in the States, except the two in the capitol at Washington, are steadied and regulated by being belted on to the Church as license laws. The figure is no stretch of truth, for the principle of license is an alloy of piety with cowardice, hypocrisy and greed.

A RURAL HOLIDAY.†

VAN and Myra, when they went to the city, would have felt that they were fortunate if they had found and kept places as clerks or seamstresses at six or seven dollars a week. Each night, after ten hours a day standing in a store, they might have climbed wearily to a boarding-house attic, or hall bedroom, which cost them four or five dollars a week. They might have lived there, year in and year out, without any vacation, their wages stopped for every day of illness, almost too exhausted on Sabbath to go to church and appeciate the services.

Instead of this, see Van and Myra in Myra's summer holiday, leaning in the cool of the July evening on their garden gate. Their mother's flower-garden blazes with bloom about them; gladiolas lift up their green swords and vivid flame; the coreopis burns in velvet and gold; the crimson cockscomb flaunts beside the splendor of the tiger-lily; the white rose leans towards the red rose and they mingle their perfume; the hawks-moth flies about the clematis and the honey-suckles. To the left lies the vegetable-garden which has made them such good returns; behind the house are the strawberry-beds, and rows of currants and raspberries, that have filled for them so many baskets and brought them money to conclude paying their debt; everywhere sunflowers spread out their gorgeous shields. Behind the small fruit-acre, in the great poultry-yard, the fowls, and higher up the pigeons, are making an amazing fuss about getting to bed; going down the road, behold the donkey-cart conducted by the joyful Tommy, and loaded with baskets of mushrooms, the first of the season, early and high-priced. To the right another acre where the asparagus-bed now waves feathery plumes dotted with red berries; the long celery-trenches show solid lines of dark green above the well-banked earth; Miss Nancy paces up and down her favorite walk before the hives, and true to a legend of her childhood, in a low recitative "tells the bees" the fortunes of the day. Mrs. Milbury sits under the vine-covered porch, knitting silk stockings for a baby-linen warehouse. Here was peace, plenty, industry, rest, hope, the daily life, the sweet mystifications and surprises of household love.

LIFE'S RESTING PLACES.*

GOD has provided for many pauses along our days when we shall lay down our tasks and unlade our burdens and cease our work. These quiet resting-places are necessary. Our bodies would break down and our minds would become insane if we had to go on forever with life's grind and toil. But night comes, and we leave our shops and stores and offices and find rest in our homes or in pleasant companionships. We lie down in sleep, and in a strange, mysterious way our exhausted life-fountains are replenished. The Sabbath is another of these quiet resting-places which God has provided on our journey. He wants us to drop all our week-day toil and care, and spend the day in such a way that when Monday morning comes we shall be strong for its work.

Most of us find resting-time along our years, seasons when we can drop our ordinary tasks for a time. These are given that in them we may gather new strength for duty. Life's main object is not rest but work. Every day and hour of it is crowded with duty. Life is serious. It is full of responsibility. One cannot waste an hour of it without sin. It must be put to its best possible use. Rest is never, therefore, an object in life—we do not live to rest; or if we do we fail to grasp life's meaning. Rest is not an end but a means. We do not live to rest; we rest to live. We take rest that we may live better, more energetically, more powerfully, more intensely. We sleep after an exhausting day that we may be fresh and strong to-morrow. We spend our Sabbaths in such rest from toil and such spiritual exercises as shall make us ready for another week of service. We take vacations, not merely to have a good time, but to renew our stock of vitality.

A BLIND GIRL TEACHER.

Miss Alice Gordon Gulick relates in the Congregationalist, a touching story about a blind graduate of her girls' school in Spain. She had partially lost her sight when a student, but her companions read the lessons to her and she was able to graduate with honor. Soon after, she became entirely blind, but she did not give up her ambition to teach, and arrangements were made for her to take charge of a school in Sanlular. She makes an excellent teacher and the class is a credit to her.

Princess and Warrior.

How a Bechuana Maid returned Good for Evil.

THE Bechuanas of South Africa are divided into many different nations or tribes. Two of these nations carried on war for some years, each side trying to kill every man, woman or child of the other nation, and practising cruelties too horrid for children to hear. The name of one nation was Barolong and that of the other Bakueni, or people of the Crocodile.

One day the daughter of the Chief of the Bakueni was gathering berries by the river side; she was some way from her father's village, and all alone; she did not think that any enemy was near, but there was a wicked old warrior of the Barolong nation, creeping along the borders as a spy, and he saw her. She had never done him any harm, but he hated her because she was one of the Bakueni. He crept like a coward upon his hands and knees, and when he was within a few steps of her, he sprang upon her like a tiger, and with his assegai cut off both her hands above the wrists. He mocked at her sufferings, and tauntingly asked, "U tla 'mpona kai? Rumela!" "Where shall I see you again? I salute you!" The cries of the poor bleeding girl soon brought her friends from the village, but the wicked old man made off with all speed, and he was far enough away before they reached her.

At length both nations suffered so dreadfully from war and famine, that they wished to make peace. They killed some cattle, and sat down to eat together, and thus made a treaty of peace. Next season the Bakueni had an abundant crop of corn, but the Barolongs were in great distress. Swarms of locusts ate up the produce of their fields and gardens, and they were obliged to beg food from the people they once meant to destroy.

Among others the old warrior suffered extremely, and he set out on a journey to the Bakueni, in order to save his life. He had a little bag containing a little meal, made from pounded locusts. It was all he could get to eat on his way. He took a pipe and tobacco also, and a walking-stick in his hand, but he was nearly starved, and so weak and thin that he could not get on fast. He reached the village of the Chief of the Bakueni, and entered the enclosure before the door of the Chief's house. A young woman was sitting near the door. She was dressed in a tiger-skin kaross, which none but the mofumagaria, or "royal mistress," may wear. The old man addressed his petition to her in the most humble words, and begged her to give him, a poor dog, a little food, as he was dying of hunger. She answered him, "E! U tla 'mpona kai? Rumela!" The old man was stupefied by hunger, and did not remember the words.

A servant was cooking food while this was going on. Her mistress turned to her and told her to put some into a dish; then throwing back her kaross, she uncovered her arms. There were no hands, only stumps left. She was the very girl whose hands this same wicked old man had cut off so long before! She said to her servant, "Give the food to that man; he does not deserve it. It was he who cut off my hands when I was a girl; but I will not revenge myself; he is now starving. He little thought that we should thus meet each other." Then, speaking to the old warrior, she said, "There; take and eat! U tla 'mpona kai? Rumela!" The old warrior stood silent, stupefied with surprise, and then, as he fell at her feet, uttered one word—"Why?" "For the sake of Jesus whom I love!" said the maid.

as one of the reasons for not examining into the Christian religion, the strange argument that he would not investigate into the truth of Christianity because "he never knew a person to do so, who did not afterwards embrace it." A strange reason indeed. The truth of the Gospel of Christ is so evident and overpowering, that any who, with a truthful spirit and an open mind, approach it, become convinced of its truth.

A LESSON FROM THE GYMNASTS.

IF we would conquer in the Christian race, Paul says, we must lay aside every weight. While attending a royal levee in the East, writes a traveler, I saw a party of the king's gymnasts exhibit their strength and skill. Some lifted enormous weights; some, balancing themselves, supported three or four of their fellows, who turned somersaults upon the prostrate man, without his being injured by the sharp-pointed spears that rested just beneath his bare back; and some walked on a single rope at a height that made me dizzy even to look at. Two poles forty feet high were planted about five feet apart, each pole crowned with a small circular platform just large enough to afford standing room for a single man, and the gymnasts threw themselves from one platform to the other as rapidly as they could pass each other in mid-air, coming down on head and feet alternately. It seemed a frightful risk, as the slightest delay on the part of either would have been fatal to both.

But these gymnasts did not enter lightly on the practice of their daring feats. After long years of the most careful training, after patient endurance of fatigue for weeks before the trial came off, they entered the arena with hats, shoes, and jackets laid aside, leaving only the short silken sarong, and the girdle of strong cloth to "gird up the loins" so as to give greater strength for the race. Even rings and bracelets were taken off; and when I inquired the reason, the man said: "Oh, it is a dizzy height, and to fall would bring disgrace and death. So I will not have any needless weight."

Are all those who would run the Christian race, equally wise in laying aside every weight? It is not the same in all persons; but whatever it is, it must be dropped ere the race can be run, or the victory gained.

THE CHANGE OF A WORD.

THE Almighty frequently uses the strangest means to bring about his purposes and stamp conviction on men's hearts. There was a man in Ohio who was perishing for want of a knowledge of him whom to know as Mediator between God and man is eternal life. Not believing there was any God, he had a card written with these words: "God is nowhere," and hung it up in his office. He had a little niece who loved Jesus. One day she visited her uncle's office. After playing a long time with everything she could find within her reach to interest her, she began to look around on the walls, and her eyes fell on the card. Having just begun to read writing, the letters were not so familiar to her but that she had to spell out anything that was written. So she began to spell aloud, G-o-d—God, i-s—is, n-o-w-h-e-r-e.

She could not understand it, and looking down on the floor, repeated the words. She thought she was mistaken. Then she commenced again, so loud that her uncle, who sat at the desk, heard her: G-o-d—God, i-s—is, n-o-w—now, h-e-r-e—here. "That's right," she exclaimed, looking around at her uncle. The arrow struck home. Her uncle became a changed man. He believed in the true God, and sought and found forgiveness of sin.

"WHEN KNEELS THE HEART"

WHEN kneels the heart in silent prayer,
Before the shrine of Christian love;
It feels the balm of comfort there,
From thy great heart, oh Lord of Love.

Then when my life is over bright,
And all is sun and joy anigh;
Make me to see the heavenly light
That flows from thy great throne on high.

CRUCIFIED!

CRUCIFIED! can it be true
That our Lord was crucified?
Bleeding, nailed upon a cross,
Was it thus he died?

Scourged! reviled! and that by man?
Scorned! rejected! He a King?
Slain! by them to whom he'd come,
Life—eternal life—to bring?

And has Christ that deed forgiven?
Suffers he man yet to live?
Still his pardon and his love,
Will he fully, freely give?

Wondrous story! ne'er before
Has so strange a one been told:
O! what marvelous depths of love,
Does this tale of Christ unfold.

O! how merciful to man,
Must the blessed Saviour be;
For our ransom is his blood,
That was shed on Calvary.

S. WATROUS HOVER.

THE GOSPEL FOUNTAIN

DURING a revival in a Western town, a man who had been very worldly-minded was awakened, but for some time concealed his feelings even from his wife, who was a praying woman. She left him, one evening, in charge of his little girl of three years of age. After her departure his anxiety of mind became so great that he walked the room in his agony. The little girl noticed his agitation, and inquired, "What ails you father?" He replied, "Nothing," and endeavored to quiet his feelings, but all in vain.

The child looked up sympathizingly in his face, and inquired with all the artlessness and simplicity of childhood, "Father, if you were dry, wouldn't you go and get a drink of water?"

The father started as if a voice from heaven had fallen on his ear. He though of his thirsty soul famishing for the waters of life; he thought of that living fountain opened in the Gospel; he believed, and straightway fell at the Saviour's feet. From that hour he dates the beginning of a new life.

CONVERSION OF A SYRIAN PRIEST.

IN an interesting letter to the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, Dr. H. H. Jessup gives an account of the conversion of a priest of the Greek Church in one of the Syrian villages. Dr. Jessup had heard of the man before as bearing an excellent character, and when he called on him the personal impression made by his guest seemed to confirm all that had been said in his behalf. The man's story was to the effect that he had entered the priesthood and become a monk when only a lad, and that he had been restless and unhappy ever since, and that during the last six years he has had a fierce battle with his conscience which has given him no rest, and that he can now stand it no longer. He states that for a long time he has been convinced of the truth of Protestant teaching, although he has hesitated to take the final step of separation from former associations. Dr. Jessup writes that in the course of the conversation the man said with much earnestness: "I intend to-day to shave off this beard which grew as a papal beard, and throw it away with the black hat and black garments, and let this outward change indicate in a poor way what has already taken place in my heart." The man did not ask for financial aid, but sought guidance as to what he should do until the storm which was gathering had exhausted its force. He would probably leave the country for a time, and then it is his present expectation to return to work for the Master.

Ninety Years of Well-doing.

Dr. Charles Butler's Long Life has been Made a Blessing to Himself and to Others —A Remarkable Christian Career.

OUNG at ninety-three! With the face, figure and alertness of a man of fifty, with an eye that is as readily kindled to enthusiasm as though its possessor had not yet reached the midway stage of human life, and with mental faculties unimpaired, such is the picture presented by Charles Butler, LL.D., a resident of New York City, who came in with the century and has spent a long lifetime in doing good. The story of his career possesses an interest for every one who loves Christian character and uprightness.

Mr. Butler was born at Kinderhook Landing, Columbia County, N.Y., in 1800, during the time when Thomas Jefferson was serving his first term as President. His life has been an extremely busy one. In his early youth he studied law under Martin Van Buren. Subsequently he was a junior partner in Mr. Van Buren's firm, together with his eldest brother, Benjamin F. Butler, who became General Jackson's Attorney General. He was the Assistant District Attorney in Genesee county when the noted Morgan ease came up for trial. After the financial panic of 1837 which swept the country, he was called in to adjust the troubles between the State of Indiana and her domestic and foreign bondholders. This work of settlement continued over thirty years. He performed a like service for Michigan. He recalls with a smile the fact that sixty years ago he was in the West where the city of Chicago now stands. It was Fort Dearborn then, and merely a morass with the lands of the Sac and Fox Indians nearby. He went there at the suggestion of General Winfield Scott, and after looking around he became impressed with the probabilities of the place, and predicted that Chicago would yet become the greatest and most important inland city in the Union.

Mr. Butler became identified with men of the highest social and financial standing, and was soon engaged in most extensive business operations. Amid all this success, his religious training and upright nature kept him aloof from many of the pitfalls into which many stumble, who are too eager in the chase for worldly welfare and preferment. Temperate, studious and observant of everything that related to the general progress of the world, and the advancement of mankind, he contributed in many ways to the development of this nation and its resources, and aided in opening up new channels of trade with different parts of the world. In 1853, Wabash University, Indiana conferred upon him the degree of LL.D., in consideration of his valuable services to the State and in behalf of education. He has been a member of the Council of the University of New York since 1836, and has been the personal friend and encourager of many of the distinguished men who have been connected with that institution during more than half a century. He is now President of the corporation. He endowed the chair of Biblical Theology in Union Seminary in the sum of $100,000, and in 1889 added $100,000 to the Endowment Fund of the New York University in memory of his brother and his son. He was also one of the founders of the Protestant Half-Orphan Asylum of New York, and has been connected as patron, founder, or otherwise with many other noble institutions, educational and charitable. Quite recently, the New York University conferred upon him the degree of LL.D., which the Indiana University had done forty years before.

Mr. Butler is one of the phenomenal men of New York, not only by reason of his age, but for his continued activity in well-doing at a time when the very few who live so long are usually within the shadow of the tomb. His cheerfulness and trust are marked qualities.

Of a family of seven, he has only one daughter left and his wife died many years ago. "We are alone," he says, "left to do what good we can in this world." Truly, he has realized, in his own personal experience, the promise to the man who followed after divine wisdom rather than the things of the world: "Happy is the man that findeth wisdom. Length of days is in her right hand and in her left hand riches and honor. She is a tree of life to them that lay hold upon her." (Proverbs 3 : 13, 16, 17.)

A LESSON FROM A TREE.

"SEEING a tree grow somewhat irregular in a very neat orchard," says Mr. Flavel, "I told the owner it was a pity that that tree should stand there, and that if it were mine, I would root it up, and thereby reduce the orchard to an exact uniformity." He replied "That he rather regarded the fruit than the form, and that this slight inconvenience was abundantly preponderated by more considerable advantage. This tree, which you would root up, hath yielded me more fruit than many of those trees, which have nothing else to recommend them but their regular situation." "I could not," adds Mr. Flavel, "but yield to the reason of this answer, and could wish it had been spoken so loud that all our conformity men had heard it, who would not stick to root up many hundreds of the best learners in the Lord's orchard, because they stand not in exact order with other more comfortable but less beneficial trees, who destroy the fruit to preserve the form."

FRIENDS' MISSION, BEYROUT.

IN a letter from Theodore Waldmeer, who is laboring at Beyrout, under the auspices of the Society of Friends, is the following: The mission work here is now a good deal increased. More workers have come out from England. A new regular mission station at Bas el Mater has been organized, and a large boys' and girls' school has been opened there. Weekly meetings for men and women are regularly held. Two English ladies with four native teachers are carrying on the work there. In our centre mission station, Ain Salaam, all is going on satisfactorily. Our medical departments are a very great power for good. Our medical missionary, Dr. Manassah, is continually engaged, and the four English ladies, who are helping him in the dispensary and hospital and medical visits, have a great deal to do. It is wonderful how great a change has taken place here in this part of Lebanon. When I came in 1873, I found the people very wild and fanatical; some of them showed me the place where they burnt eighty-five Bibles, and expelled the mssionaries, to frighten me and to let me know that they could do the same to me also. The first few years I had hard work here, but I was sure that the Lord sent me to this place, and that he would give the needed strength to bear all opposition and trials. Now, I am glad to say, the villages, houses, and hearts of the people on Mount Lebanon are open to our preaching."

The Peary and Nansen Expeditions Sail for the Arctic in the "Falcon" and the "Fram" — Perilous Undertakings — The Two Plans Contrasted.

SO full of dark histories of peril and privation and heroic self-sacrifice is the record of Arctic exploration, that men experience a thrill of mingled wonder and admiration on hearing of any new enterprise which seeks fame at the risk of meeting death instead, amid the lonely polar ice-fields. Recently, however, the old-time spirit of daring seems to have revived, for a number of expeditions to the Arctic have been planned within the last two years. Notable among them have been those arranged by Lieut. Ryder of the Danish Navy to East Greenland, the Berlin Geographical Society to West Greenland, the Peary expedition to NorthGreenland and the Nansen expedition to the much-sought-for and still evasive location of the Pole. The two last-named have a special interest at the present time for the readers of THE CHRISTIA HERALD who, in former issues of this journal have been made acquainted with the past careers of these two brave navigators, who recently set out again for the Arctic seas.

Lieutenant R. E. Peary is a civil engineer of the United States Navy, cool, brave, and an enthusiastic lover of the Arctic. When he sailed on his first Arctic voyage, two summers ago, in the Kite, he was accompanied by his wife, who bore up amid the dangers and discomforts of the expedition as bravely as any member of the party. Their safe return and the valuable scientific results that were secured by the expedition, determined the young American explorer on a second venture for which he began to make preparations on a much broader scale. These having been completed after many months of labor, he sailed in the last week of June from New York harbor, in the bark-rigged steamer, Falcon, for the Arctic Seas.

The Falcon would not at first glance convey an impression of great strength or special fitness for a Polar cruise; yet she is unquestionably just the ship for the purpose. She is an old-fashioned steam whaling bark, built at St. Johns, N.F., and has a speed, with steam and sail combined, of nine knots an hour. There are two barrels at the top of the foremast and mainmast from which a lookout can be kept, either for seals or for icebergs. She carries a crew of eighteen men; the Captain, Henry Bartlett and the first and second officers, Edw. Tracey and Joseph Churchill, are all experienced Arctic voyagers. All the crew are picked seamen, hardy, alert, and used to danger on the deep. Besides his crew, Lieutenant Peary has half a dozen Esquimaux dogs, eight Mexican burros from the Rocky Mountains, and a case of carrier pigeons; the first for sledging purposes, the burros for draught, and the birds for conveying messages where the climate is not too rigorous to permit of their use. The general outfit includes a plentiful supply of firearms and ammunition, a library, "sleeping bags," reindeer suits and a great variety of other articles. Provisions sufficient to last for several years are also stowed away on the Falcon, and in view of so generous a commissariat, the party is not likely to be called upon to face the danger of starvation—a peril greatly to be dreaded in the inhospitable regions of the Northern seas.

THE STEAMER "FALCON," BOUND FOR THE ARCTIC SEAS.

With Portraits of Dr Frithiof Nansen and Lieutenant R. E. Peary

Lieutenant Peary's plan is to sail to Bowdoin Bay in Murchison Sound, to a point somewhat east of the camp he occupied during his exploration last year. On reaching this point, the crew will proceed to the construction of a house which they have shipped in sections on the Falcon. This building, when completed, will be so stout, snug and warm as to defy the bleakest polar breezes and the sifting, lance-like snows. It can be put together in six hours. This will be the headquarters of the expedition and the starting-point of all efforts by the party at further exploration northward. These efforts may be conducted either on snowshoes, or by sledges, as circumstances permit, and an attempt may be made to utilize balloon power, should the Esquimaux dogs prove unequal to the task. Peary expects that his work will be completed in two years from the date of sailing from New York, and he will then be ready to return home.

It would be difficult to foreshadow, even in the remotest sense, what the outcome of this latest Arctic venture, if successful, may prove to be. When Lieutenant Peary set sail in the Kite for the Polar seas in the summer of 1891, under the auspices of the Philadelphia Academy of Natural Sciences, he indicated his purpose of making "the first attempt to reach a high latitude in Greenland," by overland travel. His party arrived early in the summer of that year at Whale Sound, made a tour of its islands and shores, and also of Inglefield Gulf, and then set out for the interior of Greenland. Many months were spent exploring the interior and especially the east coast, and the result was that valuable contributions to geographical, geological, and ethnological science have been made through Lieutenant Peary's careful and painstaking observations. Although the party was at no time confronted by perils of such magnitude as have frequently beset explorers in the past, yet it had to meet and overcome many obstacles and not a few really serious dangers. Almost at the outset, the commander of the expedition had the misfortune to break his leg. It soon healed, however, and the plucky leader was able to set out in person with his hardy little band for the real purpose of the expedition. Game was plentiful, and all the calculations of the commander had been so sagaciously made and every probable contingency so wisely provided against that the following summer found them all alive and well, with one exception. The sole exception was the geologist of the party, John Verhoeff, who, disregarding warnings, risked an exploration alone, and is believed to have been engulfed in one of the thousand treacherous crevasses found in every Arctic ice-field. Lieutenant Peary modestly disclaims any purpose of achieving sensational results in the line of great discoveries, on his present exploration. The main result of his first arctic journey, as he holds, was to demonstrate to the scientific world that the true highway to the north coast of Greenland, and, still northward, to the Pole itself, is the vast inland ice-cap or crown, whose limits are indicated by the Greenland Coast. This he has not only shown conclusively, but he has changed the map of Greenland, made the quickest sledge journeys ever accomplished, and done what no other arctic explorer has attempted—passed fourteen days at an altitude of eight thousand feet above sea level. Such heroism might well have been regarded as foolhardiness, had it not been accompanied by rich and abundant scientific results, which showed that Peary never for a moment lost sight of the inspiring determination to make his journey serve some useful purpose to mankind. What he accomplished in the Kite he may now, with fuller experience, be reasonably expected to surpass in the Falcon.

Almost simultaneous with the Peary expedition from this side of the globe, is the sailing of the Norwegian explorer Dr. Frithiof Nansen, from Christiania, in a new ship specially built for arctic exploration. Dr. Nansen made a remark-

COMFORT FOR BUSINESS MEN.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., Founded on the Text: Isa. 40: 2, "Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem."

WHAT an awful six weeks in commercial circles! The crashing of banks from San Francisco to New York, and from ocean to ocean. The complete uncertainty that has halted all styles of business for three months, and the pressure of the money-market for the last year have put all bargain-makers at their wit's end. Some of the best men in the land have faltered; men whose hearts are enlisted in every good work; and whose hands have blessed every great charity. The Church of God can afford to extend to them her sympathies, and plead before heaven with all availing prayer. The schools such men have established, the churches they have built, the asylums and beneficent institutions they have fostered, will be their eulogy long after their banking institutions are forgotten. Such men can never fail. They have their treasures in banks that never break, and will be millionaires forever. The stringency of the money-market, I am glad to say, begins to relax. May the wisdom of Almighty God come down upon our National Legislature at their convening next month in Washington, and such results be reached as shall restore confidence, and revive trade, and multiply prosperities! Yet, not only now in the time of financial disaster, but all through life our active business people have a struggle, and I think it will be appropriate and useful for me to talk about their trials and try to offer some curative prescriptions.

In the first place, I have to remark that a great many of our business men feel ruinous trials and temptations coming to them from small and limited capital in business. It is everywhere understood that it takes now three or four times as much to do business well, as once it did. Once, a few hundred dollars were turned into goods—the merchant would be his own store sweeper, his own salesman, his own book-keeper; he would manage all the affairs himself, and everything would be net profit. Wonderful changes have come; costly apparatus, extensive advertising, exorbitant store rents, heavy taxation, expensive agencies, are only parts of the demand made upon our commercial men; and when they have found themselves in such circumstances with small capital, they have sometimes been tempted to run against the rocks of moral and financial destruction. This temptation of limited capital has ruined men in two ways. Sometimes they have shrunk down under the temptation. They have yielded the battle before the first shot was fired. At the first hard gun they surrendered. Their knees knocked together at the fall of the auctioneer's hammer. They blanched at the financial peril. They did not understand that there is such a thing as heroism in merchandise, and that there are Waterloos of the counter, and that a man can fight as heroic battle with the sword than he can with the yardstick. Their souls melted in them because sugars were up when they wanted to buy, and down when they wanted to sell, and unsaleable goods were on the shelf, and bad debts in their ledger. The gloom of their countenances overshadowed even their dry goods and groceries. Despondency, coming from limited capital, blasted them. Others have felt it in a different way. They have said: "Here I have been trudging along. I have been trying to be honest all these years. I find it is of no use. Now it is make or break." The small craft that could have stood the stream, is put out beyond the light-house, on the great sea of speculation. Stocks are the dice with which he gambles. He bought for a few dollars vast tracts of western land. Some man at the East, living on a fat homestead, meets this gambler of fortune, and is persuaded to trade off his estate here, for lots in a Western city with large avenues, and costly palaces, and lake steamers smoking at the wharves, and rail trains coming down with lightning speed from every direction. There it is all on paper! The city has never been built, nor the railroads constructed, but everything points that way, and the thing will be done as sure as you live. And that is the process by which many have been tempted, through limitation of capital, into labyrinths from which they could not be extricated. I would not want to chain honest enterprise. I would not want to block up any of the avenues for honest accumulation that open before young men. On the contrary, I would like to cheer them on and rejoice when they reach the goal; but when there are such multitudes of men going to ruin for this life and the life that is to come, through wrong notions of what are lawful spheres of enterprise, it is the duty of the ministers of religion, and the friends of all young men, to utter a plain, emphatic, unmistakable protest. These are the influences that drown men in destruction and perdition.

Again: a great many of our business men are tempted to over-anxiety and care. You know that nearly all commercial businesses are over-done in this day. Smitten with the love of quick gain, our cities are crowded with men resolved to be rich at all hazards. They do not care how money comes. Our best merchants are thrown into competition with men of more means and less conscience, and if an opportunity of accumulation be neglected one hour, some one else picks it up. From January to December the struggle goes on. Night gives no quiet to limbs tossing in restlessness, nor to a brain that will not stop thinking. The dreams are harrowed by imaginary loss, and flushed with imaginary gains. Even the Sabbath cannot dam back the tide of anxiety; for this wave of worldliness dashes clear over the churches, and leaves its foam on Bibles and prayer-books. Men who are living on salaries, or by the culture of the soil, cannot understand the wear and tear of body and mind to which our merchants are subjected, when they do not know but that their livelihood and their business honor are dependent upon the uncertainties of the next hour. This excitement of the brain, this corroding care of the heart, this strain of effort that exhausts the spirit, sends a great many of our best men, in mid-life, into the grave. They find that Wall Street does not end at the East River. It ends at Greenwood! Their life dashed out against money safes. They go with their store on their backs. They trudge, like camels, sweating, from Aleppo to Damascus. They make their life a crucifixion. Standing behind desks and counters banished from the fresh air, weighed down by carking cares, they are so many suicides. Oh! I wish I could, to-day, rub out some of these lines of care; that, I could lift some of the burdens from the heart; that I could give relaxation to some of these worn muscles. It is time for you to begin to take it a little easier. Do your best, and then trust God for the rest. Do not fret. God manages all the affairs of your life, and he manages them for the best. Consider the lilies—they always have robes. Behold the fowls of the air—they always have nests. Take a long breath. Bethink, betimes, that God did not make you for a pack-horse. Dig yourselves out from among the hogsheads and the shelves, and in the light of the holy Sabbath-day resolve that you will give to the winds your fears and your fretfulness, and your distresses. You brought nothing into the world, and it is very certain you can carry nothing out. Having food and raiment be therewith content. The merchant came home from the store. There had been great disaster there. He opened the front door, and said, in the midst of his family circle: "I am ruined. Everything is gone. I am all ruined." His wife said: "I am left;" and the little child threw up its hands, and said: "Papa, I am here." The aged grandmother, seated in the room, said: "Then you have all the promises of God, beside, John." And he burst into tears, and said: "God forgive me, that I have been so ungrateful. I find I have a great many things left. God forgive me."

Again I remark, that many of our business men are tempted to neglect their home duties. How often it is that the store and the home seem to clash, but there ought not to be any collision. It is often the case that the father is the mere treasurer of the family, a sort of agent to see that they have dry-goods and groceries. The work of family government he does not touch. Once or twice in a year he calls the children up on a Sabbath afternoon when he has a half hour he does not exactly know what to do with, and in that half hour he disciplines the children, and chides them and corrects their faults, and gives them a great deal of good advice, and then wonders all the rest of the year that his children do not do better, when they have the wonderful advantage of that semi-annual castigation. The family table, which ought to be the place for pleasant discussion and cheerfulness, often becomes the place of perilous expedition. If there be any blessing asked at all, it is cut off at both ends, and with the hand on the carving knife. He counts on his fingers, making estimates in the interstices of the repast. The work done, the hat goes to the head, and he starts down the street, and before the family have risen from the table, he has bound up another bundle of goods, and says to the customer: "Anything more I can do for you to-day, sir?" A man has more responsibilities than those which are discharged by putting competent instructors over his children, and giving them a drawing-master and music-teacher. The physical culture of the child will not be attended to, unless the father looks to it. He must sometimes lose his dignity. He must unlimber his joints. He must sometimes lead them out to their sports and games. The parent who cannot forget the severe duties of life sometimes, to fly the kite, and trundle the hoop, and chase the ball, and jump the rope with his children, ought never to have been tempted out of a crusty and unredeemable solitariness. If you want to keep your children away from places of sin, you can only do it by making your home attractive. You may preach sermons, and advocate reforms, and denounce wickedness, and yet your children will be captivated by the glittering saloon of sin, unless you can make your home a brighter place than any other place on earth to them. Oh! gather all charms into your house. If you can afford it, bring books, and pictures, and cheerful entertainments to the household. But, above all, teach those children, not by half-an-hour twice a year on the Sabbath-day, but day after day; and every day teach them that religion is a great gladness, that throws chains of gold about the neck, that it takes no spring from the foot, no blitheness from the heart, no sparkle from the eye, no ring from the laughter; but that "her ways are ways of pleasantness and all her paths are peace." I sympathize with the work being done in many of our cities, by which beautiful rooms are set apart by our Young Men's Christian Associations, and I pray God to prosper them in all things. But I tell you there is something back of that and before that. We need more happy, consecrated cheerful Christian homes in America.

Again, I remark that a great many of our business men are tempted to put the attainment of money above the value of the soul. It is a grand thing to have plenty of money. The more you get of it, the better, if it come honestly and go usefully. For the lack of it, sickness dies without medicine, and hunger finds its coffin in the empty bread tray, and nakedness shivers for lack of clothes and fire. When I hear a man in canting tirade against money—a Christian man—as though it had no possible use on earth and he had no interest in it, I come almost to think that the heaven that would be appropriate for him, would be an everlasting poor-house! While, my friends, we do admit there is such a thing as a lawful use of money—a profitable use of money—let us recognize also the fact, that money cannot satisfy a man's soul, that it cannot glitter in the dark valley, that it cannot pay our fare across the Jordan of death, that it cannot unlock the gate of heaven. There are men in all occupations who seem to act as though they thought a pack of bonds and mortgages could be traded off for a title to heaven, and as though gold would be a lawful tender in that place where it is so common that they make pavements out of it. Salvation by Christ is the only salvation. Treasures in heaven are the only incorruptible treasures. Have you ever ciphered out in the rule of Loss and Gain the sum: "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his soul?" However fine your apparel, the winds of death will flutter it like rags. Homespun and a threadbare coat have sometimes been the shadow of coming robes made white in the blood of the Lamb. The pearl of great price is worth more than any gem you can bring from the ocean, than Australian or Brazilian mines strung in one carcanet. Seek after God; find his righteousness, and all shall be well here; all shall be well hereafter.

But I must have a word with those who during the present commercial calamities have lost heavily, or perhaps lost all their estate. If a man lose his property at thirty or forty years of age, it is only a sharp discipline generally, by which later he comes to larger success. It is all folly for a man to sit down in mid-life discouraged. The marshals of Napoleon came to their commander and said: "We have lost the battle, and we are being cut to pieces." Napoleon took his watch from his pocket, and said: "It is only two o'clock in the afternoon. You have lost that battle, but we have time enough to win another. Charge upon the foe!" Though the meridian of life has passed with you, and you have been routed in many a conflict, give not up in discouragement. There are victories yet for you to gain. But sometimes monetary disaster comes to a man when there is something in his age, or something in his health, or something in his surroundings, which make him know well that he will never get up again. In 1857 it was estimated that, for many years previous to that time, annually there had been 30,000 failures in the United States. Many of those persons never recovered from the misfortune. But let me give a word of comfort in passing. The sheriff may sell you out of many things, but there are some things of which he cannot sell you out. He cannot sell out your health. He cannot sell out your family. He cannot sell out your Bible. He cannot sell out your God. He cannot sell out your heaven! You have more than you have lost. Sons and daughters of God, children of an eternal and all-loving Father, mourn not when your property goes. The world is yours, and life is yours, and death is yours, and immortality is yours, and thrones of imperial grandeur are yours, and rivers of gladness are yours, and shining mansions are yours, and God is yours. The eternal God has sworn it, and every time you doubt it, you charge the King of heaven and earth with perjury. Instead of complaining how hard you have it, go home, take up your Bible full of promises, get down on your knees before God and thank him for what you have, instead of spending so much time in complaining about what you have not.

Some of you remember the shipwreck of the Central America. This noble steamer, had, I think, about five hundred passengers aboard. Suddenly the storm came, and the surges trampled the decks and swung into the hatches, and there went up a hundred-voiced death-shriek. The foam on the jaw of the wave. The pitching of the steamer as though it were leaping a mountain. The dismal flare of the signal rockets. The long cough of the steam pipes. The hiss of the extinguished furnaces. The walking of God on the wave! The steamer went not down without a struggle. As the passengers stationed themselves in rows, to bale out the vessel, hark to the thump of the buckets, as men unused to toil, with blistered hands and strained muscle, tug for their lives. There is a sail seen against the sky. The flash of the distress gun sounded, its voice is heard not, for it is choked in the louder booming of the sea. A few passengers escaped; but the steamer gave one great lurch and was gone! So there are some men who sail on prosperously in life. All's well, all's well. But at last, some financial disaster comes: a euroclydon. Down they go! the bottom of this commercial sea strewn with shattered hulks. But because your property goes, do not let your soul go. Though all else perish, save that; for I have to tell you of a more stupendous shipwreck than that which I have just mentioned. God launched this world six thousand years ago. It has been going on under freight of mountains and immortals; but one day it will stagger at the cry of fire. The timbers of rock will burn, the mountains flame like masts, and the clouds like sails in the judgment hurricane. Then God shall take the passengers off the deck, and from the berths those who have long been asleep in Jesus, and he will set them far beyond the reach of storm and peril. But how many shall go down: that will never be known, until it shall be announced one day in heaven; the shipwreck of a world! Oh! my dear hearers, whatever you lose, though your houses go, though your lands go, though all your earthly possessions perish, may God Almighty, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, save all your souls.

The Marsovan Persecution.

The Turkish Attacks on the American College in Armenia—The Mock Trial—Prof. Thoumain and his Wife.

A CABLE dispatch received on July 5, gives the welcome news that Professors Thoumain and Kayayan, the colleagues of Dr. Herrick at Marsovan, have been pardoned by the Sultan of Turkey. As was stated in these columns on July 5, the two professors with seventeen other Christians had been sentenced to death. They appealed to a higher court but the sentence was confirmed. The British government, however, interested itself in the case and having satisfied itself of the innocence of the condemned men, made so earnest a protest to the Sultan that he has changed the death sentence in the case of the two chief prisoners to one of banishment and has consented to institute an inquiry in the case of the other seventeen. As the two professors were employed in an American college, the duty of interceding on their behalf should have been performed by our own government. Happily the English government did not stand on formalities, but exerted itself as if the condemned men had been entitled by nationality to its good offices and has succeeded in saving their lives.

The outrage which so nearly resulted in the death of these two men is a shocking specimen of Turkish misrule. For nearly a year past, Dr. Herrick has been harrassed by the jealousy and hatred of the Pashas whom the Sultan made governors of Asia Minor. The work he has been doing under the auspices of the American Board at Marsovan has been remarkably successful. In the college for men, where natives are taught, there are about 125 students, many of whom are preparing to become evangelists among their own people. In the adjoining girls' college there are about a hundred students. The fame of the education imparted in these institutions has spread thoughout the populous district to the south of the Black Sea, and has attracted many pupils during the twenty-eight years of their existence. The fact, however, that so many students who went there for a secular education passed into the Theological Seminary connected with the college and devoted themselves to missionary work, did not escape the notice of the Moslem Pashas, and they resolved to close the institution if possible. The first step was to notify Dr. Herrick that American missionaries had no right to teach in Asia Minor, and that the place would be closed unless he secured a special licence from the Sultan. Dr Herrick declined to apply to Constantinople for a license, as he had full authority under the treaty to conduct the colleges, and an application for a special licence would be a practical admission that the authority under which he was acting was invalid. Reference to the United States Legation at Constantinople confirmed Dr. Herrick's claim and he was urged by our minister to maintain the stand he had taken.

Thus foiled, the Turkish Governor resorted to artifice. On the night of Jan. 5, a number of seditious posters appeared on the walls of public buildings throughout Asia Minor calling upon the people to rise in arms against their Turkish oppressors. Two of these posters were affixed to the outer gates of the American College. They were promptly torn down by the college people, but not until they had been seen by a Turkish official who was so near at the time as to give rise to the suspicion that he had either put the posters there himself or had seen who did put them there. Disturbances took place and the two Professors Thoumain and Kayayan were arrested on the charge of issuing the posters and inciting a rebellion. Access to them was refused and the Pasha refused to accept bail. Four days later the new girls' school just erected at a cost of $2,200 was mysteriously burned down in the night. But for a fortunate change in the direction of the wind the flames would have spread to the other buildings, and all the colleges, schools and missionaries' residences would have been burned to the ground. There was little doubt as to the identity of the perpetrators of the crime. There was no one near the burned building when the fire was discovered but Turkish soldiers and officials, who ought not to have been there at that hour. The Governor, however, made the ridiculous charge that the college authorities had themselves started the fire to excite the people, and to cover up the fact of arms being concealed in the building.

United States Consul Jewett lodged a formal complaint as to the burning of American property and the Turkish government courteously expressed its regret and paid compensation. The Sultan also ordered an investigation, but with that curious propensity to injustice which characterizes Turkish rule, he chose as judge the governor who is suspected of instigating all the trouble. The result of the so-called investigation was, as our readers know, the condemnation of the two professors and seventeen other Christians to death and many others to various terms of imprisonment.

"The process and trial," writes Mr. Kayayan, "was only a formal thing. The four members of the Court were divided, one wholly refused to sign the process; we have been condemned by a majority of one vote.' On several points the judicial authorities even failed to observe the provisions of the Ottoman Penal Code. For instance, the Governor, Abdin Pasha, who is not invested with any judicial power, compelled several of the accused to accept counsel appointed by him for their defense, and many of the witnesses summoned to give evidence in the prisoners' favor were not allowed to make their depositions. The leading Pasha at Marsovan, who is not only opposed to Christians Armenians, but to Armenians generally, is an ex-brigand, a Circassian who has been found guilty of murder by a Turkish court and pardoned from a sentence of imprisonment for life,' in order that he might be placed in authority in the district. The Turkish government has again and again pledged itself to protect its subjects in the exercise of religious liberty, but the prejudice against the Armenians, and particularly the educated and Christian Armenians, is strong from the fact that their advanced knowledge and wider civilization will in time ensure them the highest offices in the State, at present held to a large extent by such men as Khosrey Pasha.

Dr. Herrick went to London, as soon as sentence of death was pronounced against his two colleagues, to enlist the intercession of the English government. At a public meeting in the city, he expressed gratitude for the interest and sympathy shown by British friends on behalf of the condemned prisoners. He declared that the American missionaries in the East, and especially the authorities of the College, had not ceased to do all that was possible in seeking to move the Turkish, American, British and German governments to action, for the release of those of the prisoners of whose innocence of any political crime they were positively assured. He had cherished the hope that the Turkish authorities would acquit the two professors, whose innocence he had emphatically asserted to all governments concerned. Besides those condemned to death there were others sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment—a worse fate than even death itself. Among these was one of their pastors, and decided action ought to be taken with respect to them. "The real reason of the persecution," says a press correspondent in Turkey, "is that the Turks have chosen to misinterpret a great Evangelical movement which is now going on in Armenia, principally under the influence of American missionaries. The movement is in the nature of a deep religious revival, and the attempt to bring the scattered congregations into union with one another, and with the old Armenian Church, has driven the Turks into a panic of suspicious terror."

Prof. Garabed Thoumain, whose portrait, with that of his devoted wife appears here, is a native of Marsovan. He was noticed, while a boy in the village school, by a Roman Catholic monk of Lebanon, who was impressed with his intelligence and believed that it would pay to give him a good education. But as the boy learned, he became convinced of the errors of his teacher and declared himself a Protestant. He made his way to Lausanne in Switzerland and begged to be received into the Protestant College. He was admitted and at the end of his course graduated with honors and was solemnly ordained as a missionary to his own people in Armenia. During his college course he fell in love with Mdle. de Visme, the beautiful daughter of a Huguenot pastor at Lausanne. They were married and she has been a most valuable helper in his work. At the time of M. Thoumain's arrest, his wife was collecting funds to build a hospital for the sick poor of Marsovan, whose deplorable condition had touched her heart.

PAUL AT EPHESUS.

S. S. Lesson for July 30 Acts 19: 1-12. Golden Text, John 16: 13. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

JERUSALEM knew not the time of her visitation. (Luke 19: 44). Through the preaching of Paul, and other of his servants, God gave to other cities than Jerusalem a day of visitation; a time of the presence and power of God in a marked and unusual way. He works in the same way still. A time of visitation was being prepared for the city of Ephesus; and it is more than probable that before the ministry of Paul at Corinth had come to an end, the burden of Ephesus was laid upon him. Those who know "the burden of the Lord" will understand why, when the spirit of God led Paul to leave Corinth, he should have left Priscilla and Aquila, not in Syria, although he first traveled there, but in Ephesus, from whence he went to Jerusalem. When a man's will is given up to the Lord, and he has no desire or choice as to his movements or his sphere of work, when he ceases to think himself important or necessary to God or to the Church of Christ,—God gives him an indescribable sense of liberty to do such and such a thing, to go to such and such a place, while he will shut up the way to another and give him just as strong a consciousness that that is not the way. It is not impulse; there is nothing like excitement in it, it is the still small voice of God by his Spirit. Ephesus was on the Lord's heart, and he laid it on Paul's heart. Yet Paul was in no hurry, "He that believeth shall not make haste." If God could afford to wait, so could Paul.

When God is about to visit a place he makes all ready. Men would smile at the idea that two simple tradespeople, like Aquila and his wife, could, by their very presence in Ephesus, have anything to do in preparing the Lord's way in that city. But God sees otherwise. In the midst of prevailing idolatry here were two temples of the Holy Ghost, seeing everything in the light of God, acknowledging him in everything which happened, bearing things and people upon their hearts in prayer, and bearing witness in their unworldly lives that God was indeed with them. When God thought upon Ephesus, there were two who would reciprocate his thoughts; the God who seeks spiritual worshippers found those two in the midst of the heathen city, and already the nucleus of a Christian church was formed by one Christ-like praying man and wife.

Probably this quiet couple little knew how much they told for in the eyes of God, and they may have thought that their life at Ephesus was almost useless; and yet there was the strongest evidence that they were increasing in knowledge of God, because, when an occasion came, they were found ready to serve. A certain Jew, a very gifted man, came to Ephesus, a man "mighty in the Scriptures" but knowing only the baptism of John. With unusual power he could teach men to repent, and "he spake boldly in the synagogue." Now was the time for God's two patient witnesses. They had no such gifts as Apollos, but they knew the way of the Lord as he did not. Something about their very presence must have inspired him with confidence, he accepted of their faithful ministry, and learned of them the way of God more perfectly; and, though Paul had not yet returned to Ephesus, God's visitation in mercy and peace had already begun in the city; Apollos mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly, showing by the Scriptures that Jesus was the Christ.

The time came when Apollos left Ephesus to follow up the work of God by Paul at Corinth, and Paul, having visited the churches of Asia Minor, came to Ephesus. His spiritual discernment soon discovered among certain disciples a most important lack, and he put to them the question: "Did ye receive the Holy Ghost when ye believed? They said unto him: Nay, we did not so much as hear whether the Holy Ghost was given. Unto what then were ye baptized? Unto John's baptism." (R.V.) This explained matters to Paul, and he explained to these disciples: John baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying unto the people that they should believe on him which should come after him, that is on Jesus.

These men only needed light, their minds were in darkness about the Holy Ghost, but their hearts were right, they were baptized in the name of Jesus. Paul laid his hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost and spake with tongues and prophesied. But it is a question and an earnest one for all Christians, and more especially for such as are looking for the coming of the Lord: Are you living under the conscious leading and government of the Holy Ghost, or are you still in the spirit of John's baptism, in the atmosphere of repenting and doing work meet for repentance, but looking forward to, instead of living in the power of that salvation, that loosing from the condemnation and power of sin and self which is in Christ Jesus, and which is made real to you by the indwelling of the Holy Ghost? The Holy Spirit is given to work in us, and what Jesus Christ has wrought out for us by his death upon the Cross. We can no more do a divine thing than we can create a world, but the Holy Ghost dwelling in us makes us "partakers of the Divine Nature," and uses us as instruments of righteousness to God, to speak out his divine words, to think his divine thoughts, to pray the prayers which proceed from him, and to do divine actions. He transforms us into conformity to the image of God's Son, by making us see in the the mirror of Scripture the glory of our Lord, and as he occupies us with him, he transforms us into the same image from glory to glory.

The tide of God's visitation rose in Ephesus, when these twelve disciple were filled with the Holy Ghost, and Paul (with these men and Aquila and Priscilla, to bear him up in prayer, and to prove by their transformed lives the truths which he taught), spake boldly in the synagogue for the space of three months. But here in Ephesus, as well as elsewhere, the division must come, light and darkness, life and death must be separated: "They have not all believed the Gospel. "When divers were hardened, and believed not, but spake evil of [the Way, R. V.] before the multitude, he departed from them, and separated the disciples, disputing daily in the school of one Tyrannus." O how terrible was the judicial blindness which fell upon the Jews after their rejection of their Messiah! Truly all who would might be saved, but the larger number came under that terrible denunciation, three times quoted in the New Testament: "Hear ye indeed, but understand not; and see ye indeed, but perceive not. Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and shut their eyes; lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and convert and be healed."

For two years longer, Paul and his companions labored in Ephesus: it was indeed a time of visitation. Not in Ephesus alone, but "all they which dwelt in Asia heard the Word of the Lord Jesus, both Jews and Greeks." O how many might have thought on the words of the Master: "This Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness to all nations, and then shall the end come." And thought: Surely the Lord is at hand. But all was not ready then. The power of the Spirit of God was evidenced, not only in this wide spread preaching of the Gospel, but also in the healing of the sick: God did special miracles by the hands of Paul: so that from his body were brought unto the sick handkerchiefs or aprons, and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them." It seemed as though there was unmixed success to the Gospel of Christ, and that it triumphed over all the power of the enemy. This could not go on long. The work of every disciple must be tried. Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work

Of what sort it is."

The enemy began to rage; and stirred up some would-be exorcists to call over them which had evil spirits the name of the Lord Jesus." It was a daring, terrible step to take, and to the shame of the priesthood, seven sons of one of the priest were among the number, and they dared, in their impiety, to say to the evil spirit: "We adjure you by Jesus whom Paul preacheth." To their dismay and consternation, the evil spirit said: "Jesus I know, and Paul I know, but who are ye?" and the possessed man whom they had attempted to deliver, leaped upon them, so that they had to beat an ignominious retreat. The thing became known, and was the talk of the city, and thus the name of Jesus was in every mouth, and the more honest among the believers were impelled to make a public testimony; they confessed and shewed their deeds, and many which used curious arts, i. e., sorcery, brought their books together and burned them in sight of all men. "So mightily grew the Word of God and prevailed."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

EPHESUS was one of the most famous cities of Asia Minor long before Paul visited it. Yet twenty years after the crucifixion Christianity does not appear to have been heard of there. One reason may have been that it was known the world over as the chief seat of worship of Diana. There was a tradition that the great image of her, which stood in the famous temple of Ephesus, had fallen from the planet Jupiter. A picture of this image forms the initial of this article. Many visitors went thither to worship the image and they took away with them silver models of it. So many of these were sold that the making of them formed a business of itself and Demetruis and others grew rich by it. Paul wanted to visit the city on his second missionary journey but was prevented. Now, however, after leaving Corinth he went there accompanied by Aquila and Priscilla. He was on his way to Jerusalem to keep the feast of Tabernacles which was held on September 16, 53. Luke, we infer from the cursory character of the narrative, was not with him. Not until the sixth verse of the twentieh chapter does the pronoun "we" reappear. As it was dropped in describing the departure of Paul from Philippi and is resumed in describing Paul's sailing a second time from that port it looks as if Luke had remained at Philippi during all the events narrated in the three preceding chapters. At his first visit to Ephesus Paul remained but a short time as he was hurrying forward to Jerusalem, but he was well received and promised to return. This promise, after visiting various churches on his way he fulfilled. During his absence Aquila and Priscilla made the acquaintance of Apollos of Alexandria. The Jews of that city were noted for their learning and culture. They were less narrow and bigoted than those who remained at and near Jerusalem. Being brought in contact with Gentile civilization they had broadened and had attained clearer ideas of the divine essence of Judaism which at the capital was buried under a mass of tradition and ritualistic rubbish. Apollos seems not to have heard of Jesus, or not to have known what he really was. But he had accepted the teaching of John the Baptist and when he went to Ephesus he declared John's message. He was consequently ready to accept Christ, when Aquila and Priscilla told him of the Saviour. When Paul returned Apollos seems to have been at Corinth, but he had left disciples behind him whom he had baptized. To these Paul preached Christ and from him they first heard of the Holy Spirit. It must have been glad news, for John's teaching required of them fruits which the Holy Spirit alone could enable them to bring forth in perfection.

Have ye received the Holy Ghost? "I am sitting," writes a famous clergyman, "on a summer's day in the shadow of a great New England elm. Its long branches hang motionless; there is not breeze enough to move them. All at once there comes a faint murmur; around my head the leaves are moved by a gentle current of air: then the branches begin to sway to and fro, the leaves are all in motion, and a soft, rushing sound fills my ear. So with every one that receives the Spirit. I am heart-empty and there comes, I know not where or whence, a sound of Divine Presence. I am inwardly moved with new comfort and hope; the day seems to dawn in my heart, sunshine comes around my path, and I am able to perform my duties with patience. I am walking in the Spirit."

We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost. When people are in that state of ignorance they cannot be expected to have success in spiritual work. The Holy Spirit is the power which enables men to become both holy and useful. A lady was being shown through a corn mill, worked by a river which ran close by the walls. But all the wheels were in silent inaction. "Where is the power?" she asked. She was shown a handle and told to press on it. She did, and the mighty force was instantly turned on, the wheels moved, and the place was alive with activity. The most cultivated people and the most elaborate church machinery are useless if the power of the Holy Spirit is absent.

Spake boldly. Prince Charles of Hesse was dining one day with the infidel King of Prussia, Frederic the Great, whose wit and sarcasm made him dreaded by his friends. As usual the king during the repast made the Christian religion the subject of ridicule. He was a disciple of Voltaire and from that brilliant Frenchman had learned the art of assailing Christianity in a showy and effective manner. The princes and generals around the table laughed and applauded the king's witticisms, but Prince Charles was silent and evidently uncomfortable. At last the king noticed his silence and turning to him directed the attention of the brilliant company to him by the pointed question, "My dear Prince, you do not believe in this superstitious nonsense?" The Prince looked steadily into Frederic's face and answered, "Sire, I am not more sure that I have now the honor of seeing you than I am that Jesus Christ suffered and died for us as our Saviour on the cross." The King remained silent for a few moments and then said, "My dear Prince, you are the first man of spirit who has ever declared such a belief in my hearing." After the dinner as the Prince passed out through the corridor, his hand was seized by Gen. Tenenzien, who in some way had heard what had passed at the royal table. Wringing the Prince's hand, the General said, while his eyes were filled with tears, "Thank God that at last there has been a Christian brave enough to confess Christ to the King's face."

Divers were hardened. It is strange that under such preaching as Paul's anyone could become hardened; yet when no effort is made to heed and obey the word the listening of the very best preaching has hardening influence. Suppose a new factory is built in some populous neighborhood. On the first few mornings everyone is awakened by the bell. A few who are going to work there rise and dress and go to their labor; the others go to sleep again, if they can. After a few months the people get accustomed to the sound of the bell and it awakens no one but those who are in the habit of obeying its summons.

When persons become hardened by continual association with worldly people and by absenting themselves from public and private worship and the society of God's people they may lose the power of Christian service. Mr. Moody says, "When visiting a gentleman in England, I observed a fine canary. Admiring his beauty the gentleman replied, 'Yes, he is beautiful but he has lost his voice. He used to be a fine singer, but I was in the habit of hanging his cage out of the window, the sparrows came around him with their incessant chirping, gradually he ceased to sing and learned their twitter, and now all that he can do is to twitter.' Oh! how truly does this represent the case of many Christians; they used to delight to sing the songs of Zion, but they came into close association with those whose notes never rise so high, until at last, like the canary, they can do nothing but twitter, twitter."

"The Christian Herald" Sunday School Missionary's Second Year of Labor in the Southwest and its Rich Spiritual Results—Many New Sunday Schools Organized and Thriving and Work Done Among New Churches—A Third Year Begun

IT is now a little over two years since THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with the active, sympathetic co-operation of a portion of its readers, undertook the support of a Sunday School Missionary, whose field of labor should be among the out-of-the-way sections of the Southwest; the "poor hills" and the by-ways of Northern Missouri. Many of these parts are remote from centres of influence and business. The field also embraced newly-started little villages; old country places which have ceased to be centres for gatherings of the people as formerly; and neighborhoods which have come to be centres by villages, post office, etc., being started. All such places and neighborhoods furnish a wide field for missionary effort, their condition being somewhat like that of many rural parts of England and Wales during the labors of Whitfield, Wesley, Howell and Harris, and it had been disclosed, through the labors of the mission workers of the American Sunday School Union, that there was, in the Southwestern States, many such obscure localities, whose populations were either wholly or partially destitute of religious privileges, whose adults rarely heard a sermon and still more rarely entered a church door, and whose children were growing up in spiritual ignorance in a Christian land. It was with the hope of being able to support in this peculiar field a single consecrated, energetic, well-qualified Gospel worker, that the proprietor of this journal was first led to adopt the project. The two years that have passed have been years of patient and prayerful observation on the one hand and of unremitting zeal and devotion on the other. Rev. George W. Sharp, the experienced missionary chosen for the work, has more than fulfilled the hopes that went forth with him to the field. His labors have been providentially guided and blessed in being the means of extending the Gospel in many parts of northern Missouri and of founding a number of Sunday Schools and several churches.

During the first year of his experience, Mr. Sharp's work was as follows:

		Teachers.	Scholars.
New schools organized,	20	69	640
Schools re-organized and revived	5	22	219
Schools addressed or othewise aided,	16	84	1228
Visits and aids to schools labored with,	27	157	2138
Total	63	332	4219

The second year, just concluded, shows still more gratifying results. In twelve localities new Sunday Schools have been successfully established, with an average of four teachers each and an aggregate attendance of nearly 500 pupils. Besides this, six schools which had been established at some former date but which, for some unexplained cause, had been abortive and discontinued were vitalized and reopened under circumstances so promising as to afford a hope of their permanent progress. The record of Sunday School work alone is a remarkable one for a single year and could only have been accomplished by a man possessing Rev. Mr. Sharp's tireless determination and ardor for the cause. His work during the year may be summarized as follows:

New Schools Organized,	12
New Teachers appointed,	43
New Scholars enrolled,	497
Schools reorganized,	6
Teachers appointed,	27
Scholars (for re-organized Schools),	253
Schools addressed,	9
Schools visited and aided,	5
Teachers in same	99
Scholars (in Schools visited and aided)	935
Bibles distributed,	31
Testaments distributed	200
Visits and aids to schools previously reported,	38
Teachers in same,	305
Total addresses and sermons delivered during year,	162
Miles traveled	5072
Visits to families,	432

Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who have enjoyed with us the letters received from Mr. Sharp from time to time and published in these columns, are already familiar with the character of the work. In a letter dated at Kirksville, Mo., July 4, he writes:

"I returned home last evening from a tour, during which I found some of the roads in such condition from heavy rains that no prudent man would attempt to travel over them in a buggy; deep washes in some places, culverts, etc., swept away in others. I meet with a great variety of excuses in different neighborhoods for their being without Sunday Schools, such as the following:—'Can't have a Sunday School here—no Christian to superintend it;' or 'No Christians to teach it.' A frequent expression is 'The old people won't come.' A more serious one is 'People too much divided in this neighborhood.' It is often said, 'Sunday School will do no good here—it has been tried.' Again it will be said, 'No use to try to have Sunday School here—can't keep order.' These are samples of what a missionary hears at different places and if he heeded such things, he would soon go home. But he knows that all such difficulties, indeed all difficulties, must be overcome by prayer and perseverance

"I heard recently that a school which I organized about two years ago in an out-of-the-way district is going on finely; and another school which I have aided repeatedly has enjoyed a very precious meeting greatly improving the moral, social and religious state of the community. From there the meeting was transferred to another neighborhood, one in which there has been much infidelity, and where a Christian young lady who was accustomed to open her day school with reading the Word of God and prayer, lost her position for so doing. Even there the meeting was greatly blessed and souls were converted. About eighty were converted in both places.

"Some time ago, I organized a Sunday School at a place called Mulberry in Adair Co., Mo. There was no Sunday School, prayer-meeting, church house, nor organized congregation in the community, and no church house for many miles west, north or south,—the nearest being an old building, much neglected and badly out of repair, situated several miles to the southeast. Even in this there was, much of the time, no service. When I organized, the Sunday School the attendance was small, but through various vicissitudes it persevered and grew by encouraging it at different times and in various ways. Then other ministers visited and labored with the people. Protracted and revival meetings were held from time to time, and a great moral revolution has been wrought by the grace of God; many parents and children have been converted, a church has been organized, having at this time probably one hundred members! Their Sunday School is called 'Evergreen,' and continues open all the year. They have a weekly prayer-meeting, a pastor, and regular preaching. People come for miles around to these meetings. Having been started by missionary labor, they in turn aid in spreading the Gospel at home and abroad, and they have a society to promote that end."

The Mulberry Church has erected the neat, comfortable and substantial house of worship shown in our illustration. The building is about 30 feet wide by 40 long, with arched ceiling, comfortably seated and furnished, and is literally "set upon a hill," and cannot be hid, and from it the light of the glorious Gospel of Christ shines many miles around. For uprightness, integrity and godly living that community has few equals. For piety, love and cordial goodwill it is eminent. Songs of joy and praise are heard in the church and homes of the people. The Lord's day is observed where formerly it was neglected and desecrated.

What a contrast there must be between the dilapidated frame house at the foot of the hill in which the Sunday School was organized, and the neat and pleasant church on the eminence! Greater still is the contrast in the spiritual condition of those people who before knew not God, but who now rejoice in hope of his glory.

Another Gospel edifice founded by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD missionary, is the Union Church at Baring, Missouri. Mr. Sharp writes of it:

"Soon after the village was located and began to grow, I went there to organize a school. I found no suitable house, there being neither church nor school-house in the place. But I secured an upper room over a billiard hall. It was that or nothing. So I organized the school in that upper room. It was reached by a rude unenclosed stairway which ran up the outside of the billiard-room—the lower story of the house, which was a frame.

"The school prospered, but after a year had passed it became necessary for me to reorganize it, which I did last year. We then secured for the school a vacant store-room. The people took an earnest interest in the school, and in the services which I held in the interest of the work in the morning and afternoon. I assisted them by a grant from the American Sunday School Union to supply their school with choice periodicals and Gospel books, and urged them to erect a proper house of worship, which they have now done. Both church and Sunday School are now prospering. The church is a pleasant place for the preaching of the Gospel to an extensive community in and around the village."

CHURCH AT MULBERRY, MO.

Founded and Organized by our Sunday School Missionary.

Many streams traverse North Missouri, generally running from north-west to south-east, furnishing a great many ridges and not a few hills, and along these streams the land on one side or another is called "bottom land." Vast ranges of hills and ridges, once esteemed of little value, are being cleared of timber and brought into cultivation. The lands were very cheap and are naturally taken by poor people, small land owners—thus causing many families and their children to live in the same district. All such portions are inviting fields for missionary work, except such as have already been supplied with Sunday Schools, and they are generally weak schools which need the missionary's fostering care. It is probably a conservative statement to say that six missionaries spending their lives in North Missouri, would find work enough for a life-time. Population is increasing in cities, town and country. New school districts are being formed out of old ones. New towns and villages are springing up over the country.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S remarks, in previous issues, regarding the need of the work are to be accepted as applying to the "neglected districts" only, not to the whole state, nor to these many parts which are already well supplied with Sunday Schools and churches, and whose population is as large, pious and intelligent as its neighbors in every respect.

Mr. Sharp thus describes part of his field of labor: "One of the Grand Chariton's main tributaries is the Muscle Fork. Between the two is much fine, rolling land, fairly well and only fairly supplied with gospel privileges. But on either side of the main land and approaching the bottom land on each stream are miles upon miles of broken and heavily timbered land, in which many poor people live, and have nearly no convenient places of worship. Hunting, shooting, fishing, and running foxes, are sports to which many resort, (each in its season) on the Lord's day. Other habits of life may well be imagined, as dissipation, profanity, ignorance, carousing, fighting, gambling, etc.

"This is a great, grand and needed work. I speak for the destitute tens of thousands, yea many ten thousands of people in Northern Missouri and the immense additions which increase will give it. We are not as much of a frontier people as newer states and territories, but our neglected districts may be as needy and sometimes more so, on account of having a denser population."

BE WISE TO-DAY.

TO-DAY is added to our time,
Yet, while we sing, it glides away;
How soon shall we be past our prime,
For where, alas! is yesterday?

Gone—gone into eternity;
There, every day, in turn appears;
To-morrow—O 'twill never be.
If we should live a thousand years!

Our time is all to-day, to-day,
The same, though changed; and while it flies,
With still small voice the moments say,
"To-day, to-day, be wise, be wise."

DECIDE FOR YOURSELF.

WHILE we are to make all reasonable allowance for hereditary influence, and the fact that some people are born wrong, remember that after all under God we decide for ourselves whether we will be good or bad. We cannot throw this responsibility off on satanic possession. Every man's heart has walls around it, and strong gates around it, and we entertain what guests we will. Hark! there is a knock at the gate. Who comes there? Revenge, with gauntleted fists, beating to come in. It has dismounted from a satyr of the desert. Do not open the door. Hark! another knock at the gate. Who comes there? Ambition, that has just dismounted from a horse lathered with human gore. Do not open the gate. Hark! another knock at the gate. Who comes there? It is Gentleness. It is accompanied with a heavenly voice and a gracious urgency. It is a messenger from God. Shove back the bolt. Swing open all the gates. Come in, Grace, with all thy family of Christian graces — love, and joy, and peace, and patience, and brotherly kindness and charity. Come in and take possession of all the rooms of the heart's castle; join hands, and skip up and down the wide halls in great glee. In other words surrender your whole heart to God, and there is no room for satanic possession. Do you find the struggle against temptation hard? Call on God for reinforcements. They are saddled and bridled ready for the fray. Do you know a little girl decided the battle of Waterloo and the fate of Europe? The English army was worn out in the long battle when a little girl showed Blucher and his men a short cut to the field of Waterloo, otherwise they would have gone a long distance around, but through that short cut they came up in time to save the day. Oh, immortal man! this may be your Waterloo of temptation and trial! I would God I could take the part of that little child and get to you quick reinforcements. They are coming! The artillery of God rumbling down the sky, coming, coming! The day is ours. "If God be for us, who can be against us?"

USELESS GENIUS

THE curse of this country is the geniuses—those men who think themselves Lord Byrons, not because they have any of his talent, but because they have his vices and his big shirt-collar. The only kind of genius that is worth anything is the genius for hard, practical, useful work. If God has given you two hands and two feet and good health, you have magnificent equipment. Those who were born at the top of the ladder do not have much chance, for they are apt to fall to the bottom, but those who are born at the foot of the ladder have the better chance. Michael Faraday, the greatest philosopher of his time, started from a blacksmith's anvil, and Shakespeare held horses at the door of a London theatre before he held the attention of all ages. The path of life opened for Robert Burns in a ploughboy's furrow; George Peabody endowed a library in the village where once he had sawed wood. The shoemaker's last would have been the most appropriate coat-of-arms for William Cary the missionary, and Cloudesley Shovel the admiral and famous author. The butcher's stall was the starting-place for Kirke White and Akenside and Cardinal Wolsey. Herschel played in a brass band before God called him up to listen to the music of the spheres and the orchestra of the morning stars. A barber-shop was the starting-place for Copernicus the astronomer, and Arkwright the inventor, and Jeremy Taylor the ecclesiast, and Tenterden the Lord Chief Justice of England. A mason's trowel was the weapon with which the learned Ben Johnson and Hugh Miller the geologist began to fight the battle of life. With a weaver's shuttle Columbus the discoverer, and Dr. Livingstone the explorer, and John Foster the essayist, and Wilson the ornithologist, began to weave their fortunes and their usefulness. Out of every hard position in life there are fifty doors which at the tap of the hard knuckle of toil swing wide open.

IS PRAYER WASTED?

THAT was a suggestive thing that Paul wrote to the Corinthians when he said, "I besought the Lord thrice that it might depart from me. And he said unto me, my grace is sufficient for thee." There was something the matter with Paul. He spoke of something that irritated him, or annoyed him, or hurt him, or mortified him, under the figure of a "thorn in the flesh." Some think it was a crooked back. Others think it was a stuttering tongue. More persons think, and among them the learned Kitto and Dr. John Brown, the Scotch essayist, that it was diseased eyes, amounting almost to total blindness. They think this because he almost always wrote by the hand of an amanuensis, once mentioning it as a rare occurrence that he had written a large letter with his own hand; and they think this also because he was always accompanied wherever he went, although he was much of the time a poor man and could not have paid attendants; and also because he seems to refer to his trouble with his eyes when, in describing the enthusiastic love of the Galatians, he says: "ye would have plucked out your own eyes and have given them to me." In other words, "you love me so much you would have been willing to trade off your good eyes for my poor eyes." But whatever may have been the trouble, Paul prayed to have it cured. I suppose he prayed hundreds of times on this matter, but he made three agonizing prayers. Did God answer those prayers? He did, by giving something better than Paul asked for. Not by straightening the back, or unloosening the tongue, or by curing the disordered eyesight, but by giving him grace to turn into glorious advantage that which had been an irritating detriment. Instead of curing the physical misfortune he sanctified that trouble until Paul became the greatest apostle of the Gentiles, the greatest and the grandest Christian of all the centuries. "I besought the Lord thrice that it might depart from me. And he said unto me, my grace is sufficient for thee." So it was then—so it is now. In the six thousand years of the world's existence there have not been one hundred right-hearted prayers unanswered. Nor fifty, nor ten, nor five, nor has there been one. If there had in the six thousand years been just one right-hearted prayer unanswered, it would have impeached the character of God. If there be any truth well set in the Bible it is that God answers prayer. God gives what you ask for always, or something better; and there is no exception.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is constantly receiving letters making inquiries concerning the Tanquerey Portrait Society, the National Art Union and other portrait concerns, which in their advertisements and circulars use the name of Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, editor of this journal, among their references. He has no knowledge whatever of any of these establishments, and he most emphatically declines any responsibility whatever in this matter, and any use of his name in this connection is altogether unauthorized. Some of the complaining letters which we have received concerning these parties, we have laid before the United States Post-Office authorities.

H. A. Singley, Milnesville, Pa. Where in the Bible is the word looking-glass mentioned?

Job. 37: 18, is the only passage in the Bible where the word looking-glass is used.

Subscriber, Fort Reed, Fla. Is it unreasonable to imagine that heaven is the grand central planet, around which all other planets revolve, and by which they are controlled, and from which they get their light? If so, when we look at the sun are we beholding heaven in the distance?

Our sun is the centre of but one of many systems. Some astronomers have held that the great star, Alcyone, is the centre of all the planetary systems. Concerning the location of heaven, conjecture is futile. While we remain in our mortal state, we cannot apprehend the things that relate to the spiritual state.

Wm. Vincent, Sioux Falls, So. Dak. 1. When, and by whom was the Apostolic creed compiled? 2. What were the day, month and year of the birth of Robert Raikes, the founder of Sunday Schools?

1. The Apostolic creed, as held by many writers of the early Church, was composed by the Apostles themselves, who, during their stay at Jerusalem soon after our Lord's ascension, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, agreed upon it as a rule of faith, and as a mark a distinction between friends and foes. It came into general use about A. D. 400. 2. Robert Raikes was born in England on September 17, 1735.

Paul V. Stayner, Baltimore, Md. What were the great battles of ancient times, which were recently referred to in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD? What were the decisive battles of the world?

There were so many that we can only mention a few of them. At the battle of Cannae, where the Romans were defeated by Hannibal, 70,000 were left dead on the field. Marius of Rome slew in a single battle 140,000 Gauls. At the battle of Issus, between the armies of Darius and Alexander, 110,000 fell, and at Arbela 300,000 perished. Cæsar's troops are said to have massacred 400,000 Germans who had crossed the Rhine to settle in the south. At Fontenoy 100,000, Chalons 300,000, Waterloo 70,000, and Borodino 80,000 fell. Nothing definite as to numbers can be given concerning the great battles of the still more remote wars. The decisive battles of the world were those fought at Marathon, Syracuse, Arbela, and Metaurus, before the Christian era, and those at Chalons, Hastings, Orleans, Blenheim, Saratoga, Waterloo and Sedan.

J. A. V. I notice that there is a radical difference between the meaning of some passages in the Revised Version and that of the same passages in the old version. The passage II. Tim. 2: 25, 26 is a case in point. Which version is correct?

The Revised Version is in every case more trustworthy. When it was made a great advance had been made in the knowledge of the Oriental languages and customs. The best living scholars who had spent their lives in the pursuit of such knowledge devoted several years to the Revision and to the one effort of making the book an accurate rendering of the original. They had also the advantage of access to more ancient copies of the original than were known to the men who prepared the older version. The Revised Version is not a perfect work but for accuracy it is incomparably superior to the Authorized Version.

I. S. Sickels, Pleasant Hill, Ill. What is the meaning of Luke 20: 35? Does it imply a command to marry?

If you read the question which elicited Christ's words, you will see that it relates to the future life. The Sadducees, who held that there was no resurrection of the dead, propounded a question which they supposed would puzzle the Great Teacher. Having stated a case, they ask whose wife the woman would be in the resurrection. His reply was that there would be no counterpart in that life to the marriage relation in this life. There is no teaching of celibacy in the passage; it simply states that marriages are not contracted after death.

Subscriber, Putnam Co., N. Y. 1. What do you understand by Christ casting out devils? Was it some disease that he cured? 2. Where is the book Jasher referred to in Joshua 10: 13?

1. The question has been the subject of dispute for many generations. The plain meaning of the narrative, however, seems to us to be that Satan had gained absolute possession and control of the afflicted persons and that Christ evicted him by his superior power. It seems to us impossible on any other assumption to satisfactorily explain the words of exorcism Christ used, the words uttered by the afflicted persons and the effects which followed. The symptoms described very closely resemble those of some forms of epilepsy and insanity of our time. Science, however, does not now ascribe the affliction to demoniacal possession. Nevertheless some of the patients do occasionally display a degree of malignity and cunning which could scarcely be exceeded if they were really possessed by the devil. 2. It is believed to have been an ancient book which perished at the Captivity. Its title implies that it was a book of biographies of just or pious men. It is quoted also II. Sam. 1: 18.

R. E. Peters, Racine, Mo. What is the meaning of Mark 7: 15, 18?

The Jews had a number of rules and laws about defilement. To touch a dead body was, as they thought, to contract a defilement, and there were many other ways by which a man might be defiled, through contact, or through eating certain kinds of food. Christ swept them all away by teaching that defilement was from within. The man who lied or swore, or committed sin, was defiled. The true purity must come from a change of heart.

Franklin I. Terry, Holteville, N. Y. Are the six days of the Creation generally believed to be days of twenty-four hours each?

No; very few people think so now. An ingenious theory, which has been widely accepted is that God revealed the events of the creation to Moses in a series of six visions lasting six days, and that Moses, in writing the first chapter of Genesis described what he saw on the several days. That, however, is merely conjecture. It may be that each day represents a vast period of time.

C. G. Smith, Blockton, Ala. Why was Christ baptized as well as circumcised?

As the son of a Jewish mother, he was under the Mosaic law, which required circumcision. When he grew to manhood he submitted to the rite which John the Baptist introduced, as many other Jews did. Probably the majority of those whom John baptized had been circumcised in infancy.

Anxious Soul, East Cleveland, Ohio. 1. Are there not some passages of Scripture which forbid the return of backsliders? 2. What is the unpardonable sin?

1. We do not know of any. We know several inviting and encouraging him to return. One is Jeremiah 3: 22 which is addressed directly to backsliders and healing is promised. There is another intimation of God's willingness to receive the backslider in Hosea 14: 4. The passages to which you probably refer indicate a condition in which there is no desire to return, but rather a condition of indifference and callousness the exact opposite of your state, as you describe it. If you take God at his word and believe what he tells you and act on it as you would on an invitation from a neighbor or friend, you will soon be relieved of your hysterical fears and rejoice in the knowledge of acceptance. 2. The unpardonable sin is now generally believed to have consisted in attributing to Satanic power the miracles which Christ wrought. The context of the passages describing it confirm that view.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE PARIS RIOTS.

DISORDER in the French capital has for a century past had an ominous sound in the ears of the world. The news of a riot in the streets of Paris was so like the news that a fire had been started in close proximity to a powder magazine. Serious apprehension was consequently aroused by the cable dispatches describing the recent disturbances in the student quarter. They originated in an attempt by the police to suppress an indecent celebration which the art students had been in the habit of holding in a well-known cafe. The police appear to have acted with unnecessary violence, and in the disturbance which ensued one man was killed. A very bitter feeling between the police and the students was excited, which on July 1st led to a fierce fight. The students succeeded in disarming a number of policemen and used the swords, so acquired, with telling effect on the guardians of the peace. They were dispersed only when a regiment of cavalry made a charge upon them. The communists and criminal classes of Paris hate the police so cordially that they went gladly to the help of the students against the common enemy, and the riots of the next day or two were more extensive and the fighting more desperate. On both sides several were killed and many badly wounded. The students, however, perceived that their movement was being used by the criminal classes as a mask for plunder and attempted revolution, and they promptly notified their various organizations to take no further share in the riotous proceedings. But the excited populace continued the fighting on their own account. Their headquarters was the Labor Exchange which the Paris municipality established some years ago as a place of meeting for the trade unions and an intelligence office for unemployed workmen. It has, however, of late become a hot-bed of sedition and anarchistic plots. The national government, overriding the municipality, took the heroic course, when the true character of the riots was revealed, of closing the Labor Exchange, and suspending the payment for its support which the municipality had voted. This act increased the animosity of the rioters toward the government, but Gen. Saussier, the military governor of Paris, called to his aid several regiments composed of country soldiers who have no sympathy with Parisian mobs, and soon had at his disposal a garrison of sixty thousand trained men. With these, he believes, he will be able to suppress the rising and maintain order. It appears to have no definite object, and is merely an expression of the dislike of the ruffianism of the city for any kind of government. In such a case a Republican government has to use the same means as a monarchical government would use. As Solomon wrote, "a rebellious man seeketh only rebellion: therefore a cruel messenger shall be sent against him." (Prov. 17: 11.)

A New Gem.

REPORTS come from North Carolina of the discovery of a new gem by an accident. Some time ago Edison the electrician heard that there was a possibility of the much-used but expensive platinum existing in North Carolina; and sent an assistant to make a search for it. The man, whose name was Hidden, searched carefully but could find no platinum. He was convinced, however, that a plot of stony land which he examined in the course of his search, contained precious stones. A closer inspection led to the discovery of one or two beryls and he then purchased the plot. He has been excavating since that time and has found many gems of considerable value. His chief discovery, however, is of a gem hitherto unknown to lapidaries and which has been named "Hiddenite" after its discoverer. It is of a delicate green tint in the shape of a crystal and as hard as a diamond. The mining for it is done with great care. The pick is plied for an hour or two and then the men go down on their knees and grope with their fingers in the hole to find a pocket. There is frequently no pocket in the sides of the hole and then the pick is resumed. Again there is a groping and the fingers come in contact with sharp needle-like points. A piece of Hiddenite is there and the hole has to be widened until the beautiful crystal is released from the pocket. The gem is capable of a high polish and commands a ready sale at fabulous prices. If all who envy the discoverer his good fortune could be induced to seek another kind of gem with similar energy and care the results would be better worth having. In the social mire of our great cities there is an unexhausted quarry in which precious souls might be found that might become Christ's in the day that he makes up his jewels. (Mal. 3: 17.)

A Marriage License Void.

A MYSTERIOUS trouble seems to have arisen in St. Louis, Mo., to prevent a marriage. A short time ago a young couple presented themselves at the house of a Baptist minister of that city and asked him to marry them. He asked the usual questions and examined the license which they brought with them and found that everything was in due form. Witnesses, however, were necessary; and the clergyman left the couple together while he summoned two members of his household to act in that capacity. When he returned, the prospective bridegroom informed him that he and the bride had been talking the matter over and had concluded to be married the next day instead of that evening. The clergyman acquiesced and a time was fixed for the ceremony. The couple went away, leaving the license with the clergyman. They did not appear at the time appointed and they have not presented themselves since then, although several weeks have elapsed. The clergyman has now concluded that they do not intend to be married so he has sent the unused license back to the License Department. He has no clue to the nature of the difficulty which arose at that late hour, but it was evidently a serious one. Doubtless, he like other ministers, has witnessed similar failures in spiritual experience. Many who have seemed on the point of accepting Christ and becoming united by faith to him have postponed doing so until a future time and have never kept their promise. (Isa. 55: 6.)

The Pitiless Tornado.

DISTRESSING reports from Iowa continue to come of the terrible destruction of property and loss of life caused by the tornado of July 6. It cut a swath nearly a quarter of a mile wide and twenty miles long, wrecking everything in its course. The thriving town of Pomeroy lay directly in its path and was completely demolished. Trees, houses, churches and public buildings were ruthlessly torn to fragments and forty-four persons were killed and over a hundred so severely injured that there is little hope of their recovery. The dreaded funnel-shaped cloud was seen approaching the town a few minutes before seven in the evening. Those who saw it ran to the caves cut in the hill-side for just such an emergency and their lives were saved. There was no time to give any alarm; the swiftly revolving cloud seemed to come with lightning-like rapidity and in ten minutes had passed through the town, leaving it in ruins. The desolation is heartrending. In some cases only one is left alive out of a family of four or five. In one case an infant is the sole survivor, in another it is the mother, in others parents have lost all their children, in others children are bereft of their parents. The dead were fearfully mangled, some of them were torn limb from limb. The storm was unprecedented for violence in that section of the country. Had there only been time to arouse the people and warn them of the approaching storm, many more lives might have been saved, for those who were in the caves escaped without a scratch. A warning would have been sufficient; it would not have been necessary to persuade and plead, as it is with men whom ministers and Christian workers are urging to flee from the wrath to come to the safe refuge in Christ. (II. Cor. 5: 20.)

Punishing Himself.

A curious story is told of an acquaintance by a Western miner. He says that the man was known in the camp as a quiet but determined man. He was well liked by the men who knew him, but he was averse to the dissipations common among the miners of the district. While working at a place called Cripple Creek, several miles from Denver, he made a strike of several thousand dollars. He took his haul to Denver, and there, contrary to his usual habit, he succumbed to temptation and engaged in a prolonged debauch. He did not become sober until all his money was gone. Then he realized his folly, and was exasperated at the besotted idiocy by which he had lost a fortune in a few days. Money was offered him to pay his way back to the mines, but he refused to borrow a cent. He set out to walk the whole distance. A man who was driving a team in the direction he was going overtook him and offered him a ride, but the miner refused it. He trudged along doggedly, and the teamster overheard him muttering to himself, "Walk, walk, you miserable fool! Drink and gamble, will you? Then walk, it'll do you good. No, you needn't stop at a spring; go dry, you sot, you've drunk enough. Go on and walk, it serves you right. Walk, walk!" And the man did walk until he reached his shanty, and sullenly resumed his work. Doubtless, the self-inflicted suffering was a vent for his remorse, but it could not restore his wasted fortune. In many a convent and monastery men have sought relief from the stings of conscience by the same method, but never with success. Only in the divinely appointed way of faith in Christ's atonement is there real relief. (Rom. 5: 1.)

An International Dispute.

Two Commissioners have recently been appointed to decide the nationality of a small island off the coast of Maine. It is claimed by both the United States and England and the settlement will involve some close study and argument. The island is of little value, but would be of great strategic importance in the event of war between the two powers. It is situated at the southern entrance of Passamaquoddy Bay, about a mile above Lubeck. When the boundary line between this country and Canada was settled in 1842, it was laid down as following the line of the channel. It then flowed to the east of the island and therefore the island was supposed to belong to the United States. A careful survey recently made, however, shows that if the boundary line follows the course of the channel, as was arranged, the island is on the Canadian side of it, as the channel flows to the west of the island. It would appear that either an error was made in 1842, or the channel has changed from the east to the west side of the island since that time. The question therefore arises whether the clause of the treaty fixing the line according to the channel shall still be observed, and this question the Commissioners have to decide. An impression appears to prevail that the boundary line between the kingdom of Christ and the kingdom of Satan has similarly shifted, as Christian professors are now often seen in places where Satan was once supposed to have unquestioned sway. In the absence of an authoritative declaration of a change, there is a danger of those who frequent such places being claimed as subjects by the Prince of this world. (II. Cor. 6: 17.)

The Dress Saved.

A young lady's care for her dress involved her in a disagreeable if not a ridiculous experience, near Adrian, Mich., a few days ago. She was one of a party of bicyclists who were making an excursion into the country. She and one of the young men of the party fell into the rear when they were a few miles out of the city, and the others went on ahead. They were proceeding slowly when the lady's dress caught in the gearing. Her companion went to her assistance, but was unable to extricate it. He proposed cutting the dress, but to this she objected. He therefore carried her and the wheel to the roadside and propped them up while he returned to the city to procure a wrench. He was away a long time, which seemed much longer to the lady than it really was, as she was subjected to the comments of passers-by, who were amused at her anomalous position. She was resolved, however, not to spoil her garment, and waited with what patience she could until her friend came back, when he took the machine to pieces and released her. She showed her courage and prudence in avoiding loss, but she will do well not to make that principle the invariable rule of life. There are entanglements in which it is wise to suffer any loss, even if it is of a right hand or a right eye, if that is the quickest way of escape. (Matt. 5: 29, 30.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. Dr. Ferguson, of the English Presbyterian Mission at Tauvanfoe, Formosa, has been nearly murdered by savages.

In Lowell, Mass., several of the pastors have united in holding out-door Gospel services at places where there are generally gatherings of excursionists and holiday-keepers.

The friends of Mr. William Noble will be glad to learn that he has so far recovered his health as to return to London and resume his labors at the Hoxton Hall Mission. Mrs. Noble is still an invalid.

Mr. Edmund Sturge, the well-known Quaker philanthropist, is dead. He was in his eighty-fifth year. For more than thirty years Mr. Sturge was a leading member of the Anti-Slavery Society.

Rev. Charles Inglis, an English evangelist, who took a preaching tour in this country last year, expects to pay a second visit here in September next. Letters for him will reach him on his arrival if addressed to this office.

The Secretaries of the American Bible Society, exhibited to the Board, at its recent meeting, a fac-simile of the Chaldean Flood Tablet, recently constructed by Professor Haupt, of Baltimore, and presented to the society by the Johns Hopkins University.

The new Syrian Bible, just completed at the Bible House, New York, has been in the printers' hands four years. The translator was the famous American missionary in Persia, Dr. Benjamin Labaree, who was assisted by Joel Abraham, a native Christian from Oroomiah. Two compositors from Persia set the type.

Rev. Thomas Spurgeon passed through New York from Australia recently on his way to London, to occupy the pulpit of his late father, Pastor C. H. Spurgeon. On Sunday morning, July 2, he preached for Rev. A. C. Dixon, D.D., and in the evening for Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D., whose sermons are published weekly in this journal.

A remarkable confirmation of Biblical history is published in Science, an English journal. It states that among the 320 tablets discovered in the ruins of the Egyptian palace of Amenophis IV., is a political correspondence dating 3,370 years back. Some of the letters are from Princes of the Amorites, Phœnicians and Philistines entreating help from the King of Egypt, to protect them against the attacks of the Abiri (Hebrews). One of the applicants for help is Japhia, mentioned Joshua 10: 3.

We learn, from a letter just received from Mr. George H. Dowkonth, that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Gospel Stage received a hearty welcome at Mahonoy City, Pa. Four services were held, and the young men were encouraged by evidences of permanent good resulting from their efforts. They gratefully acknowledge kindnesses received from readers of this journal at Hazleton, Pa., and other places.

The delegates of the Christian Endeavor Convention at Montreal, were assailed by an angry mob on July 8. The injudicious speech of a delegate from India, in which he denounced Roman Catholicism, was the occasion of the outbreak. In view of the hostile feeling, it was deemed prudent to abandon the meetings in the tent on July 9, and the Drill Hall was guarded by members of the Volunteer Rifle Brigade.

Meetings are to be held to-day and to-morrow at Chautauqua, with the object of founding an Institute of Christian Sociology. Its object will be to interest Christian people in the economic problems of the day, "and to present Christ in practical life as a living Master and King, the enemy of wrong and selfishness, the power of righteousness and love." Among those interested in the movement are Bishop Vincent, the Rev. Washington Gladden, Prof. R. T. Ely, President James Brand, the Rev. Sydney Strong, and the Rev. Dr. Herron.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

THE SUITOR AND MAIDEN AT THE WELL.

Sermon preached before the Tremont Temple Church, now meeting in Music Hall, Boston, last Sunday evening, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D. Text: Genesis 24: 16, "And the damsel was very fair to look upon and she went down to the well, and filled her pitcher."

WE have to-night a charming story of love and marriage in ancient times. We are much impressed with the deep regard which Abraham had to the Word and promise of God in all his family relations. The death of Sarah gave Abraham an increased anxiety concerning the future of Isaac. Isaac is now forty years old, and it is surely fitting that the heir of the promise should be settled as the head of a family of his own. The chapter from which the passage is taken shows us how important the record of this marriage is in the mind of God. It is one of the longest chapters in the Bible, it is occupied with the account of the marriage of Isaac. Whatever belongs to the establishment and extension of God's kingdom is important in God's eyes. A mere literary critic would condemn the Bible, as a literary production, because of the prominence given to an incident which he would suppose might be related in a few words. But God's thoughts are not those of the ordinary literary critic.

In the early portion of the chapter we see Abraham binding the chief servant of his house by a solemn and obscure form of oath to seek a suitable wife for Isaac. Only once beside in the Bible is a similar kind of oath described; that occasion is where Jacob requires the same ceremony from his son Joseph. The history of the Hebrew people does not seem to indicate that this was the customary form of administering oaths. It is a form, however, which would seem to bind all future generations to preserve the sanctity of the oath and to strive to secure in actual experience the promises thus made. Abraham was one hundred years old when Isaac was born, so that Abraham is now one hundred and forty years old. It is quite probable that the servant chosen for this was Eliezer, although his name is not given in the connection. Abraham could not bear the thought of having Isaac marry any of the daughters of the people among whom he sojourned. They had indeed been sufficiently kind to Abraham, but he must have been sensible of the fact that they were alienated from God. Should Isaac marry one of these daughters there was danger of the introduction of idolatry into his family. God had a definite purpose in giving the land to Abraham and to his posterity; and should idolatry be introduced into the chosen family that divine purpose would seemed to be overruled. Abraham was called by God to go from the Chaldean idolaters. Shall he now give his consent to the marriage of his son with the idolaters of Canaan? Should Isaac so marry the abominations of the heathen would be almost invited and so would become inevitable. There was more likelihood that the idolatrous wife would pervert him than that he would convert her. A careful study of the narrative shows clearly that Abraham was not influenced by a worldly policy, for nowhere in the account is any reference made to riches or earthly honors.

The conduct of Abraham at this point is an admirable pattern for Christian parents. The attractions of rank and fortune are now to many Christian parents irresistible. They seem willing practically to sell sons or daughters for filthy lucre and for social honor. Caleb was willing to give his daughter to the hero who should capture the city of Debir. His conduct seems at first thought to be unworthy of him as a father, but we see that it really was marked by both piety and patriotism. Many so-called Christian parents to-day offer their daughters not to the man with the brave heart, strong arm, and sharp sword which he wishes to use for his country and his God, but rather to the man either with a big bank account, or with some faded and worthless foreign title. It is to be hoped that the time will soon come when the proudest ambition of an American woman will be to become the wife of a noble American citizen, and the mother of worthy American sons and daughters. What permanent happiness can we expect with a husband or wife who is not in sympathy with God and true religion? How can we love truly, if we be genuine Christians, those who do not love Christ supremely? How is it possible to love aright as husband or wife those who openly oppose the Lord Jesus, whom we have enthroned in our hearts as our Saviour and king?

The Messenger

The next paragraph in the chapter, verses ten to fourteen, shows us the servant on his journey. Abraham did not wish Isaac himself to go. There was a possibility that if he found a wife in a distant country he might be disposed to make that country his home. The servant as we see, takes with him ten camels and "all the goods of his master." Doubtless Abraham gave minute directions regarding the outfit and the departure of the servant. Sending this cavalcade was quite consonant with oriental customs when an expedition of this sort was to be undertaken. Doubtless one purpose of an imposing retinue was to make a favorable impression on the minds of the maiden's relatives; it was important that they should be impressed with the extent of the possessions of Abraham and Isaac. Had the servant gone alone and taken no proofs of his master's wealth it is clear that his statements regarding the same might be doubted.

We know that the servant went to Mesopotamia, that is to say, Syria of the two rivers; the Greek word signifies the country between the rivers. It is believed to be the region lying between the Euphrates and the Tigris. The servant made his camels kneel by a well of water without the city at a time when the women would naturally come out to draw water. We know that water is generally drawn in the cool of the evening or the morning, and that drawing it is one of the heavy duties usually performed by women in eastern countries. A similar duty is still performed among the Arabs and also in India where women, without distinction of rank, perform this service. In Turkey and Persia it is said that only the poorer women engage in this servile employment. When the Bedouins pitch their tents but a small distance from the wells the water is not carried by camels, but by women who carry it home on their shoulders and backs. The simple maidens of these patriarchal days Eliezer well knew would come to the well to draw water; even the high-born damsels of the land were not above this kind of service. Eliezer, if he were the servant, offers an earnest, that God would send him godspeed, and would indicate to him the woman chosen to be the wife of Isaac. His prayer has become a part of classic music, and is beautiful whether read in the simple language of the Bible, or heard in the lofty strains of poetry and music. The choice of a wife for Isaac, who is the heir of promise, is a matter of greatest moment. It is a subject in which God is deeply interested. The old servant has an eye for feminine beauty; he also has a practical appreciation of the other qualities desired for the wife of Isaac. He desires a woman of attractive appearance, one of a gentle nature, and one who enjoys the approval of God.

Child-like Prayer

Even while he is speaking the answer comes to his prayer. A damsel, beautiful to look upon, approaches the well. The critical taste of the old man is entirely satisfied. She holds her pitcher upon her shoulder as she goes down to the well. It would seem that this well had a descending staircase. Wells so furnished for convenient approach are still known in the East. The grand well at Cairo, known as Joseph's well, is said to have a descent of one hundred and fifty feet by a staircase six feet wide. Troughs of stone or wood are sometimes found near the wells; but it is not uncommon to make a hollow in the sand, cover it with a skin, and then fill this sack with water. The servant approaches the beautiful maiden and asks for water to drink. She does more than he asks, for she offers to give drink also to his camels. The servant is represented as wondering and holding his peace while he gazed upon the maiden performing this menial service. He is debating whether or not the Lord has made his journey prosperous. Doubtless she had servants of her own, or employed some of his to aid her in her arduous task. It is to be hoped that Eliezer gave her a helping hand, if his servants did not aid her. A little less wondering on his part and a little more chivalry would have been quite in place. But in Oriental countries still, men often are satisfied to gaze and admire while women wait and work. No men in the world surpass American gentlemen in courtesy and chivalry toward women. Doubtless as you ride in street cars and see men sitting while women are standing, you may be disposed to doubt this remark; but I feel sure that if women oftener expressed appreciation for the courtesies of a seat, such courtesies would more frequently be extended. We now have in answer to the servant's questions; she is the daughter of Bethuel and the sister of Laban. Beautiful to look upon, she is also of a worthy and historic family, and is as charming in character as she is attractive in person. Knowing one of the avenues of approach to the female heart, the wise old servant gave her a golden ring and two bracelets of gold. The translators of the common version have had great trouble with this ring. They call it an earring, but surely a present of one earring would be a strange act on the part of Eliezer. Without doubt the gift is a ring, or a jewel, for the nose. The gift was intended as an expression of appreciation for her kindness to a stranger, and at the same time to impress her and her relatives with the wealth of his master. There being no inns in the country, the servant accepts the hospitality of her family. It was easy for the family to be cordial in their invitations when it was learned that this servant represented a wealthy master. We can well imagine with what excitement Rebekah hastened to tell the story of that day's happenings. It was a suggestive, beautiful and solemn moment in her life. Strange fancies are in her brain; all her dreams may now turn into realities. What does the future hold in store for her? Who is this unknown suitor for her hand? Wonderful moment is that when a woman is asked to be a wife! She becomes when about to be a bride the queen of the home, and every member of the family waits to give her

Regal Honors.

Abraham's servant receives a royal welcome. Laban, the brother of Rebekah, now appears upon the scene. Some have supposed that Bethuel was dead, because Laban takes so active a part in the events of the hour. From what we know of Laban's subsequent life we can well believe that he is deeply impressed with the proofs of wealth of the unknown suitor represented by the aged servant. The camels are cared for, and the highest acts of hospitality, according to Eastern customs, are performed for the aged servant and his retinue. Beautifully does the old servant state his errand. He declared that he would not eat until he had told his story. He was certainly a faithful steward. This beautiful narrative deeply impresses us with his unswerving devotion to his absent master. He prefers the honor of that master to his own necessary food. Every true servant of God ought to cherish and manifest a similar spirit. We are the representatives of God. We are seeking a bride for Jesus Christ. His honor ought to be dearer to us than the food which perishes. David had similar feelings when he exclaimed, "I will not give sleep to mine eyes, nor slumber to mine eyelids until I find out a place for Jehovah, a habitation for the God of Jacob."

We here enter on the closing portion of this interesting narrative, the account of the return of the servant with Rebekah and Isaac's reception of his bride. It is indeed

A Beautiful Story.

The evidence of divine providence is so marked that the family of Rebekah give consent to her departure. Rebekah herself seems to have no decision in the case, except as regards the time when she shall leave her home to be the bride of the unseen grandee; this is the only instance, according to the narrative, where the exercise of her choice is permitted. Her nurse, Deborah by name, as we afterward learn, went with her. The companionship of the nurse was quite in harmony with the customs of that day and of our day in the Orient. This nurse would remain as her confidential adviser and her faithful attendant. We know that the nurse finally died in the service of her mistress. With entire harmony with the spirit of the times is the blessing which is given as Rebekah departs, the blessing of a boundless offspring and power over all national enemies.

Our thoughts are now fixed upon Isaac, who was at the historic well, known as Beer-lahai-roi. This well, the well of the visible God, has already come before us in sacred story. For a time he was dwelling by this memorable well. Here he was waiting in expectation of meeting his beautiful bride, and while waiting there he went out into the fields at the close of the day to meditate on all God's dealings with him and his family. It was the tranquil hour of twilight; just the time when the soul is most disposed for quiet thought and devout contemplation. He could not have been in a more suitable place or in a more fitting frame of mind to welcome

His Approaching Bride.

Well is it when marriage is entered into in the spirit of earnest thought and devout prayer. Only such marriages may expect to receive and to enjoy the blessing of Almighty God. There is little wonder that the newspapers of our day are filled with accounts of infelicitous marriages, of broken hearts when one remembers the spirit in which this solemn relation is so often entered. Well is it to recognize with the deepest earnestness that "a prudent wife is from the Lord."

Beautiful is the conduct of the charming Rebekah as she approaches her divinely appointed husband. Isaac was walking, and it would have been a breach of Oriental propriety for her to remain on her camel while he was on foot. Doubtless the entire company alighted and walked to meet Isaac, taking Rebekah into the presence of the bridegroom. It is customary still in the East to alight when one is riding if a superior approaches. With becoming modesty and sweetness of demeanor Rebekah covers herself with a vail expressing her submission to her husband, and at the same time concealing the confusion which doubtless she experienced. Tender are the words here given regarding Isaac and his affection toward Rebekah, "and he loved her." It appears that Isaac was the only one of the patriarchs who had no opportunity to exercise a personal preference regarding the choice of his wife. He had never seen his bride until she stood unvailed in his tent as his wife. All the more appropriate, therefore, is the statement here "and he loved her." The joy which he now experienced was a compensation for the sorrow felt in the loss of his mother. Probably there was no formal ceremony in connection with the statement, "and she became his wife," other than his taking her thus in the presence of God and before witnesses as his divinely chosen bride.

Lessons have been suggested in the progress of the exposition already given, but a few more may be briefly named. First, we have in this chapter a beautiful illustration of concerning his people. This providence, according to the ordinary classification, is both general and special. Strictly speaking, however, there are no general providences. All God's providences are particular. Here we see that he cares for individuals, that he directs the choice of husbands and wives, and that he sanctifies the marriage relation. Second, we may learn to imitate Abraham's reasonable solicitude regarding the selection of a wife for Isaac. Marriage with one of the daughters of the Canaanites might have blighted his whole life. It is marvelous that parents will so often sacrifice the comfort of sons and daughters on the altar of Mammon. God is too often left out and marriages are a matter of mere bargain and sale. Third, as Abraham's servant had God's glory in view he expected and received divine direction. His prayer to God is marked by great simplicity and confidence. He leaves the issue with God. In all our ways we are to acknowledge God and then may we expect that he will direct our paths. A halo of glory gathers around this marriage. It is mentioned in the prayer found in one of the prayer books and frequently offered at the marriage ceremony. This circumstances give a glamour of poetry and almost a halo of sanctity to this historic incident. But it is not the most appropriate prayer for such an occasion. The subsequent conduct of Rebekah toward Isaac makes the prayer quite inappropriate. That conduct cannot by any reasonable interpretation be justified. Nevertheless the meeting of Isaac's faithful servant and the beautiful Rebekah at the well will live forevermore in the world's heart. The story will always be heard as a sweet strain of music mingling with that of marriage bells, and the gentle Rebekah meeting her chosen husband will remain in the world's thought as an ideal picture of a modest bride sweetly and joyously giving herself to the man chosen of God as her husband.

A Strange Indian Belief.

Murree Ai the "Cholera Mother," who is Sent to Punish Men.

"THE common people in Western India," writes the Rev. R. A. Hume, Ahmednagar, (as quoted by Mr. Lowe in his book on Medicine Missions), "think that cholera is a punishment sent on men by an evil goddess. As they suppose that it would offend her to call her a bad name, she is called 'Murree Ai,' that is, Cholera Mother. They also think that giving and taking medicine for the disease only excites the Mother still more, and that the only proper way to get rid of the pestilence is to honor the mother, and so induce her to go elsewhere. In all the villages, there are one or two small temples dedicated to the Cholera Mother, in which there are a few shapeless stones painted red. These temples are built near the extreme limits of the town, so that the goddess may stay far from the houses of the people. At the time of an epidemic these are repaired. In most towns there are a few men and women of the lowest castes who are devotees of this goddess, and when cholera is prevalent they get much attention and much profit. Even intelligent men come and ask these ignorant devotees, 'What is the Mother's pleasure? How long does she intend to favor the town with her presence, and what can we do for her?' Then the devotee pretends to go into a kind of trance, and, after a shaking fit, replies that the Mother says that she intends to remain so many days, and would like such and such attentions. These attentions the people gladly show.

"Among the millions of devil-worshipers in Southern India, the following legendary tale accounts for the existence of disease, and indicates the source of deliverance. On a certain day, when celestial food was carried to Siva by some of the inferior gods, the giant Taradan overpowered them, and seizing the repast, devoured it. Siva became very angry at the loss of his meal, and determined to punish the offender. He created the sacred Vedas for the assistance of Pattera-Kalee and Veerapatteram, and delivered them into their hands along with a trident, Siva's emblem and instrument of destruction, directing them to make war with Taradan. They executed their commissions so promptly and effectually, that Siva's enemy was destroyed, to Siva's great delight. Siva was so pleased with their success that he endowed them with unlimited power to inflict all manner of disease, and to kill all on earth who opposed them, or neglected to offer sacrifices at their altars. The consequence was, that many were killed, or grievously afflicted with terrible diseases. This produced great consternation, and led the people to enquire of the priests as to the origin, and the means to be adopted for the removal of these calamities, and they informed them, that although Siva had given the demons the dreadful power which they were exercising, still they might be propitiated if they would offer sacrifices at their shrines; festivals were accordingly established at which bloody sacrifices of sheep, goats, and fowls, with plaintains, flowers, incense, were to be offered, and those who joined in these and similar ceremonies, were promised protection or deliverance if afflicted with disease.

This is an illustration of a few of the thousand superstitious belief that still prevail in India.

A SONG IN THE NIGHT.

"ONE night," says Mr. Proudfoot, "a sailing vessel was becalmed. On board was a sailor lad who had run away from home and had fallen into great sin. During his night watch his thoughts went back to his old home in the far-off highlands of Scotland. He could, in his fancy, see his father and mother and the younger children at family worship. He could hear the chapter read: 'All we like sheep have gone astray.' That was the favorite chapter of his father. And how true it was in his case. The Bible his mother had given him lay unopened in his bundle somewhere. He had never looked at it. Now they were singing a Psalm. Surely that was not imagination! He heard the sweet words come tunefully over the waves. Was he dreaming, or in a trance? There it came, verse after verse, until the whole Psalm was ended, then there was silence. The lad felt as if the influence of the home was upon him again. As soon as his watch was over, he went to his berth, and fishing out his Bible, read that familiar chapter in Isaiah. Then falling upon his knees, he implored forgiveness on his backsliding, and help to stand firm in the future. When morning broke, a ship was in sight; she had been near the whole night, and on board were a number of pious emigrants, who the night before had sung that song which had so affected the sailor lad."

ANCHORED.

I AM anchored to-day on the Border Land,
Lying just on the outskirts of Time;
And my soul oft has longings to cross o'er the tide.
And feed in green pastures and view heaven's side.
And bathe in its heavenly clime.

Some say it is dark in this Border Land,
But no darkness within it I see;
For a glory-light beams through the gate that's ajar.
And the sound of Redemption re-echoes afar,
And my soul struggles hard to be free.

I am patiently waiting to cross o'er the tide,
With no fear of the messenger grim.
Far down in my heart the joy-bells are ringing
And I'm sweetly contented and happy while singing
Softly over and over my life's evening hymn—

My earth sun is sinking, my earthwork is done;
I am toil-worn and weary my goal's nearly won.
I am nearing the river, but the crossing is bright,
And it leads to the city which knows of no night. —MRS. L. CLINE.

THE VOICE OF GOD.

GOD is not dumb, that he should speak no more;
If thou hast wanderings in the wilderness
And find'st not Sinai, 'tis thy soul is poor;
There towers the mountain of the Voice no less.
Which whoso seeks shall find, but he who bends.
Intent on manna still and mortal ends.
Sees not, neither hears its thundered lore.

Slowly the Bible of the race is writ.
And not on paper leaves nor leaves of stone,
Each age, each kindred, adds a verse to it,
Texts of despair or hope, of joy or moan.
While swings the sea, while mists the mountains shroud.
While thunder's surges burst on cliffs of cloud.
Still at the prophet's feet the nations sit.

THE DAY OF THE LORD.

The Distinction between the Coming of the Lord into the Air and His Coming to the Earth.

BY THOMAS NEWBERRY.

ONE of the last utterances of our beloved Lord, ere he ascended from this world unto the Father, in answer to the question of his disciples, "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" was, "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power." (Acts 1: 6, 7.) With regard to the coming of the Son of Man, the Lord himself, in the days of his flesh, told his disciples, "Of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only." (Matt. 24: 36.) "That day" refers to the manifestation of the Son of Man, which ushers in the day of Jehovah to the world. In Psalm 110 we read, "Jehovah said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand until I make thine enemies thy footstool." The Lord Jesus was henceforth expecting the time when the Father should give him the kingdom, according to Psalm 2: 8. In the last chapter of II. Thess. we read, "The Lord"—that is the Lord the Spirit—"direct your heart into the love of God and into the patience of Christ." As Christ is waiting and expecting till the Father's time has come, so we are to share that waiting and expectancy with him.

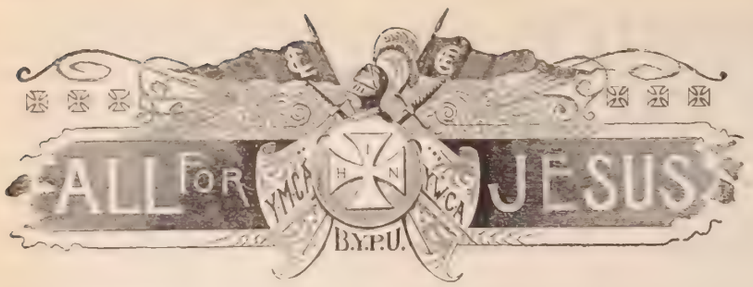
The Lord Jesus is not only waiting for the Kingdom of his father David, and dominion over the whole earth in millennial glory, but the Father has also provided for him a Bride, the Church, as the sharer of that kingdom and glory. As Isaac went out into the field to meditate, lifted his eyes, saw the camels coming, and welcomed the bride Eliezer had gone to bring; so the Lord Jesus is expecting the Comforter to conduct to him his purchased Bride.

"The day of the Lord." Here in the original there is no article before the title Lord, which is the New Testament way of expressing the Hebrew name Jehovah. This day of Jehovah is that of which the prophets so frequently spoke, that great day of God Almighty when he will execute his judgments upon an ungodly world. When the ten kings have assembled around Jerusalem and taken the city, when men are in the heyday of apparent success, expecting to have things all their own way, when they shall say, "Peace and safety," when men have avowedly got rid of God and accepted Satan—got rid of Christ and accepted Antichrist—got rid of the Holy Ghost and accepted the false prophet, effaced from the earth the last trace of the professing church in the form of Babylon the Great, and are attempting to blot out the name of Israel from the earth; at that very moment the sun shall be darkened, the powers of heaven shall be shaken, and then shall be seen the sign of the coming of the Son of Man in heaven; then sudden destruction cometh upon them, and they shall not escape.

All these events are connected with the coming of the Son of Man to the earth, not with his coming to receive the Church; hence says the apostle, "But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief. Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day: we are not of the night, nor of darkness." But if the Church refuses to walk in the light, is slumbering instead of occupying till the Lord comes, then he says in Rev. 3: 3, "If therefore thou shalt not watch, I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee." Those Christians who will not watch, but are occupied with their own dreams of converting the world before he comes, to such his coming will be a surprise. On those who belong to Jesus the true light now shines: they were sometimes darkness, but now light in the Lord; by the indwelling spirit they are associated with the risen Christ in heavenly glory.

As risen with Christ we are children of the day, but as strangers and pilgrims here we are watching for the Morning Star, and, blessed be God, "the night is far spent and the day is at hand," "therefore let us not sleep, as do others; but let us watch and be sober." The Church was given to Christ by the Father in eternity, redeemed by the Son of God in time, and sealed by the Holy Ghost until the day of full redemption. All in whom the Spirit of God dwells when Christ comes, those wise virgins who have oil in their vessels, will go in with him to the marriage, and then the door is shut.

Therefore let us have grace to obey the exhortation, "Wherefore comfort yourselves together, and edify one another, even as also ye do." "And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Faithful is he that calleth you, who also will do it."



BECOMING HARDENED.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing July 30. Acts 19: 9; Mark 16: 9-14

PREACHING has still one of two effects. The hearer is either softened and yields himself to the sweet influences of the Gospel, or he is hardened and resists them. It is a very suggestive thought that even three months' preaching by the great Apostle left some of his hearers in the latter condition. "They believed not but spake evil of that way." Christ himself referred to hearers of this kind, likening them to a much-trodden path. The seed which the sower sowed, fell on the wayside and was carried off by the birds. It did not penetrate and so it took no root. There are many influences which harden a man. A distaste for the Gospel will do it. If the belief gets into the mind that a good moral life is sufficient for salvation, the declaration that no man can save himself, but must admit his helplessness and plead for mercy through Christ, will be humiliating; and the man hardens himself against the Saviour. An indisposition to make the sacrifices demanded by the Gospel will do it. Nothing hardens a man so thoroughly and hopelessly as the knowledge of what is right combined with persistence in doing what is wrong. Conscience is silenced, the wrongdoer is ashamed to pray and he becomes less and less sensitive to the voice of truth. He becomes less able to surrender evil habits, to sever injurious connections, and to give up his own way. And the love of money or pleasure will harden a man. It turns all the faculties of his being in one direction and concentrates them on one object, gradually monopolizing the entire man. Men hardened in some one of these ways may be found in every community and sometimes they are found in the Christian Church. Who has not seen men whom the most pathetic story of want and distress fails to melt? Or men so hardened by educational prejudices as to be impervious to the presentation of some new aspect of truth? From such a condition every one should pray to be delivered. The docility, the child-likeness of the man whom the Holy Spirit is changing day by day into the image of Christ is the condition of being most desirable in the Christian. It is only by the yielding to the divine nature mysteriously imparted to him that he can become what God desires him to be. The wish to fulfil that aim should be ever present in the Christian's mind and heart, accompanied by a dread of any influence within him or around him that is liable to harden him.

A BOND OF WHITE AND RED.

THE King's Daughters are ever finding new spheres, in which the bond of sisterhood in Christ is exerting its power. Miss Frances C. Sparkawk who has charge of the Indian Department writes to the Silver Cross of one King's daughter who, once a student at Hampton, and now a wife in the Indian Territory, has found a sister in a King's daughter in Virginia from whom she has received much kindness. Letters of interest and cheer have gone from the wife in the more favored home to the wife on the reservation and have been very helpful to her as she is surrounded by Indians whom she wishes to help, and yet who are jealous of the better living which she and her husband have arrived at. Nor these only; bright interesting literature has been sent and many other things that bring comfort and make life [illegible] and make it more attractive, not only to the inmates, but also in the eyes of the untrained Indians, who have a natural artistic love of beauty. Magazines and books and pictures, tidies and tablecovers, pretty mats and other things, games for the children, and many things that may be mailed instead of being boxed, all these mean making home more homelike, a more attractive lesson in civilization to the Indians who see it from afar, and may find in it things which they wish to imitate.

Miss Sparkawk has been so much impressed with this sphere of helpfulness that she, and the Committee working with her, propose putting into communication with Indian girls and mothers King's daughters who would like to correspond with them. And in the Indian schools, also, the poorer of which are bare and bleak enough, there is opportunity for the same kind of work. Every special case varies a little, and the needs may be best known individually. And this individual touch is the real knowledge and laying on of hands.

"But there is something beyond these adornments that may also be done," says Miss Sparhawk. "This Indian of whom I am speaking can do beautiful Indian embroidery. This she could sell only at the trader's store, where she received, not money, but barter, and where a very small price was allowed for this beautiful work. This the King's Daughter of Virginia discovered in the course of correspondence, and through her husband's influence, has been able to secure a market among the merchants in the place where she lives; so that now the Indian may sell her gloves and moccasins and other work, at a fair remuneration, and at the same time is able to place them where they will be seen and appreciated, and where orders may come to her for more work instead of to the Indian trader. This Indian woman is herself reaching out in helpfulness. She wishes to establish a sewing circle, and this King's Daughter is going to help her. She will probably find others to join her in her work."

THE NEW BUILDING OF THE Y. M. C. A. IN PARIS, FRANCE.

THE Y. M. C. A. OF PARIS.

A FEW weeks ago we published a description of the new building of the Young Men's Christian Association in the French capital with a report of the dedication ceremonies. Through the kindness of Mr. Thomas K. Cree, Secretary of the International Committee, we are now enabled to publish a picture of the building. It stands on the Rue Trevise and is plain, substantial and well arranged. It contains a gymnasium in the basement, with baths, bicycle and running tracks and athletic equipment. On the floors above, are the library, reading-rooms, class-rooms, auditorium, officers' rooms and a restaurant for the use of the members.

The programme of the institution shows that the managers have thoroughly kept in mind the object of the work, which, as they state it, is, "the religious, moral, intellectual and physical development of young men." There are meetings every day in the week for Bible study, or for prayer, or for secular education. Among the subjects embraced in the latter department are stenography, music and the Spanish and English languages. French young men are notified that any young man is eligible for membership whose private life is in harmony with the principles of Christianity and that none will be excluded on the ground of nationality or religious denomination. At the time of entering in possession of its new home the Association had a membership of seven hundred, which by this time is probably largely increased. As previously stated, a large part of the cost of the new building was defrayed by Mr. James Stokes of New York.

THE B. Y. P. U. TREASURER.

WE have much pleasures in publishing the accompanying portrait of a very valuable officer of the Baptist Young People's Union. Mr. J. O. Staples the treasurer of the organization, is a leader in the truest sense of the word, and has not confined his efforts on behalf of the Union to the mere routine of its financial department. His heart and soul are in the work and he has put a great deal of time and labor into it. With him his service has been a labor of love born of love of young people and a yearning for souls.

As may be inferred from the office confided to his care, Mr. Staples is a business man and has been in business from his youth up. After graduating from a first class commercial school he entered the service of a firm at Cambridge, Mass., as book-keeper. At that time he was only sixteen years of age. From 1882 to 1885, he served as Editor of the Temple Censer, after which came a removal to Omaha, Neb., where he became private secretary to a member of Congress. Subsequently he obtained a position in the business department of the Omaha Herald. In 1890 he was invited to become Secretary and Treasurer of a business house in Chicago, which position he still occupies. During the first two years after settling in Chicago, he resided at Evanston, and upon removal from that place the Church, when granting a letter of dismissal, unanimously voted to tender him a licence to preach. Young people's societies have been something of a hobby with Mr. Staples, for it was largely through the influence of young people that he was led into the Kingdom. Shortly after uniting with the Tremont Temple Church, in Boston, he with others brought about the organization of the Young Men's Temple Union. The young ladies followed the example by organizing the Young Ladies' Floral Union, and after a time the two were merged into one. At Omaha the church officers were opposed to a young people's society, but Mr. Staples finally induced the deacons to consent to a young people's prayer-meeting, which proved so beneficial that an organization was permitted. In 1889, he delivered an address at the Nebraska Baptist State Convention upon young people's work and societies, and the outcome was an organization of the Nebraska Baptist Young People, of which Mr. Staples was elected Vice-President, under a constitution recognizing all young people's societies, of whatever name, if connected with a Baptist church in that State, the plan which was later adopted by the Baptist International Organization. When the B. Y. P. U., of Chicago was organized, in the summer of 1890, Mr. Staples was one of the charter members, and he was elected First Vice-President.

In 1890, an article from his pen, pleading for National organization, which appeared in the Standard, brought forth a strong reply in opposition; and the discussion which followed led to a meeting at the Immanuel Baptist Church, during the session of the May Anniversaries of that year in Chicago, when a committee was appointed to formulate plans. Mr. Staples was made Treasurer of the Executive Committee having in charge the calling of the first International Convention of Baptist Young People, and has served the resultng organization, the Baptist Young People's Union of America, in that capacity for two years. In 1888 his attention was called to the need of some plan whereby young men could use their leisure time in preparing for the ministry without the attendance at a seminary, which to many seems an insurmountable barrier, together with plans for evangelizing work by lay preachers, and has since given much time to correspondence and speaking upon these themes. In recognition of his efforts in that direction he was made an honorary member of the Lay Preachers' Association, which was organized at Tremont Temple in 1892. During the past year he has preached between thirty-five and forty sermons, besides giving lectures and young people's addresses.

The Family and Home Circle

"God's Providence House."

The Quaint old Building in Chester, England, that Marks where the Plague was Stayed.

ENGLAND has many quaint, old-fashioned cities within her borders, but probably none more attractive than the ancient town of Chester on the river Dee. This is really one of the oldest and most famous of English cities. It is built quadrant-shape, its four walls—a relic of Roman times— surrounding an enclosure about half a mile square, and its numerous gates and towers vividly recalling the age when every considerable city was fortified in like fashion. A stone bridge with a single span 200 feet in length is, next to a bridge over the Danube, the largest of the kind in Europe.

Visitors to Chester, while they may admire quaint attractiveness and the loveliness of its surroundings, naturally turn to the antiquities of the place. The venerable cathedral is exceptionally fine, and "Julius Cæsar's Tower," which is a wing or adjunct of Chester Castle, is a piece of architecture of a very remote age. Of more recent date, but hardly less interesting are several seventeenth century houses in Lower Bridge Street and the odd-looking structure on Watergate Street, known as "God's Providence House." This strange, fantastic edifice, like many other houses in Chester, has a striking front, which is studded with small, lattice-like windows in so many different designs as to produce a grotesque effect. The top is Gothic, but the rest of the building is a speci s of mixed architecture, not unlike that seen in some old German and Dutch cities. This house, which is shown in the illustration, is said to have received its peculiar name from the fact at that point, the plague which was then devastating England, was stayed, and in commemoration of this event the legend: "God's Providence is mine Inheritance" was inscribed on the front wall above the roomy balcony. The "God's Providence House," which is a favorite resort of visitors, was reconstructed in 1892, on the old lines, and presents to-day the same appearance it had three hundred years ago.

Bird-life in the Country.

AT this season of the year the woods, morning and evening, are alive with the song of birds. There is no more interesting or humanizing study for the young folks than bird-life, and an informal ornithological class, holding its sessions in wood, garden or orchard, under an intelligent instructor, would result in opening up to the juvenile minds a new world of interest and beauty.

Apart from the scientific side of the subject, there is a wealth of poetry and legend concerning the bird-world, that cannot fail to interest the children. There is the pretty legend of the robin, "God's bird," as the ancients called it, because, the story says, it plucked a thorn from the cruel crown pressed upon the head of our Saviour, and in doing so wounded its own breast. The wren, so says another legend, is chased on a certain day on account of its betraying the Saviour by chattering in a clump of bushes. It is called the king of all birds, because it concealed itself beneath the wing of the eagle when that lordly bird claimed supremacy by soaring highest. "Here I am," said the wren, mounting above the eagle's head when the latter could go no higher. The wagtail is called the "imp's bird," for no other reason, than that it cleverly evades the missiles thrown at it. The raven is ranked in the category of ominous birds. With the ancient Greeks the magpie was supposed to possess the soul of a gossiping woman. Sparrows, larks and plovers are on friendly terms with the good people everywhere.

The poets, too, have invested some of the sweetest warblers with the desire for child companionship and love, while they tell us that the linnet, yellow-hammer and thrush sing to remind us of dear ones gone to the better land. These, of course, are merely poetical fancies, but they are amusing and have come to be recognized as in a measure interpreting bird character and speech, just as another fanciful art has been employed in constructing a "language of flowers." The more spiritual interpretation is that given by Rev. Dr. Talmage in a recent sermon: "It is a divinely taught song. From the time that the first bird's throat was fashioned on the banks of the Gihon and Hiddekel until to-day on the Hudson or Rhine, the winged creature has learned nothing from the human race in the way of carol or anthem. The feathered songsters learned all their music direct from God."

Two Kinds of Fashions.

THE fashions on earth and those in heaven are widely different. To be in the fashion in heaven, we must have on us the fine linen of the saints, clean and white. Very many who are entirely out of fashion here will appear in full dress and in the best fashion in heaven. We can afford to be out of fashion here even at the expense of being considered quaint and old fogyish, if we may but be in the highest style of fashion in the New Jerusalem. We may be in the fashion here to-day, but we do not know but we will be out of fashion in but a short time. Fashion mongers here have a troublesome and an expensive time in keeping in the fashion, but white robes will forever be the fashion in the glory land. Fashion here is so changeable and ofttimes so ridiculous that it is no mortification that we are not in the fashion. There is room to fear that some here are so absorbed about being in the fashion that they do not think much of being in fashion in the heavenly home. Surely none of us want to be in fashion where people do forever weep and wail and gnash their teeth. Let us see to it that we get our white robes and be sure of being in the fashion in heaven.

"Folded Up!"

YOUR task is ended for the day. You have finished your book, or your dress-making or your work at the shop or factory. It is well done, and you say: "There: that's finished and folded up." Still, you have finished and folded up something more important—something that will not be unfolded again for ages, perhaps; and yet you will see it again with every line and fold. Your day's history is done and gone from your keeping. You may do the work over again, re-read the book, or remodel the dress if it does not please you; but you cannot change one jot or tittle of the day's record. What has the record been? Do you feel disposed to say in your heart: "I wish I had spoken pleasantly to brother when he wished me to help him with his flag? It would only have taken me a minute or two, and he was first sad and then vexed with my crossness. It is too bad! I left mother to do all her baking alone, and did not even prepare the dessert for her, in my haste to finish my dress." A sight of a little Bible, whose clasp had been closed all day, suggested still more reproachful thoughts. "No wonder I have such a poor day's record, when I began it in too much haste for prayer, or reading a verse even." Such a day will not remain "folded up," no matter how hard we try.

"A Little Way Down Street."

MY boy, you came in rather late last night, and this morning, when your mother asked where you were, you said, "down street." writes Robert G. Burdette. Then when she asked whereabouts, you said, "Oh, just a little ways." Here is your home, this bright little spot like a star on the map. The sweetest, purest, safest place this side of heaven; the home where, from father to baby, they love you better than all the rest of the big, wide world. Now, when you start from here and go down street, somehow the street always has a down grade from home when you sneak out after night. See how far you get from respectability and self-respect, when you reach this corner, "just a little ways down," where you loitered last night. You had to meet them here, because you can never meet them in your home, for two reasons. In the first place, your father wouldn't permit one of them to come into his house, and in the second place you would be ashamed to invite them there, whether your father forbade it or not. It is a long ways from your respectable home, from your mother's friends and your father's guests, to this corner down street, isn't it?

"GOD'S PROVIDENCE HOUSE," CHESTER, ENGLAND.

Then—look on the map, my boy—see how far it is from manliness? Don't you know your mind will never again be as pure and innocent as it was before you went "just a little way down street" last night? While you were listening to stories, punctuated with profanity, the dear ones at home gathered in the sitting-room, your father opened the Book, and read. They knelt at the family altar and commended themselves to the keeping of the heavenly Father, and tenderly remembered the boy who was "just a little way down street." Then the lights went out one by one, the house was still, and only the loving mother waited anxiously and sleeplessly for the boy who was down street. It was more than ten million miles away from the sweet old chapter that your father read, down to the stories that you heard, my boy. And what a steep grade all the way down! Keep off the street after night, my boy. Other people will think better of you, and what is a far more important thing, you will think much better of yourself.

THE SECRET OF HAPPINESS.

ARE you almost disgusted
With life, little man?
I will tell you a wonderful trick
That will bring you contentment
If anything can—
Do something for somebody, quick;
Do something for somebody, quick!

Are you awful tired
With play, little girl?
Weary, discouraged, and sick?
I'll tell you the loveliest
Game in the world—
Do something for somebody, quick;
Do something for somebody, quick!

Though it rains like the rain
Of the flood, little man,
And the clouds are forbidding and thick,
You can make the sun shine
In your soul, little man—
Do something for somebody, quick;
Do something for somebody, quick!

Though the skies are like brass
Overhead, little girl,
And the walk like a well-heated brick;
And all earthly affairs
In a terrible whirl?
Do something for somebody, quick;
Do something for somebody, quick!

THE MODEL WIFE.

THOSE elements that go to make up a model wife, writes Rev. Dr. Thorpe, of Hartford, Ct., are usually quite as important to be found in the model husband, and here let me say that the model wife makes herself an interested partner in all the affairs of the husband. Not to be supported, but to support, in every laudable way by sympathy, commendation, and real and manifest interest should be the constant aim of the wife. The model wife will try to make the home the best and brightest place on the earth for the husband. The home may be humble, but it can be clean and bright with the light of love. The wife should study the art of home-making, which enables the husband to say: "Home is always where my wife is."

The model wife makes herself an intelligent companion of her husband. She sets out to know something of the husband's daily work, mechanical or professional, and studies to comprehend somewhat the scope of thought upon which his mind is, for the most part, severely bent. She studies to make herself attractive to her husband; especially does she do this quite as much after marriage.

Many a wife was a perfect butterfly before marriage, who, through neglect of her personal attire, becomes quite uncomely, not to say repulsive after marriage. The model wife always puts on her company attire for her husband. She never allows herself to talk to others of the frailties of her husband. That the husband has frailties, makes mistakes, comes short of the highest ideal, will doubtless be quite apparent to all; it is not necessary nor best that the wife should go peddling them along the street or among the neighbors.

The model wife will always avoid the habit or spirit of fault finding. Probably there will be enough to criticize, faults plenty if you look for them, but it rarely pays to dwell upon them or make them to appear prominent in the home life. Better to forget and forgive. The model wife is a Christian wife. She has come to love God, the giver of all good, and she desires and tries to follow Jesus Christ, his son, the highest model of human life. She is richly possessed of the spirit of charity and she lives, or tries to so live, that she can take her husband along to heaven.

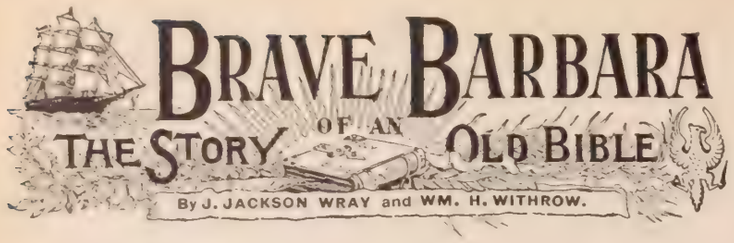
Little Beginnings.

"THE beginning of strife is where one letteth out water," says the wisest of men in the Proverbs which he set in order for us. Matchless gems of wisdom they are! Every youth and maiden would be the stronger and the more capable for the tasks and temptations of life who mastered the Book of Proverbs, and who would begin each day's duties with one or more of the Proverbs of Solomon freshly in their memories. Perhaps an hour, or less than that would be amply sufficient, in any day's life to show that what he says of the beginning of a quarrel is just what it was in his day. The "beginning" was like that little rill that came gently trickling from its rocky bed. It was so gentle that you would not have been afraid to place a baby's hand beneath it to catch it as it fell. But wait a little until that rill has gathered strength and size and has gone rolling down the hill. It will sweep everything in its way, and you can no more stop it than you can an express train.



CHAPTER XIX.

RECONCILIATION.

BETTER than any argument or expostulation the passages which Barbara read to young Pemberton showed him his duty in the hard circumstances in which he was placed. Union with Gracie must be put out of his mind for the present. Providence might open the way later, but until it was opened, the less she was in his mind the better.

As Barbara turned over the sacred pages and read out each passage in turn, she lifted her clear, expressive blue eyes to the face of the young man seated by her side, and spake no word. It was not needed; Reginald Pemberton's head sank lower and lower on his breast, and the big tears began to creep down his weather-tanned and haggard cheeks. Closing the book, she reverently laid it in its place again.

It was not without strong effort that the young evangelist could command his voice to overmaster the rising choking in his throat, or hold back the tears that dimmed the moving lines. He succeeded, however, and in firm tones and clear, that voiced his answer in a word, he said: "Amen!"

"Amen!" said Brave Barbara, taking his two hands in hers, and mingling her tears with his, which now flowed freely. Then they knelt together, and Barbara, true Deborah of the Canadian wilderness, commended this young captain of the Lord's hosts, to the care and keeping of the living God. She prayed, too, that his father's heart might open wide, and his arms be outstretched to take him home again: and somehow or other they both arose refreshed and confident. That night, Reginald Pemberton once again bestrode his trusty steed, his saddle-bags stored with hospitable supplies by the motherly hands of Brave Barbara; and before the silent stars, which had watched his nocturnal travels, had paled into the light of the returning sun, the young evangelist was again far on his way to fulfil the "appointments" that awaited him in his distant home. But this time the tedious journey was lightened and gladdened by the strengthened loyalty to duty which had come to him; ay, and by the hope that his father and Gracie Heck might be brought again within the circle of his horizon. It was not very long after this, that Daniel Dunham, the youthful and popular Elder who had charge of the settlements on the St. Lawrence, found that his brother Losee's removal had led him to double his own visits to the Pemberton mansion, and not altogether on pastoral work intent. The fact is that he was gradually being drawn under the spell of the attractions of Miss Blanche. Quite as often as his duty would permit, he sought her society. That admirable young lady, it must be confessed, found in his presence and conversation a pleasure different from any which the rustic community of the settlement supplied her.

Elder Dunham, as I have said, was a man of superior parts. He was "an eloquent man," and it is said that is something that usually attracts the feminine mind. He was, moreover, an exceedingly well-read man, and by extensive travel and intercourse with many minds of different walks and ranks of life, was "splendid company." The habit of introspection and self-communion, peculiar perhaps to those early Methodist evangelists in the isolations of the backwoods wilderness, soon revealed to Daniel that he had fallen helplessly in love with Blanche Pemberton. In the days of his collegiate life at [illegible] with William Losee, the truth had fairly dawned upon him, he would himself have said "hopelessly;" but now, with something more of a fair field before him, he was not inclined to say "hopelessly," though it was a venturesome thing to try after.

He was a manly fellow, and like a true man, in this matter as in all, he was "straight as a die;" and when the self-revelation was clear to him, he at once declared his sentiments to the parents of his chosen one. From her mother he received, if not encouragement, at least, an answer that was not likely to be accounted a sufficient negative to debar his further efforts.

"I do not see in it either the fitness of things or—but I would never attempt to coerce my daughter's affections," said Mrs. Pemberton, hesitating to speak more fully. She was not without a vein of tender romance in her gentle nature. "Blanche's heart is a woman's kingdom, which she must rule for herself. Her happiness is at stake, and she must decide for herself; and I do believe that she is a child of God, who will seek guidance of him."

"That, indeed, is all that I desire, dear madam," said Daniel honestly and earnestly; and then, with proud humility he went on, "I know that I am unworthy of her, I have nothing to offer her for the priceless gift of her love but a heart that will never fail in its devotion, and that will ever account her happiness dearer than its own."

"No woman can have more; no true woman can wish for more," said this wise woman. "I desire no more for her than the love of a true and faithful heart." Then, naturally enough, other thoughts and considerations arose in her mind, and she added, "but I am sure you will see that—that"—here she paused and the entrance of the Colonel, her husband, suspended the necessity for further words.

From that gentleman, however, Elder Dunham met with a very different reception. In most respectful and yet manly fashion, Daniel told the Colonel of his love, and begged his parental permission to speak to the fair Blanche.

"What!" thundered the irascible Colonel. "Surely the force even of Methodist impertinance and audacity can no further go! I marvel that even you can forget the barriers of means, rank and position that would make such a thing preposterous! Beside all that and fifty thousand other things," continued the irate parent, rising from his seat and striking the table with his clenched fist, "is it not enough to steal from me my son, but you must try to rob me of my daughter also? No, sir, I will not give my consent, and I forbid the girl to think of such a thing, or indeed of seeing you at all, unless you give me your word of honor that you will never broach to her any such ridiculous idea."

Now, no man likes to have the true homage of his heart treated in that sort of way. "Preposterous," "ridiculous," and the like of that, will never do with men of Daniel Dunham's calibre. Daniel instantly replied, looking at at the speaker, strong and calm:

"I cannot undertake to give any such promise, sir; and I will tell you frankly that I shall feel more than justified in winning your daughter's affections if I can."

"What!" exclaimed the choleric old gentleman. "Will you beard me to my face? I'll keep the girl under lock and key, if necessary, to prevent her linking her fortunes with those of a wandering circuit rider who is without house and home."

"The point mainly to be considered," said Daniel, "is whether I have her love; the rest is easy. God will provide us with house and home. He ever cares for his workmen and his work."

"Blanche has too much of her father's spirit," said the Colonel, haughtily, "to degrade herself by such a lackland marriage."

"Miss Pemberton will never do aught unbecoming her father's daughter," said the Elder; and, bowing respectfully, if somewhat stiffly, left the house. He was not the man to give up lightly a quest so dear to his heart. But he was a good deal embarrassed. He could hardly enter the house again after such words as he had heard; he could not enlist Mrs. Pemberton's influence with her daughter against her husband's will. He would do nothing clandestine. Yet it was right that Blanche should know the truth. He wrote her a manly letter avowing his love.

"I do not ask for your answer now," he concluded. "Take time for reflection and for prayer. They are well guided whom God guides, and neither you nor I will do otherwise than hold him by the hand. I will have patience, and I have hope."

This letter he enclosed, unsealed, in a note to her mother, requesting her to read it and to hand it to her daughter. In less than an hour after she had read the lover's missive, she came forth from her mother's room with a new light in her eyes.

"Mother," said she, with an ingenuous blush, "I love him dearly, and I have loved him long."

"Then what answer shall I send him?" her mother said, with evident goodwill and with little surprise, for she had long surmised the truth.

"Only this," said Blanche, handing her mother her Bible. It was a dainty volume, bound in purple velvet, with golden clasps—a birthday present from her mother in the happy Virginian days that preceded the cruel war. "Only this. He will understand. We must wait till God opens the way."

Daniel Dunham sat in "the prophet's chamber" in Barbara Heck's hospitable home. He had not asked an immediate answer, but was nervously anxious and excited. All he could do was to pace up and down the floor and wonder and wish.

"What's come to the Elder to-day?" said Paul Heck to Brave Barbara. "He never went on like this before. He looks pale and worried. I wonder what is the matter with him."

Now, Brave Barbara had long entertained a strong suspicion as to how matters really stood between the preacher and the Colonel's handsome daughter, and with her usual ready intuition she jumped at once to the right conclusion.

"It won't last long," she said, with a quiet smile. "The complaint he's suffering from is under treatment. He is in good hands, and will win a cure."

So it proved. Daniel unfolded the dainty parcel which had been instantly dispatched. A leaf had been turned down in the Bible, and its pages fell open at these words—there was no written line, only a pencil mark to direct the reader's eye—"Where thou goest I will go; and where thou lodgest I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God. The Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me." In this fashion the happy suitor was made to know that he had prospered in his suit.

The call to duty sent the zealous and well-contented Daniel to the other end of his vast circuit through the backwoods, but as he rode along the miry forest trail, a fair presence seemed to brighten his pathway, and an echo new to woodland sounds fell upon his ear—"Where thou goest, I will go." For weary weeks, and even months, he had no word from the object of his devotion. Whenever he preached at "the settlement," every member of the Colonel's household was conspicuously absent, by the stern Squire's imperative orders. The one exception was that of Uncle Jule, who, with a courage worthy of his imperial namesake, was not to be deprived "ob de means ob grace." The old negro occasionally found an opportunity to give the Elder a word of cheer as to the object of his anxiety.

"De Co'r'n'l is powfu' sabige, but the deah Missy Blanche is de same as eber." Daniel understood and smiled.

The cross-grained and cross-tempered Colonel Pemberton grew worse and worse to manage; and the families on the farms through all the settlement had found reason to regret the same.

"I think the squire hates Methodism more and more," said Paul Heck to his wife; "and I think he's surely beginning to hate mankind. He spites me dreadfully for lending Master Reginald my colt, and only yesterday he looked at me so glum, and spoke so sour, I really thought he would strike me with his whip."

"Things are coming to a crisis with the Colonel," said Brave Barbara, speaking very seriously. "I have seen that for some weeks past. Mrs. Pemberton fairly saddens me to see the grief and sorrow in her eyes. I think something will 'strike' the Colonel. What the 'whip' will be I cannot tell; but I think and hope that it will be a healing chastisement, though the blows may be heavy."

Strange to say, the words of this Deborah of the forest were a true prophecy. One day, very late in the month of November, the Colonel, with his hired men, were rafting timber down the river for a barn which he meant to build during the ensuing winter. The steersman blundered, and the raft was driven by the rapid current against a sunken rock. By the force of the blow and strain it was sent to pieces, and the men, including, of course, the choleric Colonel, were thrown into the river. Fortunately it happened near the shore, and all lives were saved. But the immersion in the ice-cold water, after the overheat of strong exercise, and, it must be confessed of wrathful temper, too, brought on the Colonel a severe attack of rheumatic fever. This eventually assumed a typhoid character, and brought him, through a dispensation of intense suffering, to the very door of death.

Needless to say, the Colonel was now more difficult than ever to do anything with, thanks to the excruciating agonies that racked his frame. The patient, gentle, loving attentions of his wife and daughter, however, gradually wrought a change in the sick man's frame of mind. So weak and ill was he that for some days it was very dubious as to whether he had even a chance of life. The two loving nurses watched, like ministering angels, by his bed, and a whole flood of wholesome and transforming thoughts came to him on his couch of pain.

"You make me ashamed of myself, my poor, patient Griselda," he said, on one occasion, in a weak whisper, "I am nothing but a great helpless and fretful baby, and you nurse me as tenderly as a mother her firstborn?"

"You are more than a firstborn to me," she said, laying her gentle hand on his pallid brow.

"I've been very, very wrong, dear wife," he said. "Will you forgive me?" and, taking her hand, he pressed it to his lips, and she felt the tear of compunction fall upon it. Over this she rejoiced with exceeding joy, remembering the apostolic words, "For what knowest thou, oh, wife! whether thou shalt save thy husband?"

The next morning, before the break of day, for the mother and daughter took turn about by the sick man's bed, Blanche took her station by her father's side.

"Blanche, my darling," said the suffering penitent, "you must let me ask you to forgive my unkind and—"

Her fingers were laid gently on his lips, and then she placed there her own, thus effectively checking her father's confession. No sooner was the silent compact sealed, than the Colonel said, speaking softly, for his strength was small:

"Blanche, my love, send for Redgie. Tell him I want him, need him, and to lose no time."

"Oh, my father!" said she, all but overpowered with strong feeling. "You are so good—"

"Alas, no. I'm not good," he replied with quivering lips; "but if I am spared—" and again the sentence was checked by the delighted Blanche.

That very night a joyful surprise awaited them. Brave Barbara had, as usual, lost no time in doing the deed that was kind and good and fitting. The Colonel's serious illness had given her work to do—in her closet with her God, with Mrs. Pemberton as a precious and sympathetic friend, and with Reginald, who was dear to her heart. It was she who had sent a special messenger to her son Jacob, to bring the surprise about. The early nightfall came dark and cloudy, and the winter wind moaned through the forest trees. The rain fell in pattering gusts against the window panes. In the dark eyes of the suffering Colonel, darker by contrast with his white face and snowy hair, as he lay propped upon his pillow, there was a wistful and anxious look. He felt that he had much to do to put many wrongs right again. And it seemed to him that his time was short. Was he thinking of his boy, too, whom he had driven into the stormy wild?

By-and-by, there were loud shouts of gladness and recognition, and a whole band of voices giving vent in their own peculiar fashion of unmistakable delight, then the door opened, and Reginald and his father were once again together. There is no need for me to describe the meeting between son and parent. The Colonel's words may well suffice.—"Welcome, my boy, thrice welcome to your father's house and to your father's heart. Forgive me, Redgie, forgive me, as I trust God forgives me!"

The young "round" preacher seemed to have changed from a boy into a man. There was a stamp of deeper thought upon his face, and a graver air told of the discipline of life.

"Thank God for the affliction which has made us again a united household!" said the Colonel, as he gazed upon the faces of his loved ones. "God has dealt with me in mercy, not in anger. His chastisements have been blessings in disguise."

The proud man was humbled. Like Peter on the house-top, he had learned not to call anything "common or unclean." When a man comes near death, he is apt to get a new way of looking at differences of rank and station. Even Elder Dunham, without a home, did not seem to the Colonel so much beneath him as he did before. His boy Redgie had perhaps made a better choice of occupation than might appear on the face of it. Anyhow, the Colonel was in the mood to acquiesce in it now and Redgie could intercede for Dunham.

OFF FOR THE POLAR SEAS.

able voyage across Greenland in 1889; but his present expedition, as he explains it, has a different purpose. He says:

"There are no points of similarity between Peary's expedition and mine. Mine is to pass the Pole and traverse the unknown Polar regions. There is not much interest in merely reaching the mathematical North Pole. Lieut. Peary's work last year was marvelously well done. His skirting of the northern limits of the inland ice of Greenland is a matter of the highest scientific importance, as hitherto no one knew how far those Arctic wastes extended in that direction. He reached a point on the east coast of Greenland much further north than that touched by any previous explorer. The object of my expedition is of course purely scientific. The expeditionary party consists of twelve men all told. I am in absolute command, and everybody on board, scientists or sailors, will have to obey me implicitly. There cannot be more than one will in such an undertaking as this."

Nansen's ship, the Fram, (Forward) is a curiosity, being built specially with a view to resisting or rather avoiding the impact of the polar icebergs. He hull is V-shaped (the ordinary vessel being U-shaped), and her commander claims that this peculiarity in her construction will enable her to slide upward if "nipped" by the icepack, instead of being caught by the ribs and crushed, a fate that has befallen many polar exploring ships in the past. The Fram is a stanchly-built steamer, with ample sail to eke out when high speed is desired. Beside the crew, the Fram will carry a small party of scientific men and icepilots and harpooners. She is also equipped with a captive balloon service. Dr. Nansen's plan is to sail to Nova Zembla, revictual there and thence sail to the Kara Sea, and along the coast of Siberia to the river Lena. Thereafter he will proceed in a northerly direction along the western coast of Kotelnai Island, of the new Siberian group,and push on in that course until stopped by the ice. The Fram will remain in the ice-pack for the winter until the next open season, when she will gradually resume her course, working slowly to the northward, and thus, as Dr. Nansen explains: "assisted by nature, instead of fighting against her, we expect to be taken by the drifting of the ice floes right across the Polar region down into the East Greenland Sea, between Spitzbergen and Greenland, having in this way reached and passed the Pole."

This programme is so fraught with peril to the ship and her entire crew that, were her commander a less experienced and far-seeing arctic sailor than Nansen, little hope would be entertained of ever seeing the Fram in Norway again. She carries provisions for five years. Two-thirds of the expenses of the expedition are to be paid by the Norwegian government, King Oscar having been the first contributor to the fund for that purpose. The balance has been subscribed privately, the Royal Geographical Society being one of the principal donors. Dr. Nansen expects to be absent at least two years. A picture of his vessel, the Fram, has already appeared in this journal..

Mrs. Peary (whose portrait is given on this page) accompanies her husband, as on their former voyage. She is a young woman of great courage, bright, vivacious, and intellectual. Few women would voluntarily undertake what she is about to face,but Mrs. Peary will be sustained by her love and faith in her brave husband and by her firm trust in a Higher Power. She has made abundant preparations for her arctic housekeeping. Her ordinary dress (indicated in the portrait), will consist of a cloak of deer skin, tanned on the inside,and slipped on over the head. It has a thick, furlined hood and when adjusted only the eyes, nose and month are seen. Her other garments will be reindeer skin, thickly lined, and her shoes are kamiks or Esquimau moccasins. She is a hardy traveler, quick on snowshoes or "skis" and a capital shot with the rifle.

It is a matter for congratulation that the days when arctic explorations were undertaken in blind hardihood and without specific object have passed away, and that the later journeys of Peary, Nansen and other travelers may be confidently expected to add to the general store of human wisdom and practical knowledge, instead of swelling the long, dark list of arctic tragedies. If their efforts result in enlightening future generations concerning that unknown region, of which it is written in Job 26:7: "He stretcheth out the north over the empty place and hangeth the earth upon nothing," they will not have undertaken their perilous voyages in vain.

All contributions in aid of the Girls' Lodging House will be acknowledged in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The great need of an institution of this character is every day more apparent. In the course of her mission work in the slums, Mrs. Williamson is constantly brought into contact with lost girls, whose reformation would be much more readily and permanently accomplished were there a permanent lodging house where they could be placed immediately after being rescued from the streets. Some of the letters she receives from girls who have, by divine grace, been led to a changed life, are extremely touching. One writes:

HOBOKEN, N. J., July 1, 1893.

DEAR SISTER IN CHRIST:—How I thank God for saving me, when he did; for by his grace I am what I am. It took as much of the grace of God to save me as it would to save those poor girls in ———'s dive. I thank God for opening my eyes after you spoke to me in the Florence Mission, nearly five years ago. I have looked to God, and in his wonderful way he brought me out. Your Sister,

MAGGIE M. E.

Another girl writes as follows:

NEW YORK, July 1, 1893.

DEAR SISTER IN CHRIST:—I feel led to write to you. You have often heard me say what God had saved me from. I had been a thief since I was thirteen years old and not only a drunkard,but a drunkard-maker. Still,through all my sinful life, my sainted mother's prayers followed me. Oh, how I thank God to-day for the Florence Night Mission! For it was there that God broke my stubborn heart by his love, and God has kept me ever since. He has led me through many strange paths, through trials and temptations, and kept me safe, because I did not make the mistake of trying to take care of Jesus, but have let him take care of me. Yours in our blessed Master,

TYPICAL WESTERN SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

AT Pullman, Washington, a missionary of the American Sunday School Union, visited a community which had a singing school on Sundays where a song book was used instead of a hymn-book. They would congregate and sing a few songs, and then discuss political matters and arrange a dance. He visited all the homes in the district, called a meeting, held preaching services and succeeded in organizing a large Sunday School. The man who was chosen Superintendent said to him at the close of the first meeting "I have not heard but two sermons in six years."

At Fort Scott, Kan., the school-house is a log hut, without windows. The teachers name is Constant. The missionary said to a smart little black girl of nine years of age,

"Can you tell me who made the world?"

Promptly she replied, "Mr. Constant."

At Olla, La., one Sunday as the missionary went to Sunday School he overtook a woman with a year-old baby on her shoulder, Indian-fashion, and four others walking before her. She said:

"Four miles is a long walk to carry a baby, but if I keep well, I don't intend to miss a lesson."

At Carrollton, Ga., is a Sunday School which was organized by a missionary three years ago, in a little log-house in the midst of the piney woods. The people were poor and ignorant, and the children growing up in ignorance and sin. There had never been a Sunday School in the community. He visited the families in the neighborhood and wrote:

"I found poverty and ignorance and sin on every hand, several families without a Bible or Testament, and many who had never heard a Gospel sermon preached. There were some people over fifty years old who could not read, and who had never been in school. I found only four professing Christians in the community, who would agree to assist in a Sunday School,but with these as a nucleus the work was undertaken and the school started. The people were so poor that I had to give the supplies to start them out of my own salary. On a recent visit I found that a great change had been wrought in the community. They now have a neat new school house, the families are all supplied with the Word of God, a prayer-meeting is held and is well attended, a good Sunday School is kept up winter as well as summer." At Hendersonville, N. C., in one primary meeting there were fifty-seven children who had no Sunday School books, nine were from homes destitute of the Bible, and thirty-four unable to write their own names. But they all voted "Yes, yes, sir, we want a Sunday School right now, sir!" A special appointment in another settlement drew together quite a crowd of colored people. An old colored brother spoke in behalf of his people. In reply to the inqury as to what they needed in order to start a school, he said: "O my brudder, you is already seed we is need ebryting—got nothin' heah 'ceptin' dese yere children an' dese yere benches; no book, no paper, an' we dunno how to gin de fus' step."

AN EMPEROR IN A KITCHEN.

A EUROPEAN journalist tells a remarkable story about the Emperor, Alexander II., of Russia, the father of the present Czar. He says that in his youth, before he came to the throne, one of his tutors was the celebrated philosopher La Harpe, to whom Alexander was much attached. One day the young prince, in preparing his lessons came to a difficulty he could not solve and instead of waiting for La Harpe's visit to the palace, walked over to his house and went, as his habit was, unattended.When he arrived, a servant newly engaged by La Harpe opened the door and not knowing the prince asked his name. The prince answered "Alexander." The porter then led him into the servants' hall, told him that his master was at his studies, and could not be disturbed for an hour. He placed bread and meat before the prince and invited him to eat which he did without affectation. When the hour was expired, the porter informed La Harpe that a young man of the name of Alexander had been waiting some time, and wanted to see him. "Show him in." But what was La Harpe's surprise to see his pupil! He wished to apologize; but Alexander, placing his finger on his lips, said: "My dear tutor, do not mention it; an hour to you is worth a day to me; and besides, I have had a hearty breakfast in your kitchen which I should have lost had I been admitted to you when I first came." La Harpe, however, reprimanded his servant, but Alexander, laughing, said to the man: "I like you the better for it; you are an honest servant, and there are a hundred rubles to convince you that I think so."

ALL ABOUT DELEGATES.*

ONE evening in the early spring, as Mont was walking slowly homeward, busy with his thoughts, he did not notice a group of boys on the opposite corner until Ernest Howe called:

"Hello, there, Weston! come over here a minute."

On joining the group, he learned that the matter of delegates to the National Endeavor Convention was under discussion, and that Gertrude Marsden and Fred Malcolm had been favorably spoken of.

"What say you, old fellow; don't you think they will represent us well?" asked Rob Brooks.

Mont made no reply, but stood there trying to decide what he had better do, until Fred pressed him by saying: "Now, see here, old boy, if you have any objection to me, I beg of you don't spare my feelings, for I am sure there are others who are more deserving of this honor than myself, and I am willing any minute, to resign all claims in favor of a more worthy object."

At this "declamation"—as Rob termed it—the boys all laughed, even Mont, who replied:

"My dear old chap, I heartily concur with your nomination, and had I a vote I should cheerfully cast it for you; but—

"But what?" said Frank impatiently. "Surely you can have no objection to Miss Marsden as a delegate; she is one of the most popular girls in the whole membership."

At this remark the color rose a trifle in Mont's face, and Fred Malcolm watched him critically, as he proceeded to explain his position.

"What you have said in regard to Miss Gertrude is quite true, and I am one of the many who greatly admire her personally; nevertheless, I do object to her as a delegate, for this reason: To my knowledge, she has been repeatedly chosen to represent the society abroad; and while she may do this in an exceptional manner, I do not think such a course fair to your other members."

"But she is the most zealous, consecrated worker we have in the whole society," said Ernest Howe, with some show of annoyance.

"Did it ever occur to you," replied Mr. Weston, "that those very privileges which you persist in furnishing Miss Marsden, do much to awaken and keep alive the religious elements of her nature? And that, if these opportunities were occasionally offered to some one less active the influence might be felt in greater measure, both by the society and the individual?"

"Mont, you are all right," said Frank, extending him a hand; "when you first commenced I was dreadfully provoked at you, but I'll take it all back now, and thank you heartily; for this is a matter in which a great many societies need to reform."

"Whom would you suggest in Miss Marsden's stead?" asked Fred.

"How would it do to appoint that little seamstress, who is such a faithful teacher in the mission school?" suggested Mr. Weston. "She is looking very badly of late; and I fancy the trip alone might be of much benefit, to say nothing of the great treat in store for those who are in attendance upon the meetings."

The boys all looked aghast at the proposal to send this poor, and hitherto almost unnoticed, member of their number. Could she represent them with credit? Surely they knew of no reason why such a thing was impossible. That she was faithful and efficient in the performance of every duty which had been laid upon her, they could not deny. Then, why was she not eligible? Could it be that they had passed judgment upon her, because in outward appearance she was inferior to some [illegible]?

Solemn conviction fastened itself slowly upon the boyish hearts, and in a few seconds Robert broke the silence by saying:

"Weston, you're a [illegible] of settling duty whittled down to a fine point; I'll own beat in this business, and pledge my vote for the [illegible]."

"Here's another vote for the new candidate," said Ernest with some spirit.

*From The Endeavorers of Maple Grove, by Hattie Clarke Gardner. 12mo, pp. 174. Cloth, 75 cents. Sunday-school members [illegible] published by the Megeath Stationery Co., Omaha, Neb.

With that the crowd moved on to the next corner, where the boys separated, each one going to his own home.

APPARENT AND TRUE RICHES.*

"If we are created to live in this world alone and enjoy its natural comforts and delights, no greater good than an abundance of its possessions could be gained. But we are not. We have wants which no amount of worldly possessions can ever satisfy. The were intended to be merely means and instruments for the development of our spiritual faculties. Whenever we become wholly absorbed in getting them and enjoying them, and they are the supreme object of our affections, they become harmful to our supreme interests; they obstruct the development of the noblest and most precious human faculties, and they bar our entrance into the kingdom of heaven. If you find upon reflection that you were loving the world less and the Lord and neighbor more; that your thoughts naturally turned to subjects of a spiritual nature, and you found a growing interest in them, it would indicate that you were obeying the Lord; that you were leaving natural worldly things and following him."

"Do you mean that it is wrong for us to enjoy the good things of this life?" she asked.

"No," I replied. "They were given to us to use and enjoy, but not to love supremely. They were given to us to be the servants of a heavenly life, and not hindrances to it. But the love of the world is very subtle and powful in its influence to blind us to our true condition. It is easy to give money of our abundance. It costs us but little, and is of very little spiritual value. We may even do it from a selfish or worldly motive. The true test of our love is the personal interest we feel in promoting the happiness of others, and the amount of personal attention and effort we are willing to give to the Church and other worthy efforts to relieve the sufferings of humanity and elevate the character of the people around us.

"Wealth is always useful to us when we employ it for this purpose, and harmful when we do not. When we are entirely content with our natural possessions and have no aspirations for anything higher and nobler than simply to enjoy them; when we practically say to our soul, 'Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry,' it is a blessing to have them taken from us, that we may know upon how frail a foundation we are basing our eternal happiness. When our natural possessions, however abundant and precious they may be, do not satisfy the wants of our nature, and our affections have become so firmly rooted in them that we cannot extricate them without some help beyond our power, then it may be a great blessing to have them taken from us, however severe the wrench, that, freed from their weight and entanglements, we may rise to something higher and better which the world can never give.

AN OLD MAN'S GARDEN.†

ALL round the house there were old lawns of grass with beech-trees round them, and in the grass under the trees there were snowdrops, crocuses, daffodils, and anemones, that grew not in patches of two or three, but in sheets, for afterward we saw them one after another. Before the house there was a lawn so old and mossy that your feet sank into it as you walked; at one end was the house, with a row of gray gables in the roof and long windows that opened on the grass; at the other end there was a low brick wall with a wide gateway, and then you went down three stone steps into Bogy's garden.

And when you got there it was the most beautiful old garden that ever was seen. We sighed for joy when we saw it. It was divided here and there by yew hedges, so that we kept finding one new place after another; and it seemed to lie all in a warm hollow sheltered by the beech-trees, where there was no wind but nearly always sun. The soil looked as if it had been a garden for hundreds of years, and the plants grew, and grew, and grew, and were never disturbed. We saw whole beds of lilies-of-the-valley, clove carnations, burning bush, fleurs-de-lis, moss and cabbage roses, what we call thump lilies, because we thump each other on the backs with the heads, but what mother calls day lilies, and crown imperials, and the double sort that are called crown-upon-crown, and more old-fashioned plants and shrubs than I can remember. Bobby looked round at them all and sighed.

Then he took us to his herb garden, for he had a real old herb garden—so old, and funny, and pretty. There were yew hedges all round it, to keep out the winds, and you went in through archways cut in them. Inside it was all grass, and the beds were cut in it as if they were a pack of cards laid down. There was rue, and bergamot, and tansy, and thyme, and sage, and horehound, and balm, and pennyroyal, and angelica, and more herbs than I ever heard of.

We went under an arch that was made by two great cedars of Lebanon, and found ourselves in another little garden shut in by the hedges. It was so silent it might have been miles and miles away from anybody living—there were only some woodpigeons cooing in the trees.

"And my godmother used to tell me, when I was a little boy," he said to us, "that when this old house was a priory, this garden was a small graveyard. I do not know whether it is true or not, but my godmother believed it, and would never let this place be disturbed. It's name is the 'Saints' Rest.'"

HOW A WAR WAS AVERTED.

IN a newly published work entitled Cannibals Won for Christ, Rev. Oscar Michelsen says that during his absence from his missionary station at Tongoa, in the New Hebrides, a dispute arose with the people of a bush village in the interior; and one of his converts, a chief named Manambalea, determined to lead an expedition against the village and destroy it. Manambalea was heartily supported by the whole people, and when Mr. Michelsen returned the expedition was almost ready to start. Mr. Michelsen explained to Manambalea that the peace and order of the island was not to be achieved by war, but by Christianity—which is love, and not hatred; life and not death. Manambalea was soon led to see his error, and he imparted to his people the clearer light which he had himself received. He went further, telling his tribesmen that he intended to go straight up to the bush village to stop the war. All begged of him to do no such wild thing, saying that the people of Pele (the bush village), would certainly kill him. As he remained firm, the villagers proposed to follow him in a body, well armed, so as to afford protection.

This, however, was not Manambalea's wish. He could see that this plan would assuredly mean more war. So, settled in purpose, he went without escort, only taking with him a devoted young Christian named Karisi, and another youth. He was, however, followed by his wife and her sister, who declared they would go and "die with him."

The warriors of the bush village could not understand the sight that met their view that day—Manambalea, with whose people they had fought many a battle, coming up to them with two defenceless lads! There must be some sinister purpose! The advance of the chief was but part of a plot! Every fighting-man of Pele grasped his musket, expecting each moment to see their armed enemy in force. But Manambalea held up his hands, and called out, "Stop! I am not here to fight, but to speak peace to you."

At this the men threw their guns to the ground, and stood up in a respectful attitude to hear what Manambalea had to say. In a few words he explained that he had been at the mission-house, and had related to the missionary what had occurred. "The missionary," he said, "tells me it is not according to the 'Light' to fight and kill people; but that we should love one another and live at peace."

The worthy chieftain further said that he intended to stop fighting: and he hoped the people of Pele would do the same, and become learners of the "New Doctrine!" Thus what might have been a disastrous war was brought to an end. Returning to the missionary, he told what had been done and urged that teachers be sent to the village. This Mr. Michelsen was glad to do and at this day there is a thriving Christian church in Pele.

A SUICIDE AVERTED.

AT a recent meeting in Glasgow, Scotland, just after the exercises had begun, a shabbily-dressed man slipped into a back seat. He did not seem to take much interest in the singing, but sat or stood with the rest of the audience in a dreamy, absent-minded sort of way. The address proceeded, and still there was no sign of interest from the listener, but all at once he sat upright and fixed his eyes on the speaker, who had just stated that Christ would save to the uttermost. The shabby man's attention was riveted, and at the end of the address, he remained among those who wished to be dealt with personally. He told the preacher his story, which was a sad one. Well educated, and at one time holding a good position, one false step had ruined him. He had meant to repay what he took but luck was against him, and his turf associates took his money. Discovery soon followed, and he was dismissed without a character. He could not meet his friends, so he fled from home. Since then he had been a wanderer on the face of the earth, unable to get employment, unable to stick to anything; he had sunk lower and lower, until to his one crime were added many, and he became familiar with the interior of a jail. At the time he entered the meeting a great feeling of remorse had seized him. He felt his wasted life a burden of which he must get rid, and had determined to kill himself. It was too light then, so he turned into the meeting to pass away an hour. But that one hour gave him a new start in life. He no longer thought of suicide, but had determined to live for Christ thereafter.

AN ESCAPE FROM A FLOOD.

A CLERGYMAN pleading recently with a congregation for liberal gifts for the cause he was advocating, said that many warnings were given of the danger to be apprehended from the possession of much money. He would tell his hearers the best way of meeting the danger and tell it by a story: "A cottage at the foot of a great hill in Wales was once flooded out by a stream which burst its banks, and rushing into the cottage devastated the interior. The poor old woman who lived there went to a neighbor to bewail her loss. Her furniture was all spoiled, her home was entirely ruined.

'But, dear me!' she said, 'You have had the flood as well as I, and it don't seem to have done much harm. How is that?' 'Oh,' replied the neighbor, 'when the water came in at the back door I opened the front door and it ran through and just washed the floor clean. Why didn't you open the door and let it run out?' Some of us want that lesson about our money. Often when it runs in, it works much harm, because we do not open the front door of giving to Christ's cause to let it out. Money hoarded and hugged becomes a burden and curse."

A RESCUE WORKER ARRESTED.

MR. ORRIN B. BOOTH, is a young business man of New York, who is associated with the Rescue Band in active mission work in the tenement section and the slums. On Sunday, July 9, he saw that a saloon on the corner of Bleecker Street and South Fifth Avenue, had its side-door open and that the drink traffic was going on in defiance of the Sunday laws. His suspicions being confirmed, after noticing several persons enter and leave the barroom with drink they had purchased, he complained to a policeman and the officer warned the proprietor. One door was quickly closed but the traffic continued at another door around the corner. Mr. Booth again appealed to the officer but the latter declined to interfere, saying the other door was "not on his beat."

The young man then sought another policeman who, after some demur, spoke to the proprietor. For a few moments the doors remained closed, and soon it was reopened to admit new customers. Mr. Booth again appealed to the officer, and at that moment the the proprietor himself emerged and called out to the policeman to "arrest that fellow." To Mr. Booth's surprise the officer took him into custody, on the complaint of the saloon-keeper that he was "obstructing the doorway." The young Rescue worker was taken to Jefferson Market prison and put in the "pen" with a number of criminals and drunkards.

Next morning he was arraigned before a Police Justice on the charge of "drawing a crowd" and pleaded "not guilty." The justice, after a moment's talk with the officer, turned to the prisoner and told him he must furnish bonds in $300 to keep the peace for three months, or go to jail. Dr. Louis Klopsch, proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, hearing of the case, at once sent a certified check for the amount, to be deposited with the clerk of the court, and Mr. Booth was released. This experience shows how strongly entrenched the liquor power is in the metropolis, and how absurd is the pretense of the authorities at enforcing the Sunday laws against liquor selling in the city of New York.

THE RUSSIAN EMPEROR'S HOME.

JUST one year ago, this week, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD announced the arrival at the Russian Capital of the relief steamship, Leo, with the gift of food for the famine sufferers. The Leo was the last of the famine fleet, and her cargo, consecrated by American prayers, came at a time when the distress was keenest, and it was unquestionably the means of saving thousands of peasants from the horrors of death by starvation. In the relief movement, the Czar and the members of the Imperial household were probably the most active people in the Empire. During those sad and gloomy months, the Czarina was the gentle spirit whose example stirred up the nobles of Russia to deeds of generosity. Maria Feodorovna (whose portrait appears on this page), is regarded in Russia as a charming hostess and a model mother. She is not overfond of display and, though duly attentive to the social functions, prefers the quietude of her home to the glitter of ballrooms or receptions. Her three sons, Nicolas the Czarewitch, George and Michel, and her daughter Xenia were, to a great extent, trained and educated by the Empress personally, before passing under the care of tutors. She is of a slender, delicate frame, yet she accomplishes a great deal of work, and is never happier than when superintending some mission of charity which takes her among the people. Her face is familiar at the hospitals where the sick have learned to watch for her visits, and her palace is a centre of philanthropic schemes in which she interests the ladies of the Court, infecting them with her own enthusiasm.

There are many private residences in Europe and America presenting a much more pretentious exterior than the royal palace in St. Petersburg, which is shown in the photograph. Save for the presence of the military guard at the gate, the palace might well be mistaken for the city mansion of some wealthy Russian merchant. It is a home in which rigid method governs everything, from the nursery to the private office of the Czar, where, in a room not half as large as the average counting-house, he reads his correspondence, dictates his letters to a secretary and transacts much of the business of the state, with the Cabinet ministers or the members of the four great councils.

Recently, the Czarewitch visited England, and attended the royal wedding of the Duke of York and Princess May. In vain the diplomatists of the Russian Legation tried to prevail with him not to expose himself in public, the young prince went everywhere and had no dread of Nihilists or assassins. The Legation was uneasy and consulted the police authorities at Scotland Yard, but the latter reassured the Russians by declaring their belief that the Czarewitch was quite safe and not likely to be interfered with. This assertion was corroborated by a letter which the Prince received from a Nihilist in London, advising him to be observant of English constitutional government and citizens' rights, and to apply these principles, if he ever came to the Russian throne. At the termination of his visit, the Prince went to Berlin. Grand Duke Michaelovitch, a member of the royal house of Romanoff, and son of the Grand Duke Michael, is now visiting this country with the Russian fleet, in which he holds a commission.

The Tabernacle Pulpit

SHARPENED AXES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning at Monona Lake Assembly, near Madison, Wis. Text, 1. Sam. 13: 19-21, "Now there was no smith found throughout all the land of Israel," etc.

MY loving and glad salutation to this uncounted host Chautauquans, Christian Endeavorers, Gospel workers, and their friends from all parts of Wisconsin and America, saints and sinners! My text is gloriously appropriate. What a scalding subjugation the Israelites were suffering. The Philistines had carried off all the blacksmiths, and torn down all the blacksmiths' shops, and abolished the blacksmith's trade in the land of Israel. These Philistines had a particular grudge against blacksmiths, although I have always admired them, and have sometimes thought I ought to have been one myself. The Philistines would not even allow these parties to work their valuable mines of brass and iron, nor might they make any swords or spears. There were only two swords left in all the land. Yea, these Philistines went on until they had taken all the grindstones from the land of Israel, so that if an Israelitish farmer wanted to sharpen his plough or his axe, he had to go over to the garrison of the Philistines to get it done. There was only one sharpening instrument left in the land, and that was a file. The farmers and the mechanics having nothing to whet up the coulter, and the goad, and the pickaxe, save a simple file, industry was hindered, and work practically disgraced. The great idea of these Philistines was to keep the Israelites disarmed. They might get iron out of the hills to make swords of, but they would not have any blacksmiths to weld this iron. If they got the iron welded, they would have no grindstones on which to bring the instruments of agriculture or the military weapons up to an edge. Oh, you poor, weaponless Israelites, reduced to a file, how I pity you! But these Philistines were not forever to keep their heel on the neck of God's children. Jonathan, on his hands and knees, climbs up a great rock beyond which were the Philistines; and his armor-bearer, on his hands and knees, climbs up the same rock, and these two men, with their two swords, hew to pieces the Philistines, the Lord throwing a great terror upon them. So it was then; so it is now. The two men of God on their knees, mightier than a Philistine host on their feet.

I learn first from this subject, how dangerous it is for the Church of God to allow its weapons to stay in the hands of its enemies. These Israelites might again and again have obtained a supply of swords and weapons, as for instance when they took the spoils of the Ammonites; but these Israelites seemed content to have no swords, no spears, no blacksmiths, no grindstones, no active iron mines, until it was too late for them to make any resistance. I see the farmers tugging along with their pickaxes and ploughs, and I say, "Where are you going with those things?" They say, "Oh, we are going over to the garrison of the Philistines to get these things sharpened." I say, "You foolish men, why don't you sharpen them at home?" "Oh," they say, "the blacksmiths' shops are all torn down, and we have nothing left us but a file."

So it is in the Church of Christ to-day. We are too willing to give up our weapons to the enemy. The world boasts that it has gobbled up the schools, and the colleges, and the arts, and the sciences, and the literature, and the printing press. Infidelity is making a mighty attempt to get all our weapons in its hand, and then to keep them. You know it is making this boast all the time; and after a while, when the great battle between sin and righteousness has opened, if we do not look out we will be as badly off as these Israelites, without any swords to fight with, and without any sharpening instruments. I call upon the superintendents of literary institutions to see to it that the men who go into the class-rooms to stand beside the Leyden jars, and the electric batteries, and the microscopes or telescopes, be children of God, not Philistines. The atheistic thinkers of this day are trying to get all the intellectual weapons of this century in their own grasp. What we want is scientific Christians to capture the science, and scholastic Christians to capture the scholarship, and philosophic Christians to capture the philosophy, and lecturing Christians, to take back the lecturing platform.

We want to send out against Schenkel and Strauss and Renan of the past, men like the late Theodore Christlieb of Bonn; and against the infidel scientists, a God-worshipping Silliman and Hitchcock and Agassiz. We want to capture all the philosophical apparatus, and swing around the telescopes on the swivel, until through them we can see the morning star of the Redeemer, and with mineralogical hammer discover the "Rock of ages," and amid the flora of the realms find the "Rose of Sharon and the lily of the valley." We want a clergy learned enough to discourse of the human eye, showing it to be a microscope and telescope in one instrument, with eight hundred wonderful contrivances, and lids closing 30,000 or 40,000 times a day; all its muscles and nerves and bones showing the infinite skill of an infinite God, and then winding up with the peroration: "He that formed the eye, shall he not see?" And then we want to discourse about the human ear, its wonderful integuments, membranes, and vibration, and its chain of small bones, and its auditory nerves, closing with the question: "He that planted the ear shall he not hear?" And we want some one able to expound the first chapter of Genesis, bringing to it the geology and the astronomy of the world, until, as Job suggested, "the stones of the field shall be in league" with the truth, and "the stars in their courses shall fight against Sisera." Oh, Church of God, go out and recapture these weapons. Let men of God go out and take possession of the [illegible] Let all the printing-press of this country speak out for Christ, and the reporters, and the type-setters, and the editors, and publishers swear allegiance to the Lord God of truth. Ah, my friend, that day must come, and if the great body of Christian men have not the faith, or the courage, or the consecration to do it, then let some Jonathan, on his busy hands and on his praying knees, climb up on the rock of hindrance, and in the name of the Lord God of Israel, slash to pieces those literary Philistines. If these men will not be converted to God, then they must be destroyed.

Again, I learn from this subject what a large amount of the Church's resources is actually hidden, and buried, and undeveloped. The Bible intimates that that was a very rich land—this land of Israel. It says: "the stones are iron, and out of the hills thou shalt dig brass," and yet hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of this metal was kept under the hills. Well, that is the difficulty with the Church of God at this day. Its talent is not developed. If one-half of its energy could be brought out, it might take the public iniquities of the day by the throat and make them bite the dust. If human eloquence were consecrated to the Lord Jesus Christ, it could in a few years persuade this whole earth to surrender to God. There is enough undeveloped Christian energy in the United States to bring the whole world to Christ; but it is buried under strata of indifference and under whole mountains of sloth. Now is it not time for the mining to begin, and the pickaxes to plunge, and for this buried metal to be brought out and put into the furnaces, and be turned into howitzers and carbines for the Lord's host? The vast majority of Christians in this day are useless. The most of the Lord's battalion belong to the reserve corps. The most of the crew are asleep in the hammocks. The most of the metal is under the hills. Oh, is it not time for the Church of God to rouse up and understand that we want all the energies, all the talent, and all the wealth enlisted for Christ's sake? I like the nickname that the English soldiers gave to Blucher, the Commander. They called him "Old Forwards." We have had enough retreats in the Church of Christ; let us have a glorious advance. And I say to you now, as the General said when his troops were affrighted. Rising up in his stirrups, his hair flying in the wind, he lifted up his voice until twenty thousand troops heard him, crying out: "Forward, the whole line!"

Again I learn from this subject, that we sometimes do well to take advantage of the world's sharpening instruments. These Israelites were reduced to a file, and so they went over to the garrison of the Philistines to get their axes and their goads, and their ploughs sharpened. The Bible distinctly states in the context—that they had no other instruments now with which to do this work, and the Israelites did right when they went over to the Philistines to use their grindstones. My friends, is it not right for us to employ the world's grindstones? If there be art, if there be logic, if there be business faculty on the other side, let us go over and employ it for Christ's sake. The fact is, we fight with too dull weapons, and we work with too dull implements. We hack and we maul when we ought to make a clean stroke. Let us go over among sharp business men, and among sharp literary men, and find out what their tact is, and then transfer it to the cause of Christ. If they have science and art it will do us good to rub against it. In other words: let us employ the world's grindstones. We will listen to their music, and we will watch their acumen, and we will use their grindstones; and we will borrow their philosophical apparatus to make our experiments, and we will borrow their printing-presses to publish our Bibles, and we will borrow their rail-trains to carry our Christian literature, and we will borrow their ships to transport our missionaries. That was what made Paul such a master in his day. He not only got all the learning he could get of Dr. Gamaliel, but afterward, standing on Mars Hill, and in crowded thoroughfare, quoted their poetry, and grasped their logic, and wielded their eloquence, and employed their mythology, until Dionysius the Areopagite, learned in the schools of Athens and Heliopolis, went down under his tremendous powers. That was what gave Thomas Chalmers his power in his day. He conquered the world's astronomy and compelled it to ring out the wisdom and greatness of the Lord, until for the second time, the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy. That was what gave to Jonathan Edwards his influence in his day. He conquered the world's metaphysics and forced it into the service of God, until not only the old meeting-house in Northampton, Massachusetts, but all Christendom felt thrilled by his Christian power. Well, now, my friends, we all have tools of Christian usefulness. Do not let them lose their edges. We want no rusty blades in this fight. We want no coulter that cannot rip up the glebe. We want no axe that cannot fell the trees. We want no goad that cannot start the lazy team. Let us get the very best grindstones we can find, though they be in the possession of the Philistines, compelling them to turn the crank while we bear down with all our might on the swift-revolving wheel until all our energies and faculties shall be brought up to a bright, keen, sharp, glittering edge.

Again: my subject teaches us on what a small allowance Philistine iniquity puts a man. Yes; these Philistines shut up the mines, and then they took the spears and the swords, then they took the blacksmiths, then they took the grindstones, and they took everything but a file. Oh, that is the way sin works; it grabs everything. It begins with robbery, and it ends with robbery. It despoils this faculty and that faculty, and keeps on until the whole nature is gone. Was the man eloquent before, it generally thickens his tongue. Was he fine in personal appearance, it mars his visage. Was he affluent, it sends the sheriff to sell him out. Was he influential, it destroys his popularity. Was he placid, and genial, and loving, it makes him splenetic and cross; and so utterly is he changed that you can see he is sarcastic and rasping, and that the Philistines have left him nothing but a file. Oh, "the way of the transgressor is hard." His cup is bitter. His night is dark. His pangs are deep. His end is terrific. Philistine iniquity says to that man: "Now, surrender to me, and I will give you all you want—music for the dance, swift steeds for the race, imperial couch to slumber on, and you shall be refreshed with the rarest fruits, in baskets of golden filagree." He lies. The music turns out to be a groan. The fruits burst the rind with rank poison. The filagree is made up of twisted snakes. The couch is a grave. Small allowance of rest; small allowance of peace; small allowance of comfort. Cold, hard, rough—nothing but a file. So it was with Voltaire, the most applauded man of his day:

> The Scripture was his jest-book, whence he drew > Bon mots to gall the Christian and the Jew.
> An infidel when well, but what when sick?
> Oh, then a text would touch him to the quick.

Seized with hemorrhage of the lungs in Paris, where he had gone to be crowned in the theatre as an idol of all France, he sends a messenger to get a priest, that he may be reconciled to the Church before he dies. A great terror falls upon him. He makes the place all round about him so dismal that the nurse declares that she would not for all the wealth of Europe see another infidel die. Philistine iniquity had promised him all the world's garlands, but in the last hour of his life when he needed solacing, sent tearing across his conscience and his nerves a file, a file. So it was with Lord Byron, his uncleanness in England only surpassed by his uncleanness in Venice, then going on to end his brilliant misery at Missolonghi, fretting at his nurse Fletcher, fretting at himself, fretting at the world, fretting at God; and he who gave to the world "Childe Harold," and "Sardanapalus," and "The Prisoner of Chillon," and "The Siege of Corinth," reduced to nothing but a file! Oh, sin has great facility for making promises, but it has just as great facility for breaking them. A Christian life is the only cheerful life, while a life of wicked surrender is remorse, ruin, and death.

I learn from this subject, what a sad thing it is when the Church of God loses its metal. These Philistines saw that if they could only get all the metallic weapons out of the hands of the Israelites, all would be well, and, therefore, they took the swords and the spears. They did not want them to have a single metallic weapon. When the metal of the Israelites was gone, their strength was gone. This is the trouble with the Church of God to-day. It is surrendering its courage. The Church of God to-day wants more backbone, more defiance, more consecrated bravery, more metal. How often you see a man start out in some good enterprise, and at the first blast of newspaperdom he has collapsed, and all his courage gone, forgetful of the fact that if a man be right, all the newspapers of the earth, with all their columns pounding away at him, cannot do him any permanent damage. It is only when a man is wrong that he can be damaged. Why, God is going to vindicate his truth, and he is going to stand by you, my friends, in every effort you make for Christ's cause and the salvation of men. Go forth in his service and do your whole duty.

You have one sphere. I have another sphere. "The Lord of Hosts is with us, and the God of Jacob is our refuge. Selah." We want more of the determination of Jonathan. I do not suppose he was a very wonderful man; but he got on his knees and clambered up the rock, and with the help of his armor-bearer he hewed down the Philistines; and a man of very ordinary intellectual attainments, on his knees, can storm anything for God and for the truth. We want something of the determination of the general who went into the war, and as he entered his first battle, his knees knocked together, his physical courage not quite up to his moral courage; and he looked down at his knees, and said: "Ah, if you knew where I was going to take you, you would shake worse than that!" We have but little time in which to fight for God. You will be dead soon. Put in the Christian cause every energy that God gives you. "What thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might, for there is neither wisdom nor device in the grave whither we are all hastening." Oh, is it not high time that we wake out of sleep? Church of God, lift up your head at the coming victory! The Philistines will go down, and the Israelites will go up. We are on the winning side. Hear that—on the winning side. I think just now the King's horses are being hooked up to the chariot, and when he does ride down the sky there will be such a hosanna among his friends, and such a wailing among his enemies, as will make the earth tremble and the heavens sing. I see now the plumes of the Lord's cavalrymen tossing in the air. The archangel before the throne has already burnished his trumpet, and then he will put its golden lips to his own, and he will blow the long, loud blast that will make all nations free. Clap your hands, all ye people! Hark! I hear the falling thrones, and the dashing down of demolished iniquities.

Help for Prodigal Daughters.

The Effort of Two Brooklyn Ladies for the Restoration of Wayward Girls.

AMONG the efforts to rescue and reclaim the fallen which are now being made, one has just been inaugurated by two ladies in Brooklyn, N. Y., which has in it so much of hope and practical common-sense that it deserves the cordial sympathy of every earnest Christian. Every one who has tried to induce a fallen woman to abandon a sinful life has met with the rejoinder, "How am I to support myself?" The difficulty has been hard to surmount. As a rule the woman knows no trade and has had only ordinary education. She might go into domestic service, or might become a clerk in a store, but beyond these two avenues of self-support, almost all others are closed to her; and those two are precisely those in which good character—which, alas, she has lost—is indispensable to an engagement. When, therefore, such a woman becomes penitent and desires to reform, it is difficult for her to regain her lost place in society and earn a decent livelihood. The plan designed by these two Brooklyn ladies is specially fitted to surmount this difficulty.

It originated in a compassionate sisterly love for the fallen. About three years ago there came to New York a beautiful Christian girl from the country town of Bath, N.Y. She came to study art in the school at Cooper Union. In her native place she had been active in Sunday School work and had succeeded in organizing a Sunday School in an outlying village where one was sorely needed. She did not leave her religion behind her when she came to the great city, but looked around for some Christian work to do, in the few leisure hours she had at her disposal. She found out the little mission church which Rev. Stephen Merritt was keeping up among the poor in the Madison Street district. Dr. W. J. Hall, now medical missionary in Corea, was then laboring there and he gave the young stranger, who came to offer her services, a hearty welcome. There she came in contact with some of the saddest and most squalid features of city life, but she did not shrink from them. She worked on bravely, studying in the art schools in the daytime, and giving her evenings to Christ's cause among the poor. Then came an offer of marriage from a young man whom she met at the mission. After considering the matter she decided that she could sacrifice her career in art bnt she could not abandon her Christian labor. On these terms she could accept the offer and as her lover honored her for making them and consented to them, she became Mrs. Thomas Halvorsen.

BETHESDA HOME, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

About the same time, doing very much the same kind of work, within a short distance of the Madison Street Mission, was a young Canadian lady, Mrs. Robert McIntyre by name. She was devoting all her spare time to the work conducted by Rev. J. F. Avery at the Mariners' Temple. She, too, found work to do for her Master in the gloomy tenements, in the streets at night, and the pestiferous courts and alleyways of one of the worst wards of the city. The two ladies met and naturally their talk was of that which lay nearest their hearts — their work for Christ and its difficulties.

The practical outcome of their consultations was the founding of a shelter for fallen girls at 173 Cherry Street. They held mission services at their little shelter and much good was done there. It had been carried on for about six months, when God opened their way to the larger field on which they are now entering. In negotiating with Mr. Freeborn Smith of Brooklyn for the purchase of an organ for their mission, Mrs. Halvorsen and Mrs. McIntyre explained to him the nature of their work. The greater part of the large building which he owns on Raymond Street had been occupied by a missionary training school, but was then vacant. Mr. Smith had often noticed young women coming out of Raymond Street jail, for whom he had wished that something could be done. He knew what class they belonged to and sorrowfully perceived how little hope there was for them. "Why not bring your mission here, where it is so badly needed?" he asked the two ladies. The idea grew into practical shape in his mind and finally he offered them the vacant premises at half the usual rental on condition that the ladies would put into the work on which his heart was set the consecrated energy they had turned to so good an account in New York. The offer was made a subject of prayer and in a wonderful way financial help justifying them in accepting the offer, came to them. One lady undertook to pay the rent for the whole summer; another offered her services gratuitously as matron, and would furnish her own room, and other help was promised.

The chief advantage which recommended the offer to the workers was that it offered facilities for putting in operation a long cherished idea. It was to organize an industrial home, where girls who are willing to quit their sinful life could receive technical knowledge that would enable them to earn their own livelihood.

The experience they had gained in their efforts in Cherry St., New York, and other parts of the city had convinced them that in such an enterprise lay the best hope of the permanent reclamation of their fallen sisters. To provide them with means of maintaining themselves was to close the two chief avenues by which temptation to return to a sinful life would most successfully assail them. It is either through idleness or poverty that the great enemy of souls approaches the victim who has escaped from his clutches and re-enslaves her. By teaching the girls a business, occupation would be provided for mind and hand, leaving no room for the entrance of vicious thought and suggestions; and they could provide by their own honest labor the means of satisfying the desire for decent apparel which every self-respecting woman naturally feels under our advanced civilization. No opportunity, however, seemed likely to occur for their establishing an institution for the purpose until Mr. Smith placed his vacant premises at their disposal. Mrs. Halvorsen and Mrs. McIntyre could not fail to recognize in the most unexpected and liberal offer which had thus come to them unsought an indication of the leading of Divine Providence.

The premises comprise a pretty little chapel where daily and Sunday services can be held and of twenty-one rooms capable of accommodating in all one hundred inmates, which can be used for dormitories and class rooms. Expert teachers have offered their services to give instruction in nursing, cooking, dress-making, shorthand, typewriting and other branches of knowledge by which women can maintain themselves. Thus the way is opened for the solution of the most difficult of problems, and girls who really desire to live an honest, cleanly life can be helped to do so at the Bethesda Home as the new institution is called.

A most encouraging of the plan is the prospect that the home will soon be self-supporting. Communications will be sent to stores, factories and private families inviting work and while the girls are learning their business they will be able to earn money for the support of the home. There is reason to believe that there will be an abundance of work sent in. Nor will there be any lack of inmates. Already a few have been received, and many more are anxious to enter who cannot be taken, because Mrs. Halvorsen and Mrs. McIntyre have not the beds and other furniture for their use. In this matter the Christian public may render valuable help. The rental of the building is provided, teachers are ready to give instruction, but the plan halts for the lack of a few cheap beds, chairs and tables and the necessary educational apparatus. The scheme is so intelligent and sensible and the prospects are so bright, that we are sure that obstacle will not long impede progress. If any readers of this journal are willing to aid in this excellent work we will gladly receive contributions on behalf of the managers of the home and will acknowledge them in this journal.

PAUL AT MILETUS.

S S. Lesson for Aug. 6. Acts 20: 17 35 Golden Text, Heb. 8: 7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

"REMEMBER them that had the rule over you, which spake unto you the word of God, and considering the issue of their manner of life (margin) imitate their faith" (Heb. 8: 7.) Paul was the one man of the New Testament who had the courage to say to his converts: "Be ye followers of me." In his own following of Christ, he knew that he had not swerved, nor had turned, neither to the right hand nor to the left, but steadily, and uniformly, and at any and every cost he had followed his Lord. His last testimony was: "I have finished the course; I have kept the faith;" and no one ever attempted to disprove the assertion. Even before his conversion, he followed the light of his conscience, and did not sin wilfully, so that he could say before the council at Jerusalem: "Men and brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day." He was himself the proof of all which he taught to others. Like his Master before him, Paul lived out in his life all which he learned in Scripture, and thus his word was something more than thoughts, ideas and doctrines; it had become embodied in the man who spoke it. Excellency of speech and man's wisdom were among the things that he had suffered the loss of for Christ; he spoke "in demonstration of the Spirit and of power," and commended himself to every man's conscience in the sight of God. Paul's life and ministry had left its mark on the city of Ephesus, and now, irrespective of how far either the disciples which had been made there, or the idolatrous merchants and workmen might regard his retreat as cowardice, Paul followed the clear leading of the Spirit in leaving Ephesus to go into Greece. Remaining there three months, his proposed route through Syria was altered because the Jews, with their usual malice, laid wait for him. So he went through Macedonia, taking with him quite a company of young men who were, by accompanying him, training for future service.

As the days of his ministry drew to an end, we mark in Paul a distinct tendency to be more Alone with his God.

He had sent on all the brethren before him to Troas, and now, after one day's ministry there he again sends them on by ship to Assos, while he goes there afoot. This necessity to be alone with God intensified, and we can understand how, later on, all the privation of the Roman prison could not prevent his glad recognition of God's hand in giving him this time alone with him; he rejoiced to acknowledge that he was "the prisoner of the Lord," not Nero's prisoner. At Assos, he joined his companions in the ship, and they sailed together to Miletus. Instead of proceeding from thence to Ephesus, which would have taken more time, he sent to Ephesus, and called the elders of the Church. It was a solemn time for him and for them, the last meeting upon earth until the Lord comes. He must lead them back to take a retrospective view of his ministry among them, which had been for a longer time than in any other place.

"Ye know," he said to them, "from the first day that I came into Asia, after what manner I have been with you at all seasons, serving the Lord with all humility of mind, and with many tears, and temptations (or trials R.V.) which befel me by the lying in wait (or plots) of the Jews." I have "been with you" but "serving the Lord," not you. Here was one secret of Paul's power, he lived under the eye God, not of man, he was no man-pleaser, never curried favor with man. He was no man's slave. Earning his own living, he was dependent on no man's money, he could endure hardness, and be "in fastings often," but he could not sin against his conscience to keep in with rich men. Such an idea would have broken his heart. He served the Lord with all humility of mind, and probably only had the wages of an artizan, and food and clothing on the same scale. He could not desire to be better off than his Master. Then his work was heart work, done, not under a sense of duty. Knowing the issues which hung upon the reception or rejection of his message, he served the Lord with "tears." There are not many weeping ministers, but there are some who lay to heart the charge committed to them, it is their life: "Now we live if ye stand fast in the Lord." The apostle's ministry was continually thwarted by the plots of the Jews; he had no peace without: for God must prove by him that the grace of Christ within is superior to all external influences. The most telling sermon Paul ever preached was the life he lived, which was summarized in his own words, "To me to live is Christ."

In his steady course of following the Master without wavering, led uninterruptedly by the Holy Ghost, Paul could say: "I have kept back nothing that was profitable unto you, but have shewed you and have taught you, i. e.,

By Life and Word

publicly, and from house to house, testifying to the Jews and also to the Greeks, repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ." This is not simply a primary conversion to God, but a continual conversion or turning over of will and purpose, heart and mind, soul and strength in all things which should arise from self to God, through faith in Jesus Christ. "And now, behold I go, bound in the Spirit, unto Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there, save that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city that bonds and afflictions abide me." Why then go up to Jerusalem? Why not remain in Europe and Asia, where he was so loved and valued, and where his work was so much blest? Why put this pressure upon himself to get to Jerusalem before Pentecost? Why not, if he must go, delay until fewer of his enemies, the Asiatic Jews, would be assembled there? Paul was not his own, he was bought with a price, he could not dispose of himself. Free indeed from all men, he was the servant of the Holy Ghost, and he went bound in the Spirit up to Jerusalem. If bonds and afflictions awaited him, he could and would welcome them all, if by that means his God was glorified. "None of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the Gospel of the grace of God." Instinctively we turn to Rev. 12: 11: "And they overcame him (the dragon that old serpent and Satan), by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony, and they loved not their lives unto death." Everything which touched the honor of God, or the good of souls, touched Paul, even to tears, but nothing moved him which touched him personally. When he said: "I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ in me, he only said what everyone could see in his life.

But he knew by that intuition of God's purposes which the Spirit gives to those who wait on him that this was his last moment with these beloved brethren: "Beloved, now I know that ye all, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God, shall see my face no more, therefore I take you to record this day that I am pure from the blood of all men, for I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God." The Lord's watchman who does not warn souls is accounted guilty; "His blood will I require at their hand." (Ezek. 3: 18.) Paul could not remember a single unfaithfulness to souls; he was pure from the blood of all men. But he knew, by the same prophetic intuition ("He shall shew you things to come." John 16: 13), that grievous wolves should enter into the Ephesian church, not sparing the flock, and that from the very elders themselves should men arise speaking perverse things, some should "say they are apostles and are not," and this church should leave her first love.

Therefore watch, and remember that by the space of three years, I ceased not to warn every one, night and day, with tears: he might have said what is implied: "Therefore be ye followers of me." And now, brethren, I commend you to God and to the Word of his grace, which is able to build you up and to give you an inheritance among all them which are sanctified.

To God and to His Word!

Paul was not afraid to leave his converts in such hands. O how many evangelists know not what to do with their converts. "To God," not be forgotten by Paul, but borne up in steady intercession. He ceased not to give thanks for them, making mention of them in his prayers and his prayers for them were wondrous prayers. To his word. It was the dying gift of Christ. His special testament to them whom his Father had given to him: "I have given them thy Word."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

Miletus from the Sea.

THE Apostle left Ephesus after the events which formed the subject of last week's lesson. He had intended to go, but his departure was probably hastened by an uproar in the city. The makers of the silver images of Diana seemed to have reasoned that the probable result of Paul's teaching would be to diminish the demand for their product and to have called a meeting to consider the situation. It was a kind of indignation meeting to protest against Paul and his teachings. To the general public Demetrius appealed on high religious ground. The temple of Diana was likely to be despised and her magnificence destroyed. With his fellow tradesmen the man was more frank; he said "by this craft we have our wealth" and "our craft is in danger." Thus religion and business were combined in the movement as they have often been since that time. There was a great disturbance, and, as frequently happens with mobs, the greater part of the people taking part in the meeting did not know what was its object. But the most ignorant could take part by calling out the common rallying cry of the city, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians," and this they did for two hours. The calm, sensible words of the town-clerk recalled them to reason, and the danger passed. After this Paul started on his last journey toward Jerusalem, taking up Luke at Troas and sailing with him from Philippi. During this journey he wrote his second epistle to the Corinthians, the epistle to the Romans, and, it is generally believed, his epistle to the Galatians, although, in this last case, the Authorized Version represents it as having been written from Rome. An incidental mention of a preaching service at Troas, in the seventh verse, indicates that at that time, about thirty years after Christ's death and resurrection, Sunday, the first day of the week, had become the recognized day of meeting for the communion service. No indications are given of Paul's route prior to Luke joining him, but after that, with Luke's customary methodical exactness, each stage is duly recorded. Some delay of the ship probably occurred at Miletus and Paul being concerned for the welfare of the Ephesian Church, to which he had given a longer period than was usual with them, sent for the elders of the church to come to him. Ephesus was forty-five miles away and they would probably be in Miletus in less than three days. There Paul, who was then about fifty-six years old, made the farewell address which is the subject of the lesson.

I kept back nothing that was profitable. Paul followed that rule, as when he was before Felix he chose as his subject "righteousness, temperance and the judgment to come," precisely the subjects which Felix would least wish to be reminded of. The story is told of Bourdaloue who was court preacher to Louis XIV., that on one occasion preaching before the king and his court, he attempted to reprove the king for his profligate life. He drew a picture in general terms of a sinner of great turpitude and of the awful doom of such a sinner if he died unrepentant. He hoped that the king would recognize his portrait in the sermon and apply its lessons to himself. He was distressed to see that the king was not moved. He was probably thinking of someone else to whom the lesson might apply Bourdaloue perceiving that his reproof was missing its mark, suddenly opened his half-shut eyes, and pointing to the king cried in a voice of thunder, as Nathan did to that other regal wrongdoer centuries before, "Thou art the man." "Your majesty must not be angry," said Bourdaloue afterward, "at me, for remembering in the pulpit that I have no other master than the King of kings."

So that I might finish my course with joy. An eccentric but very successful preacher was walking down the street and passed the store of one of his members who had the character of being a worldly, avaricious man. The clergyman stopped, entered and walked abruptly into the private office unannounced. The man looked up in surprise and some perturbation at the interruption. "You were not expecting me, were you?" asked the visitor. "No, I was not," was the reply. "What if I had been death?" the minister asked in a solemn tone and turning round, walked away without another word.

Wolves shall enter among you. The warning was not unnecessary. A few years afterward the wolves in the shape of heretical teachers from other places and the false brethren in the Ephesian church worked havoc among the Christians in the city, leading them into erroneous beliefs. The sect known as the Gnostics flourished there, and in Revelation we read of another sect evidently heretical—the Nicolaitans getting a foothold there. One who knew thoroughly the history of the Church of Christ says that Paul's comparison of false teachers to wolves is fully justified by the facts. "There are no greater foes to sheep than wolves. So the church has never had worse enemies than false teachers. The mischief wrought by infidels and persecutors has been small compared with the mischief done by heretics within her own borders. False teachers have been ravening wolves.

Therefore watch. Vigilance is always necessary. The strongest Christian should never be off his guard. It is those who think that they are strong enough to stand alone, as Peter did, who are most liable to fall. Dr. Mahan relates the story of a great commander who was engaged in besiging a strongly fortified city. After awhile to the surprise of his officers, he concentrated his forces at a point where the fortifications were stronger than at any other, and at 2 P. M., under a bright sun and a clear sky, ordered an assault. When expostulated with by an under officer, the commander replied: "At this point such a General is in command. At this hour of the day he is invariably accustomed to retire for a long sleep. When informed of our approach he will deny the fact, and send a messenger for information Before the messenger returns we shall gain possession of the fortress." The fact turned out exactly as predicted. "Yonder weak point," said the commander, "is held by General ——. There is no use in attempting to surprise him; he is never for a moment off his guard."

It is more blessed to give than to receive. Paul said these were Christ's words but we look in vain for them in the Gospels. None of the Evangelists report Christ as saying those words. The probable explanation is that as Luke was with him at the time and had been his companion on a previous journey Paul had heard from Luke's lips, or had seen in his manuscript of the Gospel which bears his name Christ's injunction (Luke 14: 12-14) and condensed it into one phrase. Or it may be that Christ really used the exact words and the Evangelists omitted to report them, although Luke may have told Paul of his doing so. John says that there were many things that Christ did which were never set down in writing (John 21: 25) and we may reasonably conclude that many of his sayings similarly escaped record.

The blessing is not always in temporal matters, although God often pays men in that way, too, and a man prospers who gives much. No one, however, should give from that motive. A penurious farmer who attended a meeting where an appeal was made for money, gave half a dollar, being led to do so by hearing several anecdotes of people receiving again in unexpected ways the money they had given. On his way home the farmer found half a dollar and joyfully told a godly man of the incident. "I should not be elated about it," said the good man. "You ought not to have given in the hope of receiving as much again; God is not pleased with gifts so offered; I should not be surprised if he was offended at your gift when he looked into your heart and threw you half a dollar in the way, so as to be under no obligation to you."

A SPIRITUAL LIGHT-HOUSE.

The "Sjomanshem" or Seamen's Home of Christiania and its Beneficent Gospel Work Among the Sailors of all Lands—Pastor Rosendahl and his Mission.

WHEN Christ chose his disciples, he first called to himself the toilers of the sea. It is not surprising, therefore, that his followers everywhere should have a kindly feeling for the sailors—those wanderers of the deep, whose hardy lives are passed amid perils such as landsmen never know. Yet, as a class, they are comparatively neglected in spiritual affairs, although it is true that, in recent years, Christian missions have been established in many of the larger seaports in civilized countries, for their benefit. One of the most recent and unique institutions of this character is the "Sjomanshem" or Seamen's Home of Christiania, Norway, of which Rev. M. Rosendahl is superintendent. The "Sjomanshem" (which is shown in the illustration on this page) was founded in February of last year. It is a white brick building, four stories high, three of which are occupied by the Home, the lower being stores.

KING OSCAR II.
The Home's first Patron.

Nineteen rooms are used as dormitories, and there are wash-rooms, kitchen, dining-rooms and other accommodations. The reading-room, which is also the meeting hall, has a seating capacity of nearly two hundred.

A number of gentlemen had agitated the need of such a home for several years before the project finally assumed definite shape. The building was secured at a rental of $2,000 a year.

Christiania is one of the largest seaports in Northern Europe, and has consequently a very large fluctuating population of seamen during the whole year. Heretofore these men have been accommodated at saloons, lodging-houses and low resorts along the docks, where they have too often fallen victims to disreputable lodging-house keepers. Drunkenness, robbery and vice characterize these places. It was decided to make the effort to do something for the physical comfort and moral welfare of the sailors, and the International Home was the result. It is the pioneer institution of the kind in the Norwegian capital. The total cost of conducting it is about 10,000 crowns annually, one dollar being equal to 3 3-4 crowns.

"We have men meeting every ship," Pastor Rosendahl explained, "and all sailors who are going to 'lay up,' are taken to the Home. There are runners from the boarding-houses (every boarding-house being a saloon), who also want to take the sailors, and there is a lively competition in consequence. The saloons charge the sailors all they can get. In many cases, after having undergone the bitter and costly experience of putting up at a saloon boarding-house, the sailors come to the Home, where they are cared for until they go on board a new ship.

"These sailors are from all parts of the world—German, English, American, French, Russian, Italian, and even from the South American Republic, besides those from Norway and Sweden. The daily routine at the Home is: rising at 7 o'clock, breakfast at 8, prayers at 9, dinner at 2, supper at 7, with regular services on Sunday afternoons, and a short service nearly every evening, especially in winter. The services are all well attended and music is a feature. Sailors everywhere are fond of music and this proves a powerful attraction. It is not infrequent to hear the familiar Gospel hymns sung, with accuracy as to air, in several languages at the same time. This, however, causes no confusion. 'Rock of Ages,' sung simultaneously in German, French, Swedish and English, may sound incongruous to a critical ear, but in reality it is quite pleasant and musical.

"The institution has been the recipient of royal patronage almost since the start. King Oscar II. and Queen Sophia have, throughout their reign, evinced a cordial feeling in every movement for the benefit of seamen in Stockholm."

One day in 1892, the Superintendent of the Sailors' Home was surprised and delighted by a visit from Ferste Hofmarskalk Trelich, one of the officials from the Royal Palace at Christiania, who informed him that King Oscar desired to become a patron of the Home, and to help it by a royal appropriation. This help has been continued at intervals. This mark of royal interest was followed by contributions from a number of high dignitaries both in Norway and Sweden. These are now among the steady patrons of the Home.

The Christiania Home has many friends in the United States who are interested in its welfare. Among these patrons who have contributed to its support are some residing in New York, Chicago, Indianapolis, St. Paul, Kansas City and elsewhere. Contributions from American friends are received by Prof. F. Risberg, 81 Ashland Boulevard, Chicago, Ill., who is wellknown among Scandinavians throughout this country. The present accommodations of the Home have been found to be insufficient for its growing needs. The field of operations is so large and the demands on the Home have increased so rapidly that more extensive quarters have become a necessity. It is, therefore, proposed to erect a suitable building, with accommodations for at least 100 bed-rooms and with increased facilities in other departments. Superintendent Rosendahl is now in this country for the purpose of starting a fund for a new building. Mr. Rosendahl, the founder of the Home, is a native of Scandinavia, but was educated in the United States and is a graduate of the Chicago Theological Seminary. He has had pastoral experience in Sioux City, Ia., and has also preached in several cities in Sweden and Norway. For many years he has been interested in the condition of sailors throughout the world.

There have been many cases of genuine conversion among the sailors who have attended the Home. Some who have been noted for their rough lives, have become changed men. During the time between leaving one ship and seeking for another, they have, by staying at the Home, been kept away from their former evil associates and brought under better influences and the result has been beneficial. Five Christian workers are constantly engaged among the inmates of the Home.

One case is peculiarly interesting. A German mate of an ocean vessel came to Christiania and went to the Home, asking if he could stop there until he got a ship to Hamburg. He had been summoned there and he said he expected to die, as all his relatives were sick with the cholera. He said:

"I have just got a telegram telling me to come home right off."

He seemed to have a premonition that the coming voyage was to be his last. The Superintendent asked him:

"You say you are going home to Hamburg and expect to die. Are you prepared to die?"

The man shook his head. "I know nothing about that. I know all about navigation, but nothing about what you are speaking. If you will place a barrel in the ocean on the darkest night, and give me its latitude, I can find my way to it; but about dying—no, I don't know. I am not prepared to die."

"Well," said the Superintendent, comfortingly, "it is a very simple matter. You say you have been summoned to go to Hamburg. Here," pointing to the 28th verse of the 11th chapter of Matthew, "is an invitation which you can understand, and which, if you will accept, you will then be prepared." And he read the words, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

"Yes," said the sailor, "if anybody is heavy laden, I surely am; but how am I to know that this is addressed to me?"

"Ah," said the Superintendent, "the Saviour says 'come unto me all ye.' That surely includes you." The man was greatly affected and expressed a desire to accept the Gospel invitation, and the Superintendent, after further speaking with him, prayed, the sailor joining heartily in the petition for mercy and forgiveness. He arose greatly comforted.

"Now," said the Superintendent, kindly, "I want you, since you have to go to Hamburg, to write me on arriving there and tell me how you find matters, and also as to the condition of your own soul."

"Ah," said the mate, joyfully, "I will do that, sir. I will write you the first day I arrive there. I am so glad you have shown me this invitation, and that I have accepted it. May God bless you for it."

During the three days he remained in Christiania, he showed himself a thoroughly changed man. His appearance, far from being gloomy, was joyful. He found among the Gospel hymns one which he seemed to delight in quoting:

I have a Saviour who is tenderly pleading.

At last the day came when he must sail for Hamburg, and Mr. Rosendahl accompanied him to the ship. At that time, the cholera was raging with frightful violence in the German city, and the mate doubtless found himself in the midst of the plague and fell a victim for no letter was ever received from him by the Pastor of the Seamen's Home.

YOUTH IN JAPAN

THE children of the Japanese are happy beings. "In no other country," writes Dr. W. D. Eastlake in the Popular Science Monthly, "is childhood made so much of, or are children surrounded by so many means of enjoyment. On the streets in every town are venders and hawkers whose sole customers are children. One class of these venders mentioned, carry charcoal stoves or furnaces; for the moderate sum of one cent a child is supplied with a small cup of sweetened batter and a spoon. The children can bake their own cakes on the top of the stove which the vender carries, fashioning the dainties into whatever shape they wish, and when they are crisp and brown, they can eat them. And then there are persons whose object is to amuse the children by various methods. The universal love and regard for children are displayed in a thousand ways. At every temple festival are numerous booths, gay with toys, flags and games. At the family feasts, the baby plays the chief role. Toys, gowns, sweets and money are lavished upon the little ones by admiring relatives and friends. The relations between parents and children are very free and natural. They are instructed, nothing being left for them to learn from outside sources, as soon as they are old enough to inquire. The result is perfect candor, which instead of developing undue precocity, serves to preserve that indefinable unconscious grace so beatiful in childhood."

The school education of children in Japan begins at the age of six. In the primary department the boys and girls are taught together. They occupy different parts of the school-room. The moral education of Japanese children is conducted partly at home and partly in school. Intrepid valor, zeal, sobriety, directness of speech, extreme courtesy, implicit obedience to parents and superiors and deferential reverence and regard for old age, these are among the chief characteristics looked for in boys, while industry, gentleness, faithfulness and cheerfulness are required in girls. Where Christian influences exist, such an education is wellnigh perfect.

INGRATITUDE

PUBLIC men are targets to be shot at, belied, pursued, misinterpreted. I was surprised to read what Macaulay wrote in one of his intense sentences, after all his bright career in the English Parliament, and after being renowned the world over by all who could admire fine writing and great thought—Macaulay says: "Every friendship which a man may have becomes precarious as soon as he engages in politics." Daniel Webster, after his wonderful career and in the close of his life, writes: "If I were to live my life over again, with my present experiences, I would under no consideration allow myself to enter public life. The public are ungrateful. The man who serves the public most faithfully receives no adequate reward. In my own history those acts which have been before God most disinterested, and the least stained by selfish considerations have been precisely those for which I have been most freely abused. No, no, have nothing to do with politics. Sell your iron, eat the bread of independence, support your family with the rewards of honest toil, do your duty as a private citizen to your country, but let politics alone. It is a hard life, a thankless life. I have had in the course of my political life, which is not a short one, my full share of ingratitude; but the unkindest cut of all, the shaft that has sunk the deepest in my heart, has been the refusal of this administration to grant my request for an office of small pecuniary consideration for my only son." That is the testimony of a man who ought to know. My friends, better stay down than be shot down. He who has a good occupation, a good home, a good character, a good field of usefulness, and a good hope in Jesus Christ has all that is worth having.

MIDSUMMER WEARINESS.

THERE are two ways of taking warm days. We can fret and fume and complain of the heat, look at the thermometer twenty times a day, and gaze in despair from the blistering pavement to the burning sky. We can be as miserable as we please, and all the palm-leaf fans in the world will fail to cool our unhappy tempers. On the other hand, we can accept the situation. We can avail ourselves of all the comfort there may be about about us, and we can [illegible] thought, to the heat. It would be very pleasant, of course, to spend midsummer days rocking in a boat, with the cool salt spray blowing in our faces, or swinging in a hammock, lulled by the crulling murmur of the wind among the oaks. But we must follow our duty-path, and if it keeps us in a close office, or in a closer kitchen, or wielding a hammer, or stitching at a machine, we shall make matters worse rather than better by continual self-moaning.

It is a glorious thing to have got where we can stand on the Apostle's platform, and say from the heart, "I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content." In the end, a child of God is sure to conquer circumstances, however adverse, and it is a shame that any one, in whose nature are infinite possibilities, should let himself be conquered by any infelicities of passing life.

These warm days are so affluent, so abounding in vitality—though they drain us a little of our vital force, it is only to give it back by and by in larger measure. They are so rich in beauty. How many summer-dressed hill-sides, just now, are like roseate walls, carved in the coralline clusters of the laurel, from top to bottom, over all their dimpling slopes. How many lovely lakes laugh in the morning, under the white and golden glory of the lilies. How green and graceful are the ferns that grow in shadowy places. How sweet the songs of birds, poured out through the soft expectancy of the dawn. In the city parks, how velvety are lawns and swards, close-clipped, and resting the eye with their verdure. And the dear little city gardens, so tenderly loved and cared for, how burdened they are with fuchsias, and heliotropes, and delicate mignonnette, and lavish petunia. To say nothing of the growing corn, and the ripening fruit, and buckwheat, and the rye, what, on the score of the beautiful alone, should we do witheut the long warm days?

THE TIME OF AWAKENING.

THERE comes a time in every man's life when he wakes up to an appreciation of his sinful nature. The thought may not have enought heft to fell him—it may only be like the flash of a cloud at the close of a hot summer day—but the man must somehow get rid of that feeling. One man flies to prayer, another man stimulates himself with ardent spirits, another man dives deeper into secularities. It is not wonderful when a man sees his eternity poised on an uncertainty, that he is determined to do something violent and immediate. Now, can it be that there is in all our circle of acquaintance, one man who is unwilling to have the cancer of sin taken from his soul, when the divine Surgeon is ready to do the work, and do it successfully? I cannot believe it.

The first thing for you to do if you are oppressed, my brother—if you are oppressed with a sense of your sinfulness, is to go and tell Jesus. Why, my friends, that is the business of Christ. He does other things, but I think the great business of Christ is to pardon. To relax the grip of death from your soul, and to plant your unshackled foot on a golden throne, Christ allowed the tortures of the bloody mount to transfix him. With the beam of his own cross he will quickly crush in the door of your dungeon. Out of his own thorny crown he will pick enough gems to make your brow blaze with eternal victory.

I have heard people say they were never tempted—people who have come to middle life that never have been tempted. It is because they have never tried to do right! If a man be handcuffed and hobbled, and he lie quiet, he does not test the power of the chain or the manacle; but let him once try to rise up and break off the handcuffs and the shackles, then he finds out the power of the chain. If, my dear brother, you do not know the power of temptation, it is because you are bound hand and foot to sin, and have never made the attempt to be emancipated. Why, it is easy enough to row down stream in a boat. You can lie upon your oars. You go just as the tide goes. But suppose you turn around and head up stream, then it is not so easy making progress. As long as you go down with the tide of sin and iniquity it is easy enough to go that way; but when you turn around and head toward God and heaven, then it is a struggle—an awful struggle.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

IN last week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD there was an error of the types in our reply to Wm. Vincent, Sioux Falls, So. Dak., regarding the Apostles' Creed. This error (which made it appear that the apostles composed the Creed in the year 400) was corrected in a large part of the edition. What was intended to be conveyed was that Rufinus (who lived about A.D. 400), wrote that in his time a tradition was current that the apostles, being about to leave Jerusalem, and filled with the Holy Ghost, had composed the rule or creed of their doctrine, each contributing his part.

Subscriber, Erie Pa. 1. In Acts 16:15, what is meant by her household? 2. What is the address of Rev. George W. Sharp? 3. Will THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Gospel Stage pass near Erie, Pa.?

1. Those living under her roof, both relatives and dependants. 2. Kirksville, Mo. 3. Possibly, but the route may be changed, as circumstances direct.

Subscriber, Richburg, S. C. Where can a minister get the best books of illustration for use in sermons?

Among the best are "Baxendale Treasury of Anecdotes," published by Thomas Whittaker, Bible House, New York; "Foster's Illustrations in Poetry and Prose," published by Methodist Book Concern, New York, and the "Homiletic Cyclopædia," by Funk & Wagnalls, New York.

G. D. Garbarian, Providence, R. I. Where could I obtain one or two volumes containing all the sermons Pastor C. H. Spurgeon preached? What are his best works?

The number of Mr. Spurgeon's sermons printed is 2,375. The ordinary volumes contain twenty-eight sermons, although there may be volumes containing fifty-six issued by some publishers. His Treasury of David Mr. Spurgeon considered his best work. John Ploughman's Talks is probably the one which has had the largest sale.

Mrs. S. B. Hamlett, Waco, Tex. Was Lydia a preacher? If so was she the first woman to preach the Gospel in Europe?

She may have preached, but there is no direct evidence of the fact. Indeed, considering her evident reverence for the Apostle Paul, the most probable inference from what we are told of her, would be that she would refrain from disobeying his explicit injunction against women of that day and region preaching in the churches.

Baptist, Jersey City, N. J. Do you believe that baptism is efficacious when it is not trine immersion in running water? I was baptised in still water in the baptistery of our church. Is it necessary for me to be baptized again?

Not the least necessity. When you ask about the efficacy of the ordinance you show that you misunderstand it. What do you suppose baptism by any mode, in any form, or any kind of water, can do for you? It cannot help you or benefit you in any way. It is your duty to be baptized and publicly profess your faith in Christ, but you will gain no benefit by it and should expect none. It is the initiatory rite which Christ ordained, and if you undergo it according to your conscience, that is all that concerns you.

Miss Sadie Fetzer, Reidsburg, Pa. Will you kindly tell me where I will find in the Bible how long the Saviour remained on earth after his resurrection? The question was asked in our Sunday School, and I gave as an answer "37 days"

Forty days, see Acts 1: 3., where Luke says he "was seen of them forty days." The latest commentators on the Gospels fix the chronology of the Death, Resurrection, and Ascension thus:

Crucifixion	March 18,	Matt. 27: 34-35.
Resurrection	March 20,	Matt. 28: 1-8 & parallels.
Ascension	March 27,	John 20: 24-29.
Appearance at Tiberias	March 30.	Matt. 28: 16 & parallels.
Appearance to 500	March 31	1 Cor. 15: 6 & Matt. 28: 19-20.
Appears to James	———	1 Cor. 15: 7.
Appears to all the Apostles and ascension (40 days from Passion) April 28.		Mark 16: 19 and parallels.

The authorities are, among others, Rev. John McClintock, D.D. and Rev. James Strong, S. T. D. See Harmony of the Gospels and Biblical Encyclopedia.

F. S. D., Peru, N. Y. How would you advise a poor [illegible] preach the Gospel but has no means of getting [illegible]

First commit the matter to God in prayer. Secondly, do all the good you can in your present sphere of life. It is a very grand thing to live such a life as the Apostle Paul often did, supporting oneself by one's own labor and preaching the Gospel without payment. If you do that, and God uses you in the conversion of souls, the way to the regular ministry will probably be opened to you. If it is not, you may go on with your work, giving your service freely to the Lord. Incidentally it might be well to give some of your leisure time to the study of grammar and spelling.

T. S. Blough, Exeter, Nebr. Can you or any of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD tell me when I can get that beautiful song, the words of the first verse of which are something like this as near as I can give them:

> There's a question that comes to us all,
> And it comes many times in a day,
> Oh, it comes as a kind angel call!
> It says, count the cost will it pay?

This beautiful song was sung at a Sunday School celebration many years ago by a Doctor and his two daughters at Strawtown, Hamilton Co., Indiana. We shall esteem it a favor if you can find it for us.

J. H. N, Okolona, Miss. Where can I find a sermon on gambling, by Dr. Talmage? I want it for some young men who read his sermons and who can't be convinced that gambling is wrong.

In his volume entitled Trumpet Peals, published by Webster & Co., New York, Rev. Dr. Talmage's sermon on gambling will be found. It will doubtless be what you desire.

M. R. Smith, Delaware, O., writes: In your issue of July 12, I notice J. P. F. Burroughs of Richmond, Va., asks the authorship of a short poem with which I have been familiar all my life, and, while unable to give the author's name, will give such information as I command. I own a book of short sketches, anecdotes and illustrations of a religious character, published A. D. 1844, entitled "Sabbath Day Miscellany." From this I quote the entire article:

THE LOVE OF GOD.

The following lines composed by a lunatic, were found written on the wall of his cell after his death:

> Could we with ink the ocean fill,
> And were the skies of parchment made;
> Were every stalk on earth a quill,
> And every man a scribe by trade.
> To write the love of God above,
> Would drain the ocean dry;
> Nor could the scroll contain the whole,
> If stretched from sky to sky.

Jessie T. Davis, Binghamton, N. Y. What are the meanings of the popular feminine names? I have seen them somewhere, several years ago, I think.

We cannot devote space to more than a few. Mary, Maria, Marie (and all other forms of this beautiful name) mean "bitterness;" Helen (also with many variations) "alluring;" Susan "a lily;" Anne "kind, or gracious;" Rebecca "plump;" Lucy "brightness;" Louisa "one who protects;" Frances "frank or free;" Catharine "pure or chaste;" Caroline and Charlotte "queens;" Sophia "wisdom;" Emma "tender;" Margaret "a pearl;" Elizabeth "true;" Julia "soft-hearted;" Agnes "chaste;" Amelia "beloved;" Clara "clear;" Gertrude "all truth;" Grace "favor;" Matilda "noble;" Phœbe "light of life;" Amanda "amiable;" Edith "happy."

M. P. Webb, Haigler, Neb. How can David, who practised polygamy, be called a man after God's own heart?

That he was so called is a fact. Samuel in one age and Paul in another used the words and implied that God authorized them. It does not imply that David was a perfect man, and, as a matter of fact, there were worse things than polygamy against him. But God did not condone his crimes. He was sharply reproved and punished. His repentant spirit and his general conscientious desire to serve God, proved that his heart was right, though like many other great and good men he fell before temptation. Read his Psalm numbered fifty-one in our Bibles and see how bitterly he grieved over his sin. If you compare that effusion with Luke 15:7 you may find the key to the mystery. Beside this, the age was not a moral or cultured one. Compared with other kings of his day, David's character was almost blameless.

M. E. Kingston, Morissa, Ill. 1. Yes, the Protestants. 2. Write to Rev. H. B. Hartzler, Northfield, Mass. 3. Yes, but it is the duty of all who have the opportunity of enjoying church privileges to do so. —C. W. B., Framingham, Mass. The best plan would be to lose no time in entering a theological seminary. Desultory study is seldom valuable.—John E. Anderson, West Boylston, Mass. By no means. That is the jesuitical view of it, not the Christian.—Clarence Parrish, Rio Vista, Va. No, there is no House of Burgesses. There are in Great Britain bodies with purely local functions, known as Burgesses. Their powers, originally relating to educational interests and endowments. In England there are local administrative bodies, such as Aldermen, Justices and County Councils, but there is no general administrative body as in our Parliament. There was at one time in Virginia a "House of Burgesses," now known as the "House of Delegates." —C. B., Chicago. Send us your name and address.—Reader, Friars' Point, Miss. Write to T. E. THE CELESTIAL STRANGER.

THE scientific world was surprised on July 9, by the announcement that a new comet had been discovered by Prof. Alfred Rordame of Salt Lake City. On the following evening it was seen by Professors Swift and Main of Rochester, N. Y. It is described as an exceedingly bright object, its head being the size of a star of the second or third magnitude and its tail five degrees in length. When first seen it was in the position indicated in the accompanying diagram. It was in the constellation of the Lynx, near the Great Bear, and only twenty million miles from the earth. It was receding from us and approaching the sun. On July 16, as Prof. Frisbie was watching the comet through the great telescope at the Naval Observatory at Washington, he saw a stream of light, millions of miles long and about three times the width of the moon, shoot out from it. The phenomenon was very beautiful but inexplicable, except on the theory that the comet is in process of devolopment. The singular fact about the strange visitor was that it was first seen by the naked eye. As a rule, the approach of a comet is detected by a telescope long before it is near enough to us to be seen with the naked eye. The fact implies that the comet was traveling at a rate of speed inconceivably rapid, otherwise the telescope would have discovered it before it came so near. The astronomers have been unable to identify it with any comet previously seen, and it is believed, therefore, that it must have so enormous an orbit that it has not been visible from the earth at any time since observations of the heavens have been recorded. Its appearance has been a genuine surprise to scientific men as its existence was unknown. The time is coming when there will be far greater and more widely extended surprise over an appearance in the heavens, for in spite of all the warnings and predictions which have been given, men will be taken by surprise when the stars are shaken and the Lord descends from heaven in power and great glory. (Rev. 1: 7.)

A Dangerous Sleeping-place.

A SINGULAR fatality occurred in Williamsburg, N. Y., on July 5th. A member of a German band recently hired a room in the third story at the rear of a house in that town. He has been regular in his habits and has borne a good character for sobriety and in other matters. On the day in question he was out with the band as usual and returned late in the evening. The next morning he was found lying on the pavement of the back yard in a pool of blood. It was at first supposed that there had been a quarrel and he had been thrown out of the window. But at the hospital to which he was taken, he recovered consciousness and said that he remembered, on going to his room, being oppressed with the intense heat. He opened his window and seated himself on the ledge. He remembered nothing more until he woke up in the hospital. He supposed he had fallen asleep and had rolled off the ledge. His injuries were so severe that he died the next night. It was a terrible penalty to pay for heedlessness, but there is reason to fear that a still worse calamity may come upon some who, in spite of warnings, are sunk in the sleep of indifference and sin, on the brink of eternity. (Eph. 5: 14.)

Unconscious Litigation.

THE result of a suit in a New Jersey court has caused some surprise to the parties involved. It appears that a little more than a year ago a business man of Gloucester City, N. J., had a quarrel with his wife and some injudicious acquaintances increased his anger against her by telling him of some rumors to her detriment which they professed to have heard. The man who is of an irascible temperament instructed his lawyer to commence proceedings for a divorce, and furnished him with the necessary evidence. The papers were served and the lawyer was urged to press the case vigorously. But the man's anger died out; he sought his wife and became reconciled to her. He called upon his lawyer and left instructions to discontinue the suit. Whether the lawyer received them or misunderstood them, is not clear; but he went on with the suit. A few days ago he called at his client's house and informed him in triumph that Chancellor McGill had granted a decree of divorce. He went to his wife in consternation and told her what had happened. She looked at him reproachfully, and said, "I suppose I must bear it." But the husband was not inclined to do so and bade his wife accompany him at once to their minister's house, where they were remarried. The decree of the court could avail nothing when there was genuine love for his wife in the man's heart. Nor will the decree of expulsion which a church is sometimes obliged to pronounce against some erring member avail, if the expelled one goes to his Lord with a repentant heart, for his love is infinite and unchangeable. (Rom. 8: 39.)

A Dress for a Golden Wedding.

AN interesting celebration took place recently in Gibson Township, Pennsylvania. It was the golden wedding of a worthy and respected couple who had spent the fifty years of their wedded life on the same farm. They have been looking forward for a year past to the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of their wedding. In a distant corner of the old farm the farmer sowed a patch of flax. He watched its growth with anxiety but it proved an excellent crop. When it was gathered and duly prepared, he told his wife of his plan. She searched the attic for her long disused spinning wheel and soon had it busily humming in the house-place. In a few days the old lady's hand had regained its dexterity and the flax was being spun into yarn and reeled in skeins. It was well bleached and then the farmer oiled the old loom and the yarn was woven into cloth. A month before the wedding-day all was ready. From the same cloth a dress had been made for the wife and a suit of clothes for the husband, both being the exact counterpart of the clothes they wore at their wedding in 1843. So dressed, they received the relatives and friends, to the number of fifty, whom they had invited to join them in celebrating the anniversary. The old couple are wealthy now and could have afforded to buy fashionable clothing for the occasion, but the home made linen seemed better, as it reminded them of their early struggles. So it will be with the Christian when he sits down at the marriage-supper of the Lamb. However honored he may have been among men for his gifts, his talents or his usefulness, the robe he will desire to wear will be that robe of Christ's righteousness which he took upon him when first he knew the Lord. (Isa. 61: 10.)

A Quarrel About the Flag.

A dispute about the Stars and Stripes has had a fatal termination at Hoboken, N. J. A barber in that town left the flags in place with which he had decorated his shop in honor of the glorious Fourth. Late one evening, a few days afterward, some men were in the shop waiting their turn for the barber's attentions when a discussion arose on American institutions. One of the men, who was reputed to be a Socialist, declared that the vaunted liberties of the nation were a sham, that the country was governed in the interest of rich men and corporations, and that all that had been said and sung about the honored flag was nonsense. One of the men present contradicted him and, taunting him with the fact of his being an immigrant, advised him to go back to his own country if he did not find all the liberty he wanted here. He finally declared that no national flag in the world represented the government of so great and free a people, and he would defend it from insult while he had blood in his body. The dispute grew warmer until the Socialist, to show his contempt for the emblem, cursed it and spat upon it. His opponent promptly knocked him down and then, as the barber objected to fighting in his shop, they adjourned to a vacant lot to fight. The Socialist was repeatedly knocked down, and the last time, his head struck a stone, which fractured the skull, and he died. His slayer has been arrested and held for trial, for the law recognizes only one justification for taking human life in time of peace—that of self-defence. It is not, however, likely that an American jury will find him guilty of murder, for they will consider, and rightly, that the man's patriotism in avenging the insult to the flag was more creditable to him than if he had fought in self-defence. It is much to be wished that Christians were similarly sensitive where the honor of their Lord and his kingdom is impugned. They ought not to fight about it, for fighting is contrary to their principles; bnt they should never be ashamed, in any company, to let it be known that they are the friends and followers of Christ (Matt. 10: 32.)

A Double Disappointment.

A STRANGE experience has befallen a young man in Pennsylvania. About a year ago he removed from Hyde Park to Wilkesbarre.

POSITION OF THE RORDAME COMET NEAR THE CONSTELLATION URSA MAJOR.
1. The Polar Star. 2. Great Wagon or the Dipper. 3. The Rordame Comet.

There he made the acquaintance of a young lady with whom he fell violently in love. Her parents objected to the match, but there was evidently a strong feeling between the young people which could not long be held in check. The girl believed that her parents would eventually yield, and therefore refused to elope, as her lover wished her to do. He was much distressed by her refusal and declared that life was not worth living without her. Finally, as she persisted in refusing to marry without her parents' consent, he determined to commit suicide. He attempted to execute his wicked resolve, but was discovered in time to save his life. For many weeks, he hovered between life and death. When at last he did recover, the girl yielded to his entreaties, and went with him to Binghampton, where they were married. On July 14th, two months after the ceremony, the man met one of his old friends, whom he told confidentially that marriage was a much over-rated institution, and that he was grievously disappointed. So disgusted was he with the union, that he intended to kill himself. His friend first laughed at him, but afterward, finding him serious in his purpose, expostulated with him. But it was useless; that night he poisoned himself. Many men have committed suicide when they have discovered that their wives were not congenial, and many more have committed suicide because they could not get the woman they wanted for a wife, but seldom, if ever, have we heard of one man figuring in both categories. It is not, however, at all uncommon for a man to suffer misery until he has attained some object on which he has set his heart, only to find after he has attained it that it is the cause of greater misery. We read of some whom God punished by giving them their heart's desire. (Psalm 78: 29.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The first recipient of the degree of Ph. D. from the University of Chicago, is a Japanese who is to be professor of Old Testament literature in a Methodist college at Tokio.

A traveler recently returned from the Holy Land, says that part of the way to the Mount of Olives is disfigured by advertisements of Dublin stout, and that bands play dance music on Sundays in the Garden of Gethsemane.

A number of Christian young men in Oroomiah, Persia, have formed tnemselves into an Association for Evangelistic purposes. Every week they make an excursion into some adjacent village where they hold a religious service.

A mission has been established in the Soudan by three young men from Kansas, who having studied the reports of the explorers and consulted with Mr. H. Grattan Guinness have begun farming. They expect their farms to support them and they will do missionary work as they have opportunity.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Gospel Stage is being cordially received in the the towns it has visited on its way through Pennsylvania. The young men gratefully acknowledge the hospitalities tendered them by readers and friends of this journal. The newspapers also courteously give notice of their meetings at their encampments.

The receipts of the American Board, as compared with last year, fell off in June in donations $10,892.55 and in legacies $18,745.26. The total loss for the ten months is $79,100.-63. "This means," says the Congregationalist, "extensive crippling of missionary enterprises in many points and may result in losses which cannot be recovered for many years."

The United States Army Aid Association has opened a retreat in New York for old soldiers resident in the city or who may visit it. The object is to provide a place where the veteran may rest, get light refreshment and advice or assistance if he needs it. The shelter is at 82 Nassau St. Such institutions have been found very useful in England and France.

Rev. Mr. Bowen, the agent of the American Bible Society in the Levant, complains of the incessant interference of the local authorities in Turkey with the society's colporteur's, who in defiance of law and of treaty obligations are arrested, imprisoned and deprived of their books. This state of things has become chronic, and calls for more effective protection from the Government of the United States.

The Fourth Convention of the New York State Christian Alliance, of which Rev. A. B. Simpson is president, will be held in Kanka Park, Yates Co., N. Y., July 22–30. It is hoped that Mr. Simpson will be back from his tour in India, China, etc., in time to attend the later sessions of the convention. Arrangements as to accommodation, traveling, etc., may be made by addressing Rev. C. N. Kinney, Sing, Sing, N. Y.

The following contributions have been received during the week in aid of the proposed Permanent Lodging House for Homeless Girls in New York City: A. Blair, Carlisle, Pa., $5; a friend to the fallen, Lena, O., $1; J. E. G., Sayville, L.I., $1; ——, Honey Brook, Pa., $5; Friend, Philadelphia, Pa., $2; Mrs. Demila Bryant, Lanesboro, Pa., $1; Henry Austin, Belton, Tex., $2.50; Mrs. John Corrigan, Carlisle, Ontario, Can., $2; Miss Stella Stewart, Mannington, W. Va., $2; Sue T. Smith, Rockland, Mass., $2. Total, $23.50, which, with $167.95 already received, makes a grand total of $191.45.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

STOPPED WELLS OPENED.

Sermon preached before the Tremont Temple Church, now meeting in Music Hall, Boston, last Sunday evening, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D. Text: Genesis xxvi. 18. "And Isaac digged again the wells of water, which they had digged in the days of Abraham his father; for the Philistines had stopped them after the death of Abraham: and he called their names after the names by which his father had called them."

THIS text brings before us an interesting incident of this olden time. We are brought into the society of characters whose names are familiar to the race as representatives of the patriarchal period. We live over again the simple life of that primitive period. We find, however, even here in this ancient time and in this childhood of the race the passions, ambitions, disappointments and jealousies which are characteristic of the stirring life of our own day. The Philistines were jealous of Isaac. He was too prosperous to suit their desires. Our prosperity almost inevitably arouses the envy of our neighbors; and envy of this character invariably proceeds to inflict injury. No man will be envious of you when everything goes badly with you; but the moment prosperity smiles upon you jealousy and wrath arise and find place in the hearts of small-souled neighbors. Such neighbors will drag you down if they cannot themselves go up with you. Many business men know only too well the meaning of this envious spirit. Professional men have had similar experience from those in their own profession. The ministry is not free from some degree of jealousy on the one side and of suffering on the other. It is humiliating to make this confession, but the facts warrant it in its strongest form.

A Rule of Estimate.

Isaac does not appear always to the best advantage in the chapter from which this text is taken; but we ought not to judge him or other men simply by certain portions or chapters in their lives. Dr. Parker has well suggested that if we were so to judge men they would appear either as too good or too bad. No man is quite so good as he appears at certain times in his life; and perhaps we may say with equal truth that no man is quite so bad as he appears at certain other times in his life. Isaac was certainly an abominable man when he lied to the king of the Philistines; but when he goes out well-hunting he appears in a much better light, for while he was guilty of falsehood toward a living king he was full of tenderness toward the memory of his dead father. We ought to judge men in their entirety. We know that men will sometimes perform acts that are beautiful and saintly, and yet afterward these same men will act in a manner that is well-nigh satanic. We are warranted in saying that no man is as bad as he sometimes seems to be, nor so good as at other times he seems to be. Every true Christian is better on the inside than on the outside; every unconverted man is worse on the inside than on the outside. Every true Christian is like the gold in Solomon's temple; the farther in you went [illegible]

We see that Abimelech wished to drive Isaac away because of Isaac's prosperity, and also in order to secure which Abraham had digged. Isaac showed a kindly disposition in not fiercely resenting Abimelech's opposition. He might have pleaded the covenant made with his father, but being a man of peace he waives dispute and subm[illegible]vely retires "to the valley of Gerar," which territory was either beyond the borders of Abimelech's possessions, or at a distance from his capital. Isaac re-digs the wells which Abraham had digged and which had been filled up. We know that the filling up of a well was a common mode of opposing an enemy. A [illegible] value; and often in the predatory wars of these days it was common in taking vengeance on enemies to fill up the wells with sand, or even with the bodies of unclean beasts. We know that the Turkish emperors often give to the Arab tribes who live near the road on which Mohammedan pilgrims travel to Mecca a certain sum of money and a certain number of garments each year, so that they may not fill up the wells near the route taken by the pilgrims. The Philistines would have shown their opposition merely by forcing their way to these wells and taking possession of them; but by filling them up they were guilty of an act of gross violation of treaties of peace among tribes and nations.

Very beautifully does Isaac show his peaceful disposition in digging the wells again, and his filial affection in calling their names after the names given them by his father. Wells in many of these countries are and they are valuable to the people in this respect as well as for their water. Wherever Abraham went he improved the country by the digging of wells; and wherever the Philistines followed him they injured the country by destroying his improvements, and especially by filling up the wells. Tender thoughts doubtless came into Isaac's heart when he remembered how years before, his father Abraham had dug and named these wells. Memories of this kind would make the water doubly sweet to his taste; thus filial affection co-operated with necessity in unstopping these wells. It was an act of commendable affection on his part to give them once more the names bestowed upon them by Abraham; these names were also memorials of the divine favor, so that Isaac manifested a proper spirit toward God and toward his father in repeating the names which the wells formerly bore. Some years ago when in the Highlands of Scotland, at the early home of my father and mother, I took great pains to visit a certain spot on the shores of Lock Tay. Kneeling on the pebbly beach I leaned forward and took full draughts of the clear and sparkling water of that highland loch. Many times on that spot my father, when a young man, had satisfied his thirst from this water. I had often heard him describe the lake and the river as it flows through the beautiful valley until it empties into the sea where the terrible Dundee railroad disaster occurred a few weeks before I visited the spot. Feelings somewhat similar to those cherished by Isaac were in my heart as I drank the water from this lake.

A Kindly Man.

There was on the part of Isaac marked loyalty and equal love toward his father. He would honor his father by repeating, emphasizing and continuing the names which his father had given to these wells. He wished also to avoid all strife. He would not indulge in the hatred which sours the heart, distorts the countenance and embitters the life. Isaac's name means laughter, and although the name had no special reference to these incidents, yet it was in harmony with his kindly character. It is an unspeakably sad thing when a man's disposition makes him bitter toward his fellowmen, and at the same time despondent and morbid toward himself and his family. Such a spirit takes out of the voice all its music, gives the hand a coldness of touch, and makes the entire man miserable in himself and unwelcome among his neighbors. Such a spirit injures him who cherishes it more than it hurts him against whom its bitterness is expended. One loves to think that Isaac maintained the sweetness of his disposition amid these disappointments and exasperations. We see by the narrative that he had dug two wells and had been driven away from both of them, but that he still maintained gentleness of nature and kindness of conduct. Surely he would have been justified, if any one can be, in manifesting some righteous wrath because of the treatment he had received. It is unspeakably sad when men give way to the spirit of bitterness, to the morbidity of pessimism, and necessarily to some degree of infidelity. Weary work it was digging new wells, not half so bad in its result as cherishing the spirit of hatred which so many entertain to their own wretchedness and which they manifest to the wretchedness of others. Blessed are the peacemakers! Happy are the men and women of sweet tempers. We ought to put down that black and hideous hatred which takes all that is loveliest out of our own souls, and which blackens all that is fairest in our Father's world. There are still wells enough that are beautiful, even though some of our wells have been refilled. There are wells in the Church, in the home and in the heart; from these let the clear and sparkling water of peace and good will toward men ever flow, making music which is the echo of the song sung by the angels on the night the Christ was born.

Wells Waiting Reopening.

I stand before you to-night to perform a service similar to that performed by Isaac in that remote country. There are wells which existed in the days of Abraham, and even in the days of Adam, which have been partly filled up and some of which are well-nigh stopped. It is my purpose now to name, and, if possible, to unstop some of these wells. I ask you, first of all, to think for a little of the well of Revelation. This is one of the most distinguished wells ever opened up among men. Men needed a well opened at the throne, even at the heart of God. The light of nature was real light, but it was only twilight. It was good as far as it went, but it fell far short of banishing our darkness and illuminating our pathway. The Word of God never makes light of the light of nature. In the nineteenth psalm God's handiwork in the heavens is noted and honored; but when we come to the seventh verse of that psalm our attention is directed to the "law of the Lord," and we feel at once that we are standing upon firm ground, and that we have come into a new atmosphere. Thoughtful men, even among the heathen, men like Socrates and Plato, who made most of the light of nature, most desired fuller light than nature could give. God recognized this need and granted an abundant supply. There are men and women who are longing for additional light now, and only as they come to the Bible, the revealed Word and to Christ, the incarnate Word, can they receive the light for which their hearts long. The Word of God comes to us as one of the richest blessings of our Father in heaven to the children of men.

The Human Conduit.

The pipes through which this water flows are human, but the fountain is divine. This revelation is not less valuable because it comes to us through human channels. If God is to communicate with men he needs men through whom the communication can be made. The Lord Jesus, who is the incarnate Word, was human as well as divine. The perfection of his humanity is one of the best proofs of his divinity. The Bible, as the revealed Word, like the incarnate Word, is both human and divine. Many persons have argued as if the human element in the Bible exposed it to unfavorable criticism. As well might they object to the human element in the Lord Jesus. The presence of that element makes him and the Bible more perfect as the manifestation of the will of God to the children of men. Christ took not on him the nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham; so the Bible took not on itself the characteristics of angelic writers, but of men who were moved upon by the Holy Ghost.

Never was there such a fountain of revelation as this; it is next to the incarnation of Christ the fullest manifestation of God ever made to men. It has been partly stopped up. Men have said that they did not need a revelation from God. They have endeavored to dishonor the Bible, and to hurl it from its high place among the books of the world. To-night I would open this well, that you may drink and be refreshed. Daniel Webster tells us that when he was in Paris many years ago he was told of a French infidel, who found some stray leaves of in a drawer in his library. This infidel was in the habit of denouncing the Bible, although he was almost entirely ignorant of its character. He was, however, a man of fine literary taste, and he was readily captivated by the poetic beauty of the extracts which he had discovered. Hastening to his club he informed its members that he had made a wonderful discovery of some stray leaves "by a writer named 'Hab-ba-keek,' of course a Frenchman." We can readily imagine the great surprise of the infidel when he was informed that the leaves he had found contained a part of the prayer of Habakkuk in the third chapter of the book, one of the ancient prophets, whose writings are found in that despised book, the Bible. Daniel Webster does not hesitate to say that he regards this chapter as one of the sublimest passages of inspired literature. Many opponents of the Bible, like this Frenchman, simply succeed in advertising their own ignorance of its profound wisdom, poetic beauty, and religious instruction and inspiration. Let the water flow to-night through this divine well, water which comes clear as crystal from the very throne of God.

We shall strive also to unstop

The Well of Savation.

This well is one of the most blessed of all the wells ever unstopped. The word salvation is the sweetest word that men or angels ever heard. It cannot be translated into any language without imparting to the word chosen to represent it something of its own sweetness and beauty. I am sure that the word makes music in heaven. But this well has been partially stopped. False doctrines, ecclesiastical rites, meaningless ceremonies, prayer-books and numerous creeds have well nigh filled up this well. Men have talked learnedly of the councils of the church; but the more we know of some of them the less we care to know. At the council of Nicea grave and reverend divines acted at times like average city politicians at a ward caucus. Many of them were unworthy to represent the Church of Christ. All creeds are simply compromises between truth and error. It is often far more difficult to interpret them than to interpret the Scriptures on which the creeds are supposed to be founded. The history of creeds shows that they are divisive rather than unitive. We never can have church union on the basis of the historic creeds. I do not wish to give men theological stones when they are crying for bread, the bread that came down from heaven. We need the Gospel in all its simplicity, beauty and fulness.

Two Potent Words.

We shall not to-night discuss the doctrine of election. But I stand here to say whosever will, let him come and take the water of life freely. It has been well said that there are two words found in connection with the Christian life, whosoever and whatsoever. Whosoever is on the outside of the gate, showing that whether we be rich or poor, black or white, red or yellow, learned or ignorant we may enter. Whatsoever is on the inside of the gate teaching us that whatsoever we ask in the Master's name and for our soul's good we may receive. This glorious well I open tonight that all may drink of its refreshing and blessed waters.

I open also the well of Consolation. We have received salvation from God, we also need consolation in the many trials of life. At this moment some are sick, others are watching beside the sick, and still others are bearing other heavy burdens. Do not go to these burdened hearts with your cold and worldly maxims. Do not tell bruised souls of your philosophical remedies. The bleeding heart needs the healing touch of Jesus Christ. His alone is the touch which gives virtue, peace and benediction. We read that Cicero was overwhelmed with grief at the death of his daughter Tullia. He loved her with pure and parental tenderness. In his sorrow he resorted to pagan philosophy for comfort; he even wrote a book into which he put all the maxims of consolation which pagan religion and philosophy afforded; but these his grief. He resolved to erect in the gardens of Rome a monument to the memory of his daughter. Oh, if Cicero could have heard the words of the Lord Jesus, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest;" if he could have heard Jesus say, "Fear not, only believe;" if he could have heard the wonderful Paul say, "All things work together for good to them that love God;" if he could have heard the same Paul again declare that "our light affliction which is but for a moment worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory," he would have found comfort indeed. The well of consolation men have endeavored to fill up with their stoicism, their agnosticism, their atheism, but still their hearts cry out for God, for the living God. The soul can never find rest except in the bosom of Jesus Christ. I thrust in my crowbar and drag out these obstructions. See these crystal waters flowing! This is the water suited to the need of every soul. Are you in sorrow to-night? Accept Jesus' sympathy. Cast your burden on the Lord. For every grief he has the appropriate medicine. For your death he has life; for your sin he has forgiveness. Earth has no sorrow which heaven cannot heal.

I unstop also the well of Sanctification. This well has been filled up by ungodly acts, by impure thoughts and by misinterpretations of Scripture. Justification is a completed act; sanctification is a process. Sometimes this process is long and sometimes painful. When we submit to God there is an instantaneous forgiveness of sin, but in the Christian life there may be a prolonged struggle against evil. Our blessed Lord in his great prayer on behalf of his disciples said, "sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth." We have here a blessed grace, sanctification; we have also a glorious instrumentality, "thy word;" and we have here also a blessed definition, "thy word is truth." Heaven is already begun in the heart of all true believers. Its peace is in the life, its joy on the lips, and its light in the face of true Christians. Drink deep from the well of Salvation, from the well of Consolation, and from the well of Sanctification. There is music in the word well; there is joy in the drawing of the water. Oh, well-diggers, amid earthly disappointments and ambitions, come to this water. Hear the word of the old prophet, "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters," and hear the words of a greater than Isaiah, the words of the Lord Jesus on the great day of the feast, "If any man thirst let him come unto me and drink." And, still later his words spoken from his throne in heaven, "And the spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."

A VENERABLE CONVERT.

IN writing from Ung-Kung, in the Jio Pheng district of China, to the Baptist Missionary Board, Dr. J. W. Carlen says: During the past year we preached in more than three hundred towns and villages, at twenty-three fairs, thirteen theatres, in heathen temples, ancestral halls, in the fields, upon ferry boats, by the wayside—wherever we could get a hearing—and among the many thousands thus met we sold near eight thousand books and tracts. Also, I treated over three hundred cases of bodily ailments. We had some opposition and abuse, but little compared with the accustomed kindly disposition of the people almost everywhere manifested. I was called wizard, vile demon, the devil, child of the devil, barbarian, red-head, pig, and "that thing," which last I thought not so intolerable as to be called no-thing, as one is sometimes vilified in Christendom.

This fall two aged sisters died, aged respectively eighty-three and ninety-three years. The latter, having removed her dwelling place years ago, and, being too feeble to attend church for many years, was supposed to be dead; but one day a heathen came and reported at the chapel that a Christian was dead in a certain village, and her heathen relatives did not know what to do with her, as she had demanded there be no idolatrous performances at her burial. So the brethren went, and with appropriate Christian services laid the old saint's body in the grave. Whilst at her village the brethren learned that the old Christian summoned her heathen relatives about her dying bed, and exhorted them to renounce their idolatrous follies and serve the true God, telling them she soon would see the face of God in heaven and enter His joy and glory there; that if they would repent, and trust the Lord Jesus for the remisssion of sins, they might also after death see God and abide with Him forever.

The other old sister I visited nine months ago to give her medicine for fever and ague. Though she had a furious fever when I entered the room, she rose and sat upon the board which is charitably called a bed. She said she was only a poor, old, no-account woman, but that she was decided upon serving God unto her dying day, and she would always praise his great and holy name. Four months ago she went the way of the few of the earth.

Near Jio Pheng city, where we have had persecution for the past two years, we have had the highest per cent. of conversions. Now we have reason to believe that persecution there has come to an end. The persecuted and persecutors, having heeded an exhortation to try to fraternize, are now in peace. I am now at work about Ung-Kung, having three assistant preachers; and whilst going forth daily to preach in the surrounding country, we are pressing to a consummation the matter of renting a chapel in the city and buying land outside upon which to build a dwelling. Our preaching at a fair, I learn, is beginning to bear fruit. Two merchants, whose shops are upon the fair ground, where they do considerable business, have become pronounced believers, one of whom attends public worship every Sunday.

THE WONDERFUL.

"His name shall be called Wonderful." Isa. 9: 6.
Written for "The Christian Herald."

JESUS the Wonderful Saviour,
Saving from guilt and sin,
All who follow his leading
And let him abide within.

Jesus the Wonderful Friend
Who will never a trust betray,
Who will never, never leave us
Though dark and lonely the way.

Jesus the Wonderful Helper
In every time of need;
To those who lean upon him,
He will prove a help, indeed.

Jesus the Wonderful Healer
Finds nothing beyond his skill,
But when faith is right, 'tis done
If it be the Father's will

Jesus the Wonderful Teacher
In whom all wisdom is found,
Who giveth to all who ask him,
That knowledge may more abound.

Jesus the Wonderful Guide
To all that is glorious here,
And at last he will lead us out
Into heaven's sunshine clear.

Wonderful! Wonderful! Wonderful
He meets every human need,
When we are willing to follow
Wherever his footsteps lead.

When we are willing to give him
Our poor, sin-shriveled hearts,
Then the Wonderful sweetness
Of love divine he imparts.

THY HAND

O THOU who art my only light,
Thee do I follow through the night;
Though home and hope are out of sight,
Firm trust in thee my spirit hath;
Thou knowest my path!

Although I cannot see thy face,
I feel the warmth of thy embrace.
Enfold me in the dangerous place
Where sin lies waiting to betray;
Thou knowest my way.

I know not what may yet unfold
Beyond the morning's gates of gold.
This is my heaven, thy hand to hold.
Thy steps to follow through the night—
My life, my light.

UNDER THE SIXTH SEAL.

The Growth and Punishment of Formalism and the Identification of the Remnant

BY SIR S. ARTHUR BLACKWOOD, K.C.B.*

THE scenes that are recorded in the seventh chapter of Revelation take place under the sixth seal; they form part of the future history disclosed by its opening. The sixth seal consists really of three distinct visions: the convulsion of nature and society narrated in the sixth chapter, the sealing of the 144,000, and the manifestation of the great multitude before the throne. It is the last two that we now examine.

And it will be well before attempting to explain the symbols employed in the vision, to consider for a moment the state of things which succeeded the overthrow of Paganism and the establishment of the Christian religion.

The followers of Christ, hitherto proscribed and fiercely persecuted, were now the favored ones of the state, and instead of hiding in catacombs and dens and caves of the earth, found that their religion was a passport to Imperial favor, a well nigh certain means of advancing their worldly position. The change was amazing. Churches arose everywhere; instead of apostasies, candidates in throngs applied for baptism, and the state of things was such that the contemporary historian, Eusebius, only expressed the feeling of the times when he declared that "a day of cloudless serenity now shone on the Church," that "it looked like the image of the very kingdom of Christ, and was altogether more like a dream than a reality." It was almost believed the Millennium had come.

The natural consequence of the irruption into the Church of the multitudes that now thronged her gates, was the wide substitution of profession for real faith in Christ, and at the same time an undue exaltation of the rites of Christianity. This was, in particular, the case with the introductory rite of baptism, to which a magical virtue was soon ascribed. It was called "the seal, the Lord's mark, the preservative, the investiture of incorruption, the salvation." In the language of an eminent bishop of the day, Cyril, it was "the ransom to captives, the remission of offences, the death of sin, the regeneration of the soul, the garment of light, the holy seal indissoluble, the chariot to heaven, the luxury of Paradise, the procuring of the kingdom, the gift of adoption."

It was that period of the prophetic history which was being unfolded in the vision recorded in the first half of the seventh chapter. What were its main features?

A tremendous tempest about to burst is seen gathering, but ere the four winds sweep in desolating fury over the earth, an angel ascending from the East (the quarter of rising light), and bearing "the seal of the living God" bids the angels of the winds restrain the storm till out of each tribe of Israel a specific, a definite number had been marked off for preservation. The exact number is heard by the seer, "one hundred and forty and four thousand." Is the meaning far to seek? The language, be it remembered, is symbolic.

The tribes of Israel are the professing people of God. But "they are not all Israel, which are of Israel." The outward seal, impressed by human hands—the visible rite—does not confer salvation, God has his own elect; it is his sole prerogative to seal them for eternal life. This is the truth which must now be brought to light. No less than twelve times is that truth repeated and enforced. It is the living God who alone seals his own.

Meanwhile, another scene arrests the Seer's attention. Looking upward to the throne, he beholds "a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations and kindreds and peoples and tongues, standing before the throne and palms in their hands." What does he gather from the entrancing vision? First, that the blissful and blessed throng are those who have come, not from a life of easygoing and luxurious religiousness, but from battlefields, and out of the great tribulation; next that it is there, not here, that full satisfaction and joy are to be found; and then, above all, that they owe their glorious position alone to the blood of the Lamb, in which they have washed their robes, and made them white.

It is an anticipative glance at eternal glory. The 144,000 are but a section of the Church at any given period of her earthly history; the whole body of the redeemed are represented, later on, by the figure of the heavenly Jerusalem, a cube, whose height, and length, and breadth are equal; each living generation is only a square thereof,—144,000, or twelve times 12,000. Tribulation is their portion here, but their tears shall all be dried; the hands that clave to the sword here, shall wave the palm there, and the triumphant hallelujahs of the innumerable multitude shall echo around the throne.

BLESSEDNESS OF GIVING.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Aug 6. Acts 20: 35; Luke 6: 33 38

THE most marked characteristic of the newer religious thinking, which is slowly transforming the church in spite of conservative anathemas, is the ardent, self sacrificing love for men which was seen in its full perfection in Christ. The church is awaking from its long lethargy in this sphere, and is putting aside its weary discussions of dogma to engage in practical, helpful work. The Master who fed the multitude, who bade the man who would be perfect sell all that he had and give to the poor, and who spent so large a part of the short period he had at his disposal for preaching the Gospel, in relieving suffering, set an example that the church has been slow to follow. But his spirit is working now, and it will permeate the whole body. We do not yet know if the new wine will require to be put into new bottles, but if that is necessary it will be done. The new wine is the spirit of love and beneficence that is now finding expression in the various efforts to alleviate the burdens of life and to relieve physical suffering. The demand for giving is raised now with an urgency and persistency never before known. Those who cannot give their personal labor are expected to give money, and those who can give both are pressed to do so. The question is being asked on all hands which the beloved disciple put centuries ago, but which the church has so long disregarded as a test of the sincerity of her members, "Whoso hath this world's goods and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" The logical conclusion of the sentenee would have been, How dwelleth the love of man in him? but the Apostle's divine logic penetrates deeper, and he doubts whether there is love of God where there is no evidence of love of man. The time is not far distant when this test will be applied in every church in Christendom, and men will refuse to believe that a man loves God if he hoards his wealth while his brother man lacks the necessaries of life. This does not mean that there will be, or should be, indiscriminate giving. Nothing is more easy or more unsatisfactory than to give alms to a beggar. Giving should be done with intelligence and far-sighted perception. Men need to be helped to help themselves. Time must be given; thought must be given; plans must be devised and executed to relieve burdened people whose voice is never heard pleading for charity. As we look with concern on the troubled countenance of a beloved brother and ask to share his confidence and understand his trouble, and make plans for alleviating or removing it, so must we concern ourselves with the burdens of those whom we call "the masses." It is a duty, the performance of which is richly freighted with blessing. It brings a joy that the world cannot give nor take away. It will never be known in all its fullness until we hear the Divine Judge say, "I was hungry and ye fed me . . . inasmuch as ye did it unto these, ye did it unto me."

THE WORLD-WIDE UNION.

ONE of the most significant moments in the recent Christian Endeavor Convention at Montreal was that when President Clark rose to address the Societies after his tour around the world. "I bring you greetings," he said, "[illegible] Kobe, from Osaka and Okayama. In all these cities and many others are young hearts linked to yours by the supreme tie of Christian service. From the Endeavor Society of the [illegible] little orphan boys that holds its [illegible] greet you to-day. India's Endeavorers greet you. They speak many tongues—Tamil and Telugu and Bengalee and Hindi and Hindoostanee and Marathi; but in all these tongues they tell of one purpose, of one pledge, of one motto, of one fellowship. Syrian and Turkish Endeavorers greet you. They are persecuted and hindered; their name, even, is under the ban; but their hearts are not chilled, nor their purpose cooled, nor their fellowship with you sundered by the persecutions that they endure.

"Black-eyed Spanish Endeavorers greet you. French Endeavorers greet you. Worldly Paris is not so worldly that nine active, spiritually minded Endeavor Societies cannot flourish there as well as in Philadelphia or Toronto. English, Scotch and Irish Endeavorers greet you. Within a year our Societies have increased from less than three hundred to nearly seven hundred in the United Kingdom. One of the divisions of the Methodist denomination in Great Britain has just led the way by adopting and approving Christian Endeavor, pure and simple, as its young people's organization. And this leads me to say that interdenominationally, in all parts of the world, as well as internationally, has our cause advanced during the year past as never before. I regret to say that in my own land alone, of all the lands that I have visited, in one or two sections of the Christian church is Christian Endeavor still looked upon as an alien interloper, and our, fellowship is discouraged, if not forbidden.

"In the name of Christian brotherhood the world around; in the name of the fatherhood of God; in the name of Christianity hitherto torn and rent by sectarian jealousies; in the name of heathen peoples distracted by names and creeds whose deeper bonds of union they hitherto have not been able to understand; in the name of the Master, and as an answer to his prayer that "they all may be one," make of your different Endeavor links a strong girdle that shall bind Christian hearts together, not by a uniform creed or ritual, but by pledged loyalty to Christ, and pledged service for Christ. Until this largest possible fellowship is reached, that fellowship which this year has so marvellously increased, let us still keep for our yearly motto our Lord's own words; making them more and more concrete in the actual life of the world of Christian young people, 'One is your Master, even Christ; and all ye are brethren.'"

MIDDLETOWN'S NEW BUILDING.

THE ceremony of laying the corner stone of the new building which has been projected for the Young Men's Christian Association of Middletown, Conn., will have been performed by the time this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is in the hands of its readers. By the kindness of Mr. Young of the Middletown Herald, we are enabled to publish this week a picture of the building reproduced from the architect's design. The building, when completed, will be one of the finest in the State, and have the merit of being of a style unusual and original. It is conveniently situated on the main street in the central part of the city. The plan of the interior has been carefully prepared after an exhaustive study of Association buildings in other cities and the arrangements are eminently adapted to its purpose. The offices, library, class-rooms and auditorium will occupy the main building and in an annex fifty-four by eighty-six feet will be the gymnasium, with bowling-alleys, shower, spray and swimming baths, and all the most modern athletic appliances. The Association is in excellent condition as to members and work. Of the three hundred and twenty-five names on the rolls, over two hundred are of active members. Besides the regular Bible classes and devotional meetings six branches are taught by qualified instructors and there is a library of over a thou sand volumes. During the past year seven young men have made profession of faith who ascribed their conversion to the influences of the Association. The institution is comparatively a young one, having been organized in 1886. Its secretary, Mr. H. L. Jacoby is an energetic young man, thoroughly consecrated to the work.

MR. STOKES'S Y. M. C. A WORK.

THE valuable aid Mr. James Stokes has rendered the Young Men's Christian Association of Paris in securing it a home of its own, was briefly mentioned in these columns recently in our description of that institution; we have now much pleasure in publishing his portrait. Mr. Stokes is a New York lawyer, and is a son of the Mr. James Stokes, who was for many years an active partner in the firm of Phelps, Dodge & Company. His prominence in Association work dates back to the organization of the International Committee twenty-seven years ago, when Mr. Stokes was appointed one of the original seven members. During the next few years after his appointment, he spent much time in Europe, and wherever his business took him he gave much attention to local Associations, or to plans for organizing an Association, if there was not one. He was especially interested in the work in Paris, and it was mainly through his efforts that the original rooms were engaged for the Y. M. C. A. there. As the Association grew, Mr. Stokes urged the erection of a building for it, which should be worthy of the great city. He spared no pains to secure the necessary funds. His own contribution, with others secured from members of his family, amounted to $80,000 and another sum of $80,000 was obtained from wealthy and influential French gentlemen whom Mr. Stokes interested in the project. When the World's Central Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations was organized with headquarters at Geneva, Switzerland, and two places upon it were assigned to the United States, Mr. Stokes was elected to one of them. He has also served on the International Committee at home and has taken much interest in the organization of the French and German branches in our great cities.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

THE Secretary of the King's Daughters in Berlin, Ont., reports: We have been giving a supper to inmates of the poorhouse, which greatly encouraged and blessed those who took part in it. A short time ago we had a concert in the Town Hall in aid of the poor of our town, at which we cleared $21.16. We feel it has been a great pleasure to us to do these things for those whose lives are so blank and cheerless.

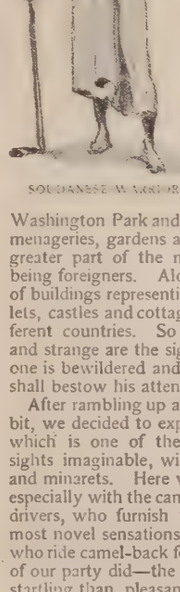
Sights and Scenes in the Cairo Street—Fun with the Camels and Donkey-Drivers.

IT was a very pleasant party that set out to "do" the Egyptian quarter at the World's Exposition, a few days ago. Cool, refreshing breezes came up from the lake, and although it was yet early forenoon, the various nationalities in the "Midway Plaisance" were all astir and on the lookout for patrons. We had already walked through the great edifices of the Fair and were oppressed with their wealth of art and architecture, and now we were seeking for a whiff of relaxation.



SOUDANESE WARRIOR.

There is probably no other thoroughfare in the world like the Midway Plaisance. It is a Babel of tongues, a medley of instruments and a lovely panorama of color, the whole so exhilarating and fascinating that one lingers there, unconscious of the flight of time. It extends from the Exposition grounds to Washington Park and is a succession of shows, menageries, gardens and Oriental theatres, the greater part of the managers and employees being foreigners. Along its course are groups of buildings representing towns, villages, hamlets, castles and cottages in over a score of different countries. So many and so attractive and strange are the sights on every hand, that one is bewildered and hesitates as to where he shall bestow his attention.

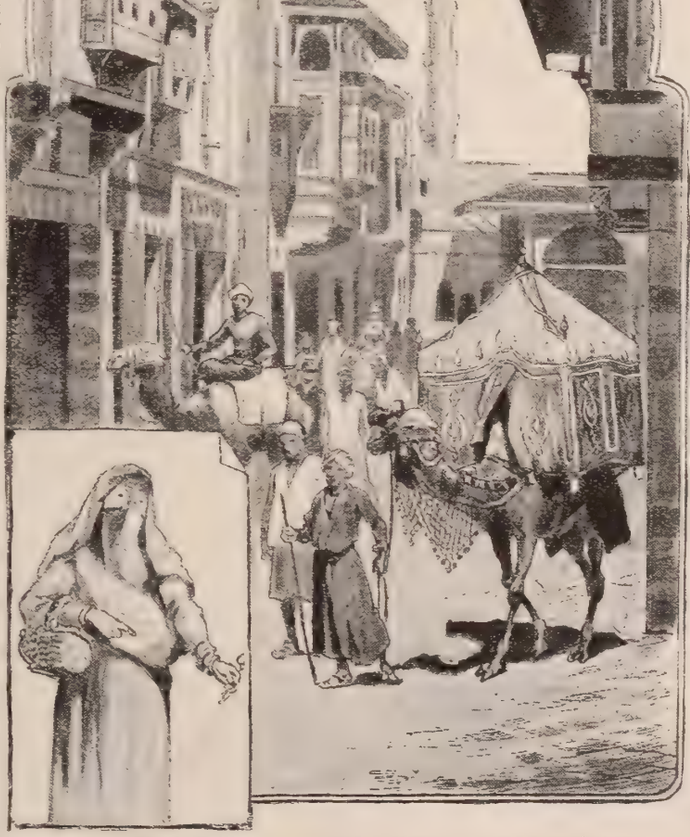
After rambling up and down the Plaisance a bit, we decided to explore the street of Cairo, which is one of the quaintest and prettiest sights imaginable, with its domes, balconies and minarets. Here we were greatly amused, especially with the camel-men and the donkey-drivers, who furnish to visitors some of the most novel sensations of the Fair. For those who ride camel-back for the first time—as some of our party did—the experience is a little more startling than pleasant; but one quickly gets used to the strange, heaving motion of the camel. As for the donkeys—little intelligent brutes they were—they delighted the children. With a screaming, laughing youngster on his back and with a long-coated and white-turbaned Hussein, Mustapha or Ahmed smiting his flanks with an assa, a long supple rod, and yelling "Chatti! Chatti!" ("Make way! Make way!") the Cairo donkey is a thing of beauty and a joy indeed!

But one tires even of the exquisite bliss of bumping through the crowded street in this fashion, at the imminent risk of colliding disastrously with some Nubian or dervish, or of ungallantly sending some passing veiled lady sprawling on the causeway. I shudder to think what the possible result of such a collision might be, or to even guess what would happen if our brutes, by some unlucky lurch, capsized that top-heavy camel with the gaudy-looking pavilion on his back. These pavilions are in reality traveling harems and as many as ten fair Orientals can be crowded in there; rather uncomfortably crowded, maybe, but well screened from the rude gaze of the infidel world, and that is all their Moslem owner and husband, Mr. Abdullah Bluebeard, cares about it. He glowers just a little at us as we brush past, but, bless you, those swarthy bearded fellows are pleasant enough just now, and we are not even disposed to be frightened at the Soudanese warrior who stands near by with lance and shield. These olive-skinned guests, like ourselves, came here to enjoy themselves, not to fight. They are really politeness itself when addressed; indeed, there is no more courteous neighborhood in Chicago than this same Midway Plaisance. Here is the public scribe, who sits cross-legged upon his platform at the corner, conducting the mail correspondence of the mimic village at so much per letter. There is a soldier—a fine, big, manly fellow—bargaining with him to write a letter to his people at home, else we might have been tempted to spend a half dollar on one of his missives ourselves, just for a keepsake.

A PUBLIC SCRIBE.

You can't walk very far in the Cairo street without meeting the flower-girl, Aziza. She timidly pokes a bouquet at one of the party, whom she addresses with a half laughing "Tishtiri yasmeen?" ("Will you buy some jasmine?") Of course you will, and you do. Aziza is a short, slight, graceful girl. You can't see any of the girl's face, except the eyes, but you gallantly conclude that, with so pleasant a voice, she must be pretty. This doesn't always follow, though; but Ahmed thinks there is nothing sweeter in the world than Aziza's voice, when she sings:

THE ARAB FLOWER GIRL.



A STREET IN CAIRO—AT THE WORLD'S FAIR.

If yasmeen wel fulil ageeb!
(The wonderful jasmine and roses!

One doesn't need to embrace Islam to get lunch on the Cairo street, so our chaperon took us to a temptingly cool place, pillared and stone-floored where was a restaurant for poor tired and hungry occidentals. After being refreshed we went out to explore still further. What a mixture of races one finds in the booths of Cairo! Native Nubian jostles American negro, Syrian and Armenian and Egyptian and Arab all unite to make up a fantastic population. Here and there an unveiled woman is seen. Oriental tapestries, cloths and metal wares are exposed for sale at many of the booths, some of the displays being beautiful and costly. Hours can be spent very pleasantly among the bazaars alone, but one mustn't stop too long if you mean to see the main beauties of the street with its Egyptian temple of Luxor, its moving masses of light, shade and color and its sad-browed people, who with their surroundings, take one altogether back to the ancient city in the desert, until you feel as though you were almost within the shadow of the Pyramids.

Pleasant Voices and Good Tempers.

"THE great trouble with one woman I know," writes Oliver W. Holmes, "is that her voice is pitched a full note too high. It is aggressive, disturbing, and would wear out a nervous man without his ever knowing what was the matter with him. A good many crazy Northern people would recover their reason if they could live for a year or two among the blacks of the Southern States. But the penetrating perturbing quality of the voices of many of our Northern women has a great deal to answer for in the way of determining love and friendship.

You remember that dear friend of ours who left us not long since? If there were more voices like hers, the world would be a different place to live in. I do not believe any man or woman ever came within the range of those sweet, tranquil tones without being hushed, captivated, entranced I might also say, by their calming, soothing influence. Can you not imagine the tones in which those words, "Peace, be still," were spoken? Such was the effect of the voice to which but a few weeks ago we were listening. It is hard to believe that it has died out of human consciousness. Can such a voice be spared from that world of happiness to which we fondly look forward, where we love to dream, if we do not believe with assured conviction, that whatever is loveliest in this our mortal condition shall be with us again as an undying possession."

The Boy Who Read the Stars.

PROF. E. E. BARNARD, is a self-made astronomer. He had very little schooling when a boy and his mother did what she could to help the lad, teaching him Greek and urging him to other studies. His first employment was as a photographer's assistant at small wages. He procured from an acquaintance a copy of Dick's astronomical works and sat up nights reading it. It fascinated him, and revealed new worlds to his astonished eyes. He read more books on the same subject and bought with his spare savings a small telescope with which he spent hours on the roof scanning the skies. Glass after glass was procured, each being larger and more powerful than its predecessor. His first triumph was the discovery of two comets ahead of the regular astronomers. This brought him an invitation to the Vanderbilt University and thereafter the Lick Observatory in California secured his services. He has discovered in all nearly twenty comets, and his great discovery of the fifth satellite of Jupiter made him famous among observers. Besides this, he has enriched the world's store of knowledge with many fine photographs of the stars. Thus the poor boy who happened to take up the study of the stars by the merest accident, has become a great scientist and a public benefactor.

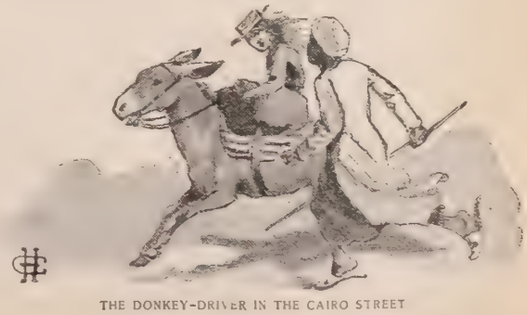
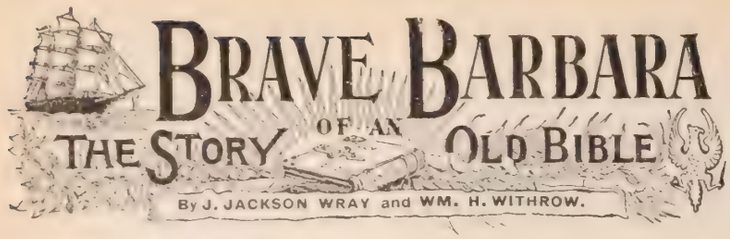
Longfellow and the Young Man.

IT is said that when Henry Wadsworth Longfellow was a professor in college he gave as motto to his pupils, "Live up to the best that is in you." We cannot vouch for the anecdote and do not know what its authority, but the thought it suggests is a noble one. There are two natures in every man. One says, "Have a good time, never mind tomorrow;" the other says: "Love not pleasures, love God; this is the everlasting yea." One seeks to gratify desire, appetite, passion, ambition; the other seeks to know the right.



THE DONKEY-DRIVER IN THE CAIRO STREET



CHAPTER XXI

GOOD-BY TO OLD FRIENDS

DURING the Colonel's slow recovery he had many talks with his son. Redgie was very anxious for his conversion and lost no time in urging him to accept Christ. The Colonel listened quietly for the greater part, but Redgie felt that he was making little progress.

"It is useless, my boy," the Colonel said after one of these talks, "there are no limits to the Lord's power, so he could make a Methodist out of the material under my hat if he wished to do so, but no one else could. It is not the right kind of stuff. I won't say anything to hurt your feelings, but honestly I could not be a Methodist. The whole thing is distasteful to me."

"Ah, father," Redgie answered, "you don't understand. I am not urging you to become a Methodist, but to become a Christian."

"It's all the same, my dear boy," Colonel Pemberton answered. "I know the Methodist notion; you would never think I was a Christian if I did not become a Methodist. You would think there was something wrong, some defect. I never knew a Methodist who did not look on members of other denominations as only half Christians, as needing a fresh baptism or something. They think a fully developed Christian, a Christian come to full growth, is naturally a Methodist."

"I don't deny I should be thankful if God in his goodness brought you into our church," said Reginald, "but I am most concerned about his bringing you into his own fold. You can be in that without being a Methodist."

"I should hope so, my boy," said the Colonel "but I am surprised to hear you admit it. You are raw yet. That man Dunham would not do so."

"You misjudge him, father. He is a good man, one of the Lord's faithful servants."

"Well, I will say nothing against him then," said the Colonel. "I will use no more hard words about any one. I am too glad to have you back again, Reginald, to feel uncharitable. We'll give Dunham his due and think the best we can of everybody, eh, my boy? Christian charity is the right thing."

"I wish you would let me bring him here to talk with you, father. He could do so much better than I. He's an eloquent man and a scholar and his lips are touched with a live coal from the altar."

"He may come," said the Colonel. "Blanche has a tenderness for him, but I had rather he did not labor with me. He would only waste his time and trouble and I might get irritated and say things I should regret. No my boy," and the Colonel put his hand tenderly on his son's head, "you must resign the hope of making a Methodist of your old father."

"But I want you to be a Christian, father," Reginald persisted. "I want you to have the blessed assurance of being one with Christ, of being sure of heaven that makes me so happy."

"Well, Redgie, I'll tell you where I stand. I am trying to lead a life as free from sin as I can. When I do sin I am sorry for it and I pray God to forgive me. I believe in Christ and I feel that the more I grow like him the better I shall be. I admire him and love him because he was good and kind and lovable. That is where I stand and where I have stood for years. About salvation I do not concern myself. I am in God's hands and am quite satisfied to be there. He will do right. If he gives me life after I am dead I am sure it will be a life in which I can learn more and do better than I have done here. I know I am not of much account. I am not brilliant, or eloquent, or learned; I am simply a plain man [illegible] think it is not worth while giving such a man another life. Well, he knows best. I do not think he will give me another life simply to torture me in hell. He is too kind-hearted a Being to do that. So I am not going to shout, to plead and agonize about it as you Methodists do. I leave it all to God to do with me as he will. Now you know just how I look at the subject of religion."

Reginald shuddered. His father's position seemed dreadfull to him, and he trembled for him. To him, fresh from the teaching of Dunham and Losee and Barbara Heck, his father seemed little better than a heathen. He knew not what to say and he determined to give himself to prayer that the Colonel's eyes might be opened and to take counsel with Dunham, whose wide experience might help him to find a way to touch his father's heart.

Meanwhile, the Colonel was intent on making the approaching Christmas a time of gaiety. He wanted to celebrate his own recovery and the restoration of peace and love in his own family. He meant to keep the festival in baronial style as he had done in Virginia. Blanche should invite her lover, Reginald should bring Gracie Heck, and Barbara Heck should be invited to give Mrs. Pemberton pleasure and Paul Heck of course. The Emburys and John Lawrence must come, with the servants and connections from all the families and there should be good cheer and fun and pleasure for all. He would talk it all over with his wife and they would settle it. She, kindly lady, was easily won over and for the next few weeks the Pemberton mansion was a busy place. Such scouring and cleaning of the house that was always spotless, such gathering of provisions and cooking of delicacies was never known before in the colony, for Colonel Pembeaton was bent on making the festival an event to be remembered.

There was no doubt about his success. No one declined the invitation. Lucky Mike was there and declared that the entertainment was worthy of the old sod. Tookalusca and Ooloona were there, too, with all our old friends and everyone was in the highest spirits.

But the most stirring event of all that marked that never-to-be-forgotten season was the marriage of Elder Dunham ahd Blanche Pemberton, and of Reginald Pemberton and the gentle Gracie Heck. There was only one clergyman in Upper Canada who could legally perform the double ceremony, the Rev. Dr. Stuart, of Kingston. Of course, Colonel Pemberton, as a magistrate, bearing his Majesty's commission, was empowered to celebrate marriages; but being a staunch Churchman, nothing would serve him but the use of the old service with which he had wedded Blanche's mother more than thirty years before.

On Christmas Day, dressed in gown, bands, and surplice, Dr. Stuart held a solemn religious service. The Colonel, who was able to walk in on crutches, joined firmly in the responses, and was greatly delighted to find that "the Methodists" were quiet and reverent. Brave Barbara, especially, had a good time of it, and put her prayerful soul into the Litany, and through all the beautiful service found it "good to be there." Then the marriage service took place; the parents in each case "giving the bride away."

One invited guest was absent on that auspicious occasion. Elder William Losee had consented to come, but just before the visit should have been paid, a brief letter from his old colleague Dunham informed him of his impending marriage. It was a blow that poor William Losee could not recover from. He had been deeply fascinated himself by Blanche Pemberton, but a morbid sensitiveness on account of his shrivelled arm, and the Colonel's intense antipathy to Methodism, together with his native modesty, had tied his tongue. But his love for the winsome maiden had entered into his being. He could not bear the shock; and to make a painful story short he succumbed to the blow, and, retiring from the ministry, soon closed his career on earth beneath a cloud that would not lift.

He was a noble spirited man, and his letter to his old friend, declining to attend the wedding, gives us a beautiful glimpse of a worthy man. "My dear brother," it began, "I wish you every happiness, and pray that God's blessing may rest upon you both. I know well the passing merits of your bride, who is to share with you the joys and sorrows of life. Many thanks for your kind request. Allow me to decline. I do not feel able for it—for reasons known only to God and my own heart; and should we meet no more on earth, we will meet where they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God."

Poor Losee! So are joy and sorrow entertwined.

Blanche Pemberton's wedding presents, we are told in the chronicles of the family included the splendid necklace of pearls that had been fastened by Queen Anne on her mother's neck as a royal wedding gift.

"Her majesty never thought," said the old Colonel, "that they would form part of the wedding gear of a Methodist preacher's wife in the backwoods of Canada. But I'll warrant me that none of the Court dames at St. James Palace were worthier to wear them than my Blanche." Doubtless Elder Dunham was of the same opinion.

I cannot pretend to describe Brave Barbara's acceptable gift of linen, packed, spun, woven and bleached after the good old Irish fashion, by her own industrious hands; nor, indeed, can I deal with these interesting matters any further. And yet, I think I must quote the words of the dear and gentle Quakeress, Hannah Whiteside, when she gave each an ancient vellum-bound copy of John Fox's "Treatise on the Inner Light." "Father does not hold with fasts and feasts," she said, "nor with the worldly fashion of making and receiving marriage gifts; but we love thee and wish thee as well as those who do. It was borne in upon me that I should give both of ye a book that hath been a great comfort to my own heart: so it may be to thee, Blanche, and to thee, Gracie. Ye both know the Inner Light yourselves: may it shine in you more and more until the perfect day."

Of course, such a grand occasion as this, where Brave Barbara was an honored guest, could not be suffered to pass without words of song and prayer from my heroine, the true Deborah of the West, who was enshrined in all hearts as a mother in Israel, a prophetess of, and a leader in, the glorious movement which was building up in the New World an undying and universal Church of the living God. But Brave Barbara had but little to say. Her heart was too full for speech. As she looked back on all the way in which the Lord had led her, tender memories came rushing in upon her like a flood. Her lips quivered and her bright eyes filled with tears, as she exclaimed, "What hath God wrought? As I think of the wonderful past and the happy present, and the better future, I can do no other than sing, 'Praise God from whom all blessings flow!'" With that song of praise ended the festivities of that memorable Christmas day.

The story of my humble, but truly noble heroine, may now be briefly concluded. After the excitement caused by these marriages, and by that glad reunion round the Christmas hearth, life at the Heck Settlement subsided into its usual quiet. Blanche Dunham remained two years in her old home to gladden with filial attentions the heart of the old Colonel, who later became a chronic invalid. Her husband, who was now appointed "Presiding Elder of the Canada District," continued to range through his vast circuit as energetically and successfully as before his marriage.

Reginald Pemberton was soon after appointed to the "Bay of Quinte Circuit," and hither he brought his young wife to do the duties and engage the sympathies of a loving people, who warmly welcomed the "new preacher's wife." In the same place an off-shoot of the little company of Palatines of the Heck Settlement made their home; and here our old friends, John and Mary Lawrence, became the leaders of the Methodist movement, and the honored pillars of a growing church. Here Reginald Pemberton had the distinguished honor of building the first Methodist meeting-house in Upper Canada (hitherto the great parlor of Heck House had been used for worship.) The subscription list for the erection of the new chapel is still extant, and the blurred and faded signatures of a younger generation of the Emburys, the Schweitzers, the Ruckles, the Lawrences, and other godly Palatines, may still be discerned.

Hither, in somewhat later days, came the venerable and justly-celebrated Bishop Asbury, then in extreme age and feebleness. "We crossed the St. Lawrence," says one of his traveling companions, "in romantic style. We hired four Indians to paddle us over. They lashed three canoes together, and put our horses in them—their fore-feet in one, their hind-feet in another. We were long in crossing; it was nearly three miles, and the rapids were rough." As the old bishop was leading his horse over a bridge of poles, its legs slipped between them and sank into mud and water. "Away went the saddle-bags, the books and clothes were wet, and the horse was fast. We got a pole under him to pry him out. The roads through the woods, over rocks, down gullies, over stumps, and through the mud, were indescribable. They were enough to jolt a hale bishop to death, let alone a poor infirm old man near the grave."

This is an admirable description, alike of the trials of circuit life and the stuff of which these backwoods heroes of the Gospel were composed. A little while before Bishop Asbury's visit to Canada, Paul Heck died at his home at Augusta (as it had come to be called), in the faith of the Gospel, and well-stricken in years. His more retiring character shines with a milder radiance beside the more fervid zeal of his high-souled and heroic wife. But his virtues are perpetuated in the pious lives of his children and his children's children.

For twelve years longer his true and noble wife, Brave Barbara, waited for the summons to join him in the skies. In the old homestead at the Heck Settlement, and enjoying the filial love and care of her son Samuel, she passed the time of her sojourning in calm content of soul. To her children's children at her knee, a younger Grace and Reginald Pemberton, a younger Paul and Barbara Heck, a younger Blanche and Daniel Dunham, aye, and others of her race and blood, she read from the big old German Bible, the promises that had sustained her life.

She was never weary of telling them the wondrous story of God's providence to her and her kinsfolk; how he had brought them across the sea; had kept them amid the perils of the city of the wilderness; had given them a goodly heritage in the New World, and had enabled them to plant and widely wave the standard of Immanuel. Her chief delight, as she sat in her high-backed arm-chair, in the cheerful ingle-nook of the broad fire-place, was to converse on the deep things of God with the itinerant Methodist missionaries. These "round-preachers" ever found beneath her hospitable roof a welcome home amid their toilsome and perilous wanderings. From her honored lips they learnt the story of the wondrous growth of Methodism, which she had been the means of founding in that great Land of the West.

At length, like the sun calmly sinking, amid glories which seemed like those of Paradise, so passed away this saint of God, this true mother in Israel, this heroic servant and soldier of the Prince Immanuel, under whose bright banner she lived and died. She passed away in the year 1804, having more than completed the full span of threescore years and ten. "Her death," we are told by that able and competent historian, Dr. Abel Stevens, in his noble eulogy of her character, "was befitting her wondrous life. Her old German Bible, the guide of her youth in Ireland, her resource during the falling away of her people in New York, her inseparable companion in all her wanderings in New York and Canada, was her oracle and her comfort to the last."

When the time for her departure was at hand, the "messenger," as Bunyan has it, who came from the King to summon her to cross the river, found her seated one morning in her familiar high-backed arm-chair. With her horn-framed spectacles to help her failing sight, she had been conning over the good words of her Lord and Master. Then the "messenger" gently touched her, and she rose to join the Shining Ones who waited for her on the golden strand. She was found by a grandchild, sitting, as if asleep, with the dear old German Bible lying open on her lap, and on the page which must have last met her vision were these words:

"In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you; and if I go and prepare a place for you I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am, ye may be also."

With such words before her eyes, and with such sweet confidence to furnish her with wings, Brave Barbara ascended, and "took the nearest way to her Father's house!"

"Thus passed away," says Dr. Stevens, "this devoted, obscure and unpretentious woman, who so faithfully, yet unconsciously, laid the foundation of one of the largest ecclesiastical structures of modern ages, and whose name shall shine with ever-increasing brightness as long as the sun and moon endure." On the banks of the majestic St. Lawrence lies a lonely graveyard which is one of the most hallowed spots in the New World. Here, on gently rising ground, overlooking the rushing river, is the quiet "God's Acre" in which slumbers the sacred dust of Brave Barbara. This spot, known as the "Old Blue Churchyard," takes its name from an ancient meeting-house, now demolished, which once wore a coat of blue paint. The forest trees which once covered this place were cleared away by the hands which have long ceased from their labors and have been laid to rest with sure hope of a resurrection in the quiet of the grave.

These were our Palantines, and these are the companions who sleep side by side here with Paul and Barbara Heck.

IT is certain that at some period before the creation of the world, and up to that time, the angels were on trial and were susceptible of death, because of sin, as "the wages of sin is death." Some had stood the test, and remained obedient to the restrictions and commands of their Maker; who consequently became exempt from all future liability. Others had failed, and incurred the death penalty, and yet await its execution, to be awarded at the judgment in the last day; hence we read: "For if God spare not the angels that sinned; but cast them down to hell." (II. Peter 2: 5.) The Scripture explanation is, that they are to be cast into hell at the end of the world; using the present for the future tense, so common in Scripture. Now, these fallen angels having no hope of happiness or immortality themselves, they are confined to the animosity and sweet morsel of revenge in seeking to make every one else unhappy and hopeless like themselves, and whom God desires to be happy and live forever.

It was the will of God that the angels and their leader, who became devils, should have continued to inhabit his abode, which is not in this world, until its re-creation—the world to come; but they desired to change their estate for the Eden world as soon as they saw it finished. It was a world of such beauty and charming delight that called forth the highest joy of the angels, of which Job speaks thus: "The morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy." (Job 38: 7.) Of course there was nothing wrong in such a desire, and which every angel of heaven indulged; they were informed by the Creator that the earth was to be their final abode; yet not to commence then, as it was to pass through a terrible history, and of such derangement that would render its re-creation a necessity. While such an explanation was satisfactory to some of the angels, it was not to others; and these determined on the change at once and immediately; "and they kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation" for that of the world. This self-will of the angels, in opposition to the plan and will of God, made them devils. That no provision has been made for their recovery and salvation, seems to leave no other inference than that, in the estimation and providence of God their Creator, there was none available for the purpose.

The biblical history of angels shows them to be so much like men, that they can eat the same food, and were always taken for men. There is, however, no intimation that they are male and female. From which fact it would follow, like Adam, each was a distinct creation; and that they sang the world's dedicatory hymn shows their creation to have been prior to the creation of the world. When they come to men they are God's messengers, and are recognized as such by the Lord himself, and receive his titles.

If there had been no sin, there had been no death, with its concomitants of pain and disease; and lastly, had not our first parents, or one of their succeeding generations, obeyed the devil and disobeyed their Creator, the human family would still have access to the tree of life, the antidote for ossification, and consequently have lived forever. Hence all possible forms and phases of physical derangement among mankind are the work of the devil and devil-possession, now its natural development. In harmony with this natural philosophy is the Scriptural doctrine which attributes the power of death to the devil. This, being the culmination of physical derangement, carries with it the power of disease, its forerunner and accompaniment. It in nowise alters the case if any or all the satanic possessions and powers have been transmitted through every one of the two hundred generations of mankind; if the devil introduced them, then they are his inheritance, and to cure any of them, according to Scripture, is to cast out devils.

THE IMPORT OF RESURRECTION.†

In the light of the Cross of Calvary and of the tomb in the garden, pain and death are beheld as steps in the stairway to a higher life. In pain and grief we recognize a sure token of the glorious fulness of the life to which humanity must eventually attain. The Resurrection gives us a meaning of life; not that life is, as Bunyan so beautifully puts it, but a pilgrimage, nor that life is a probation, in the sense that God from his far-off heaven has reached down an arm and put us into the world to try us, if perchance we may fail; but in the light of the Christian Resurrection life is seen to be growth; my own dim life should teach me this; life also is an education, God's word teaches me that and God's world also. Nature, like some august Sybil of gigantic stature, as Michael Angelo painted her high on the shadowy vaultings of the Sistine Chapel, is chanting the oracles of Eternal Wisdom, who, reaching from one end to the other mightily, doth sweetly order all things. Growth, says the cosmic hymn, without Resurrection is impossible. Somewhere there must be an open gate to the world, or the procession of progress is stopped. Somewhere the stream of life has an outlet into that immortal sea that brought us hither, else, dammed up, the river of Life would set back and form dead waters. In the light of evolution, progress, and growth we lack no certitude of the Resurrection of the dead. Individual character, or soul, demands that there be a Resurrection. Unless there be a spiritual uprise, unless a mastery of spirit and its potencies for righteousness, over flesh and sense, we could not increase in wisdom and stature, and favor with God and men.

> Poor vaunt of life, indeed,
> Were man but formed to feed
> On joy—to solely seek, and find, and feast.

In the light of the first Easter morn the meaning of agony in flesh and spirit is revealed to be the condition of the ever-continuing birth into the knowledge of God, which is eternal life, because it is the identity of truth and life. Knowledge, not existence, is the description of eternal life which Jesus gave. Thus it is that God speaks in the soul and through the soul of man, and the word becomes flesh. Let us so teach the Resurrection that its ethical import will so vitalize the dogma, that men may comprehend that it is something more than a historic fact which was given as evidence that what Jesus said was true; but rather in the apostolic spirit, let us endeavor to make men comprehend how the Resurrection is a factor of human life and character, and how the Resurrection of our Lord Jesus in the measure that it is actualised in our personal lives becomes the power unto a Resurrection of the dead.

THE QUAKERS IN AMERICA.*

RELIGIOUS fanaticism is the most dangerous of all the errors of mankind. A false leader in religion may be more fatal than an incompetent general in the army, therefore, ministers of the Gospel and teachers have the greatest task imposed on them of any of God's creation. When one's religion runs mad, barbarity assumes the support of conscience and feels its approval in the consummation of most heinous crimes. The Pilgrims and Puritans who had fled from religious persecution across the seas, and had come to the wilderness to worship God according to their own conscience, were unwilling to grant the same privilege to others. For this reason they banished Roger Williams and other religious sects not in accord with their own views.

They whipped Quakers, bored holes in their tongues, branded them with hot irons, and even hung them for their religious views. Why need one blame Spain for the infamous Inquisition, when early churches of Protestantism did fully as bad? Religious fervor controlled by prejudice and ignorance is the greatest calamity that can befall a nation.

The Quakers appeared first in England about the time Roger Williams procured his charter for Rhode Island. The term "Quaker," now so venerated and respected, was given this sect in derision, just as the Puritans, Protestants and many now respectable sects were named.

Their founders and preachers were among the boldest and yet the meekest of the Non-Conformists. Their morality was so strict, that by some they were denominated ascetics, and this strictness was carried into every habit and department of life. Extravagant expenditures, fashionable dress, games of amusement, however harmless, were forbidden by this sect. Even music was discouraged as a seductive vanity. The members of this church were forbidden to own slaves, to take part in war, engage in lawsuits, indulge in intemperance or profanity, which, if persisted in, was a cause for the expulsion of a member from the society, and the whole body was in duty bound to keep watch upon the actions of each other. Their practices so generally agreed with their principles, that society was compelled to admit that the profession of a Quaker or Friend as they usually styled themselves, was a guarantee of morality above the ordinary level of the world.

COLUMBIA TO THE NATIONS.*

O my country, throne of nature, duest fame of anthems swell;
Lift thy thankful voice to heaven, guard thy source of blessings well.

Loose thee from all festering customs, list to labor's righteous call,
Lest the mystic fingers lower to foreclose thee on the wall.

Catch the head-light of the ages, leave the darkening past behind.
Break upon a broader future with a broader rift of mind.

Girted with the belt of progress, deep in labor's buskins bound;
Stream thy locks upon the breezes, strike thy feet upon the ground—

Better one long day of Joshua, with the thickest action blent,
Than a decade of Achilles nursing faction in his tent.

May thy future be a lyric tuning every tongue of chime,
And thy little sorrows break-marks in the long refrain of time.

A HIGH PRIEST'S PURCHASE.

In a recent letter from the Laos country, Dr. McGilvary says: "The last few days I have been making the rounds of the temples, selling books and reading and explaining them, and I have been surprised at the readiness of the priests and the youth studying for the Buddhist priesthood to buy our books. Hitherto I have given to the priests, and have very seldom thought of offering to sell; but this week all but one of six temples which I visited bought something. This afternoon I took with me a copy of Proverbs, Matthew, Luke, John, the 'Shorter Catechism,' and two of Mrs. McGilvary's new Laos tracts, and the first temple I visited the high priest took the pile, and probably he would have taken more."

CHILDREN'S DUTIES.

NEXT to God who reigns above,
I'll give my parents all my love;
I owe them thanks for favors done,
But I have hardly rendered one.

I'll mourn if I have done or said
An insult to the hoary head.
And words of kindness to the young
Shall flow like music from my tongue.

If words or actions light or vain
Have given to others needless pain,
I'll ask them ere the set of sun
To pardon what my hands have done.

Where'er I meet the wretched poor
I will not drive them from my door,
For God will bless the hand that tries
To wipe the sorrow from their eyes.

I'll shun the common faults of youth,
I'll keep my word and speak the truth.
For God with never-sleeping view,
Sees and remembers all I do.

WANTED MEDICINE, NOT PREACHING.

The value of patience and forbearance is shown in an incident which occurred at one of the dispensaries of the China Inland Mission. Mr. Graham Brown relates it thus: "One day a man came into my bedroom where I was talking with a friend. He very rudely interrupted our conversation, saying, 'See, I want to buy some medicine.' His whole tone and manner were such that is was pretty hard work to be quiet, but God's grace kept me and I managed. I told him he would require to wait his turn, and asked him to sit down; he sat down, and I continued my conversion. This man wanted our medicine from us and nothing else. He was very bitter against Christ and the religion of the foreigners. When his turn came, which was after he had waited about two hours, and he had got what he wanted, I asked him to come to our meetings. He refused: but was better than his word, he came.

"No one spoke to him and he went away. When next he came to the town he came as clerk to the magistrate, and called upon us, and after a few visits he decided for Christ. His nephew, who was a clerk under him, was very angry at this change, and one day said, 'Look here, uncle, if you do not stop going to these devils of foreigners, I will report you and get you turned out into the street.' He came to us and told us of his nephew's threat. Kneeling down he said, 'Oh, Lord, my relations are trying to turn me out of my office because I love you, but oh, God, protect me against them and change them as thou hast done me.' And that prayer was from a man who six months previous spat at us and called us foreign devils.

A DOMESTIC CRISIS.

A CHINAMAN'S tact in overcoming his wife's scruples is the subject of an anecdote related by Mr. Burt of the China Inland Mission. He says: "At one of our stations we made up our minds to open a preaching place in another township, and pay the expenses out of the church funds; but it so happened that we could not get the hall or room where we had proposed having it. We had among our members an old evangelist who had decided that we must open a hall somewhere, and that it should not be paid from the church funds. He settled the place where the hall was to be, but before he arranged the financial matters there was a little difficulty. His wife, Mistress Yang, was of an extremely economical disposition, and might object to his paying the rent of the hall. He got some of the elders to go home with him when he interviewed his wife on the subject. He said to her, 'Mistress Yang, do you love the Lord Jesus?' The lady looked up in surprise as she knew her husband was well aware that she loved Jesus. 'Yes! of course I do,' she replied. 'Mistress Yang,' he repeated again, 'Do you love the Lord Jesus?' 'Yes, you know I do.' 'Mistress Yang, do you love the Lord Jesus enough to keep house on three dollars a month instead of four?' 'Why do you ask?' 'Because we want the dollar to pay for a room in another village, where we wish to preach the Gospel.' 'Oh, yes, if that be the case I love the Lord Jesus enough to do with three dollars a month.'"

A CHINESE INDICTMENT.

IN a Chinese tract the following objections are urged against Christianity: It is presumptuous in the barbarians to endeavor to improve the inhabitants of the Celestial Empire, inasmuch as they themselves stand so much in need of improvement. They have shown a lack of benevolence by importing among the Chinese a poisonous drug, and thus injuring others for the sake of personal gain. They have sent fleets and armies to bereave other nations of their possessions, to which they have absolutely no right; therefore they cannot lay claim to be regarded as upright. They allow men and women to associate together and walk arm in arm in the streets; therefore they condemn themselves as falling short in a sense of propriety. By rejecting the ancient doctrines they have shown themselves to be possessed of little wisdom. Veracity appears to be the only good quality which they can in any measure boast of. Therefore, lacking as they do four of the five cardinal virtues, how should they be able to improve others? Besides, they have shown lack of reverence for the inventors of the art of printing by recklessly treading on printed paper, while others have spent much money to circulate books for the amelioration of the age. Moreover, these self-constituted exhorters of the world are void also of filial piety. They forget their ancestors as soon as they are dead, put them into simple boxes, which are only one inch thick, and do not sacrifice to their souls; nay, they will not so much as burn a strip or two of gold foil for their future welfare. Finally, they admit persons that have the advantages of wealth and rank to office without examination, and do not leave open the way for the promotion of the poor and lowly born. On all these accounts these foreigners appear to be inferior to the Chinese, and, therefore, in no way competent to instruct them in better ways."

EARNING A BIBLE.

How children in Asia Minor who are too poor to pay the price of a Bible yet who desire one are able to earn the book, is told by Miss E. G. Bates of the American Board's Mission at Hadjin. She writes: "For some years past, through the kindness of the Bible Society, we have had a number of Bibles to give away to poor children. Our plan has been to have each child earn his Bible by committing to memory and repeating 300 verses. The preciousness of a Bible thus earned is very much greater than of one given without any effort made on the part of the child himself, while the treasure of Bible words thus stored in the memory is so much pure gain. The pleasure and eagerness with which the children receive their books are very great. The children thus earning their Bibles are from nine to thirteen years of age, and of course only the very poor, for whom it is impossible to find the fifteen piasters to buy one."

THE EFFECT OF A KIND WORD.

A DETROIT journal states that a man called at its office recently, and inquired for "the criminal reporter." It had no criminals serving as reporters, but the man was introduced to the reporter who attended to the business of the courts, and he proved to be the man sought. On being brought together, the visitor said he had called to thank the reporter for being the means of his reformation. He said: "I want to talk with you. When I was convicted over in the Recorder's Court in the old City Hall, you wrote about me in the paper the next morning, 'Myles doesn't look like a criminal, but his identification was complete. It is the first offense, and he will regret it for five years at least.' I read that the next morning as I was being taken to Jackson, and those words, 'Myles doesn't look like a criminal,' made a deep impression on me, probably for the reason that I had not heard a kind word for a long time before. I cut those words out and pasted them up in my cell. I have come here to-day to thank you for writing them. They helped me to become an honest man. 'Regret it!' You never wrote a truer word in your life. How I did suffer in prison! When my time was out, I went to Chicago, and from there to St. Louis. I got work in a wholesale grocery store, and I worked hard. Five years ago my master sent me up into Nevada to look after a cattle ranch that he and his brother owned there. That suited me, and I became a herder, and now I am superintendent of the ranch, and get $300 a month. Good-by! You did me a good turn, and I'll never forget it."

A CHILD IN A TUNNEL.

IN a recent sermon on trouble Rev. Mark Guy Pearse used the following illustration: "Some time ago I was traveling by train, and in the compartment with me was a father and his little child. With a shriek of the whistle, the train plunged into the gloom of a tunnel, and the frightened little one cried out. But in the fading light I saw the father take the child's hand in his. 'It is all right,' said he. As we rode on in darkness I seemed to see the little one pressing up against the father's side, bewildered. By-and-by there came the light again. 'Why did we go into the dark, father?' asked the child. Then the father opened the window, and bade the child look back. 'Do you see that great hill that rises up there and blocks the way?' 'Yes,' said the little one. 'Well, you know the train could not have gone up over that, and so they had to make a great hole through it for us to get home.' Then the little one laughed at its own fear. 'I needn't have been frightened, need I?' and he climbed up again, as if it were all right now. It is dark. We do not see the Father, but he is here. 'Why this darkness?' we cry out in wonder and in fear. Wait, and when we get into the light he will show us why. Then we too shall laugh at our fears. 'I need not have been frightened, Father: need I?'"

THE BOY MISSIONARY.

AT a recent Convention, Dr. Phillips, one of the missionaries supported by the Sunday School Union in India, related that a native scholar in his class, a lad remarkable for his lively and mischievous spirit, one day begged to be allowed to go home. His home was in the jungle forty miles away, and Dr. Phillips refused permission. But the lad persisted, until the missionary asked his reason. The boy replied, "I was like a bear cub, and knew nothing but how to eat until you taught me to pray. Now," said he, pointing to the jungle, "my mother and my sisters and brothers are there, and they worship devils, and don't know anything of Jesus; but I have learned to love him, and I want to tell them." The boy at once started on his journey. After a few days he returned; and Dr. Phillips asked him, "Do you think your mother and sisters will leave the worship of devils?" The lad drew himself up, and answered, "I have taught mother to pray to Jesus, and she will love him, too." Three months later, Dr. Phillips pitched his tent under a tree in a village across the jungle. A woman came out; he thought she was sick and had come for medicine, but she replied, "I'm not sick, doctor. I've got good news. I'm the mother of that boy whom you sent to teach us about Jesus, and I want to tell you that we heard the good word and have loved God ever since."

MIDSUMMER EVANGELISTIC WORK.

Evangelistic work in Chicago; the Interior says, is pushed with great energy this summer, to meet the exigencies of the World's Fair. Tents and other temporary structures have been placed in important centres, and services are held at all hours of the day. Moody and McNeill use theatres that are available, or preach in the larger churches, always to crowded congregations. Theodore Monod, of Paris Dr. Gordon, of Boston, and other eminent workers are here to assist in the campaign. All the city ministers remain at their posts during the usual vacation months, and have congregations that completely fill the churches.

A HOUSE CONVERTED.

IN the course of his report of his year's work in Tokyo, Japan, Rev. C. H. D. Fisher writes: "A few weeks ago one of our believers moved to Nihon bashi Ku, the central ward of the city, in which formerly hung, in a most public place by the street, the government proclamation of death to any one who should become a Christian. The believer at once invited us to make his house a preaching place, having, indeed, secured it in part for that purpose; and we have since had two or three preaching services each week. As it is publicly situated, with front wide open to the street, large numbers have stopped to listen, some for the whole sermon. They have gladly received tracts, and afterward have come in to talk over what they have heard. God has blessed, and we have hopes will still more bless this work, which is literally scattering seeds by the wayside, and a pretty busy wayside, too. The house has come to be known as the "Jesus preaching place." We need many such in this great city.

"To my country work I have gone out as often as I was able, sometimes several months in succession. It has been a pleasure to encourage the workers there, surrounded as they are by such depths of heathenism. Two men, one ordained and one not, have done honest work. Especially is it so of Suzuki San, the native pastor at Tochigi, who, besides work in that city, has given much time every month to itinerating in surrounding towns and villages. Both in town and out he has had good help from some of the young men of the church. Several times, by twos and threes, without a cent of pay, they have walked to preach, as best they can, in villages from two to seven miles distant.

"The other preacher I have changed during the year to Oyama, a railroad junction. The town is an especially wicked one, and work heretofore done there seems to have been almost fruitless. On going there he secured as his place to live and preach in a pretty good-sized house, but one that was formerly used for a very different purpose. It has now become proverbial in the town that that which was bad has become the centre of good influence. How many houses in Japan need such a change! God has helped us, and we have tried to speak his word there. A little Sunday school is gathered, two or three have been converted and baptized, and we hope greater things are in store for that town which has been such an enemy of truth."

THE INEXHAUSTIBLE FORCES.

In addressing the American Baptist Missionary Union recently, at Denver, Colo., the president, Rev. Augustus H. Strong, D. D., said: There is an account of the battle of Sedan, in the Franco-Prussian war, which describes the tremendous energy and determination with which the Germans attacked a French position, upon which depended the fate of the day. Regiment after regiment, brigade after brigade of the best German soldiers advanced upon it, and as fast as they advanced were swept away by the dreadful fire. But still they came, came in greater and greater force, came till the whole country seemed a living mass of men. On they came, their ranks riddled with shot and shell, whole battalions annihilated, but the more that were killed the more there were to kill. Over the distant crest of the hills they still kept pouring on; for every thousand slain, ten thousand marched to take their places, till the spectacle became too fearful to endure; the French began to fancy that all the armies of the earth were combining to attack them; and, with a sudden impulse and panic, they forsook their guns and fled. It will be so with the forces of our great Adversary. When they perceive that the whole church has devoted itself to subduing the rebellion they will see in that determination the expression of God's decree, and will lay down their arms forever.

LIGHT FROM FACTS.

"DURING the last twenty-five years," writes a missionary, "Persia has suffered from two scourges of cholera, two of famine, one of black plague and one of war. While these have had damaging effects upon business interests of all kinds as well as upon the distribution of the Scriptures, we have reason to believe that the people have learned some valuable lessons. One effect has been to break down deep-rooted Moslem prejudices against Christians in general, and missionaries in particular. Another is the gradual and manifest weakening of the Moslem belief in fatalism. During the first siege of cholera few of the 'faithful' fled from the city: in last summer's epidemic every one who could, did so. Again, the exemption of Christian communities from fatal cases of cholera has been most marked. In the Oroomiah field, with over two thousand church members, not one communicant died of the cholera—only one in Tabreez, one in Teheran, none in Halmas. This leads the Moslems to question whether they may not be mistaken in their doctrines. They say to one another: 'If these unclean infidels are spared so remarkably, while we, the faithful, are swept away like flies, what are we to think? God is great. Possibly they are correct and we are mistaken.' Such things lead us to believe that a rich blessing is in store for this interesting land."

"SEND ME THE CHRISTIAN."

THE following testimony to Christian character is quoted by the Spirit of Missions from Dr. W. P. Walsh, Bishop of Ossory: Our blessed Master, in describing the harvest of the Gospel, not only says that "the seed is the Word of God," but He also declares that "the good seed are the children of the Kingdom," thereby plainly intimating that the propagation of His truth in the world is not only dependent on the preaching of His blessed Gospel, but also on the presence and influence in the world of his devoted people.

Surely a study of the lives of our missionaries, and of the effects which have been produced upon those who witnessed them, bears abundant witness to this truth. The presence of such men as Harry Martyn, or David Livingstone, or Alexander Mackay has often proved to be a gospel in itself, and has testified to the existence of a nobler decalogue than their degraded hearers had ever dreamt of. "Send me none of your agents or ambassadors," exclaimed Hyder Ali, "for I do not trust their words or treaties; but if you wish me to listen to your proposals send to me the missionary Schwartz, of whose character I have heard so much from every one. Him I will trust and receive. Send me the Christian."

But why should such happy influences be confined to the appointed missionary? and why should not every Christian aim at being a "living epistle, known and read of all men?"

A TEACHER WANTED.

THE agent of the American Bible Society in Persia, gives a deeply interesting account of the work among the Koords, in the course of which he says: The colporteur in the mountains has been most faithful. His year has been spent in tramping in deep snows or working in burning heat. For several weeks he with other Nestorian Christians was imprisoned in a filthy prison by the Turkish authorities, and they were nearly starved and frozen before they were released.

The usual canvassing has been done by our colporteur on the plains of Salmas. Two colporteurs whom I had sent to Ghilan, on the Caspian coast, returned in March, and one of them afterward went to Djulfa, to travel along the valley of the Aras on the borders of Russia. He had access to a large numer of laborers congregated at a place on their way to Russia in search of employment. Late in the autumn I sent the same men to Resht; they will not return till Spring, but write they are meeting with encouraging sales. After one of our colporteurs had visited Toptop, I had a call from some men from that region who came to ask that I would send "that seller of books" back to the place to explain to them the meaning of the books he had sold them. About thirty villages were visited in the mountainous country of Karadagh.

One of our colporteurs, who accompanied an evangelist from the Presbyterian Mission on a tour among the Koords in the Maragha region where he witnessed the baptism of a prominent Koordish sheik who has under his authority 20,000 men. His conversion is the fruit of Bible distribution, for it was a Testament he bought from one of our colporteurs that taught him the story of Christ. His brother and other friends have come with him into the Christian fold.

The New Syriac Bible.

A Great Work of Years just Completed by our American Missionaries and Native Helpers—The Need of a Revision of the Syriac Scriptures—The Faithful Nestorians.

AFTER years of labor in the work of translation and revision, the new Syriac Bible has at last been completed and the book, printed and bound by the American Bible Society in New York, is now ready for distribution. The history of this long and arduous task, but lately finished, is a most interesting one. From first to last it has been accomplished under the skilled supervision of the Rev. Benjamin Labaree, D.D., an American missionary long resident in Persia and a master of the Syriac and other Oriental languages.

Rev. Dr. Perkins and his missionary colleagues were the pioneer translators of the Scriptures into the Modern Syriac. They began with the New Testament in 1846, which was made from the Syriac version known as Peshitto, a version esteemed by all Biblical scholars and almost venerated by the Nestorians. It was printed on the American mission press at Oroomiah, the Peshitto being placed side by side in parallel columns with the Syriac. Six years later, in 1852, was issued the first translation of the Old Testament from the Hebrew into the spoken Syriac, the Peshitto version being in many respects defective and inaccurate, since it had been made to harmonize more with the original Greek than the Hebrew. Still later, the necessity was felt for a volume less bulky than those in use, the Syriac characters being large and the complete Scriptures weighing between five and six pounds. Accordingly, type of a smaller size was prepared by the American Bible Society at a great expense; but, as the Bible Society has already printed, from its own types, the Bible either in whole or in part, in nearly 350 languages, it did not hesitate, and a new and convenient pocket edition of the New Testament was issued in 1863. Other editions followed, but in no case were the Old and New Testaments issued in one volume. These editions were ultimately exhausted and it was decided to undertake a thorough revision of all the translations before issuing another. A close comparison of the language and dialects, in the light of the fuller knowledge acquired during a lapse of twenty years, convincingly showed the great need of such a revision. In the early editions, the translators had conformed to the Oroomiah dialect, but it had never come into the general use expected, and it was therefore decided after full consideration, to make the Syriac style available for a much wider constituency. Defective translations in the earlier editions have been amended in the new, and the meaning of the original has been made clearer, while at the same time the translation itself is simple and idiomatic, and the dialect which is spoken on the western mountain slopes of Koordistan (embracing nearly one-half of the Nestorian people), is accorded prominent recognition. In addition to these advantages, the entire Bible—both Old and New Testaments—is in one compact convenient volume, and contains the references.

There are also copious foot-notes, giving either the Greek or Peshitto reading, when there is a material difference in the sense. Many redundancies and other peculiarities of the ancient Syriac are eliminated in the new version, and as a whole, as regards literary form and accuracy in translation, it is by far the most valuable version of the Syrian Scriptures yet published. It is hardly necessary to add that the new Syriac Bible will receive a warm welcome from the Nestorians, who have always evinced a beautiful reverence for the Word, and whose whole history, through the ages, is that of a people holding to a pure, simple faith, while many ancient churches have been whelmed in corruption and superstition.

The Syrian language is the language of the Nestorians, who, ages ago, removed from Syria into Persia to escape persecution. Every nationality in Persia, whether Turkish, Armenian, Syrian or Jewish, uses its own dialect and hence the Nestorians use the Syriac. It should be explained that among themselves they do not use or recognize the appellation Nestorian, preferring to call themselves "Surayi." Their spiritual leader bears the title of "Patriach of the East."

This modern Syriac is not now regarded by Semitic scholars as a descendant of the classic tongue of the Peshitto, known as the ancient Syriac, but rather as the representative of some sister branch of the Aramaic family of languages now otherwise lost sight of. There are two somewhat different alphabets in which the Syrian is written: the Jacobite, and the Nestorian. This modern Syriac Bible uses the beautiful Nestorian square character. Nine years ago the revision was undertaken by Rev. Dr. Labaree and his corps of assistants, and the printing of portions of it began six years ago. It was temporarily suspended, and was resumed in the fall of 1891 and continued until complete. Rev. Benjamin Labaree, D. D., the translator, who successfully accomplished this great and important work, is the son of the late President Labaree of Middlebury College, Vt. He received his earlier college training at that institution and was graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1859. In the following year he went out to Persia, and entered on missionary work under the auspices of the American Board. He was stationed at Oroomiah, and remained connected with that mission after its transfer to the Presbyterian Board, until the summer of 1891, with the exception of two vacation visits to the United States. He came here two years ago, for the purpose of personally supervising the printing of the Syriac Bible. He is still in this country, and his return is rendered uncertain by the condition of his family's health. A son, Rev. Benjamin W. Labaree, has recently been ordained to the ministry and will go to Oroomiah as a missionary this fall.

Associated in the work of producing the new Syrian Bible were, Mr. Joel W. Abraham, Mr. Paul Behman and Mr. David Ismail, whose portraits are given with this article. The first acted as assistant revisor and proof-reader, and the others as type-setters, having been trained to the business at the Mission Printing House at Oroomiah. Valuable assistance was also rendered by Mr. McLean, who for years has been employed by the American Bible Society, and who is able to read with equal facility manuscripts in a number of Oriental languages.

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., Founded on the Text: Judg. 11 :36: "My father, if thou hast opened thy mouth unto the Lord, do to me according to that which hath proceeded out of thy mouth."

JEPHTHAH was a freebooter. Early turned out from a home where he ought to have been cared for, he consorted with rough men, and went forth to earn his living as best he could. In those times it was considered right for a man to go out on independent military expeditions. Jephthah was a good man according to the light of his dark age, but through a wandering and a predatory life he became reckless and precipitate. The grace of God changes a man's heart, but never reverses his natural temperament.

The Israelites wanted the Ammonites driven out of their country, so they sent a delegation to Jephthah, asking him to become commander-in-chief of all the forces. He might have said, "You drove me out when you had no use for me, and now you are in trouble you want me back;" but he did not say that. He takes command of the army, sends messengers to the Ammonites to tell them to vacate the country, and, getting no favorable response, marshals his troops for battle.

Before going out to the war, Jephthah makes a very solemn vow, that if the Lord will give him the victory, then, on his return home, whatsoever first comes out of his doorway he will offer in sacrifice as a burnt-offering. The battle opens. It was no skirmishing on the edges of danger, no unlimbering of batteries two miles away, but the hurling of men on the point of swords and spears until the ground could no more drink the blood, and the horses reared to leap over the pile of bodies of the slain. In those old times, opposing forces would fight until their swords were broken, and then each one would throttle his man until they both fell, teeth to teeth, grip to grip, death-stare to death-stare, until the plain was one tumbled mass of corpses from which the last trace of manhood had been dashed out.

Jephthah wins the day. Twenty cities lay captured at his feet. Sound the victory all through the mountains of Gilead. Let the trumpeters call up the survivors. Homeward to your wives and children. Homeward with your glittering treasures. Homeward to have the applause of an admiring nation. Build triumphal arches. Swing out flags all over Mizpeh. Open all your doors to receive the captured treasures. Through every hall spread the banquet. Pile up the viands. Fill high the tankards. The nation is redeemed, the invaders are routed, and the national honor is vindicated.

Huzza for Jephthah the conqueror! Jephthah, seated on a prancing steed, advances amid acclaiming multitudes, but his eye is not on the excited populace. Remembering that he had made a solemn vow that, returning from victorious battle, whatsoever first came out of the doorway of his home, that should be sacrificed as a burnt-offering, he has his anxious look upon the door. I wonder what spotless lamb, what brace of doves will be thrown upon the fires of the burnt-offering. Oh horrors! Paleness of death blanches his cheek. Despair seizes his heart. His daughter, his only child, rushes out the doorway to throw herself in her father's arms and shower upon him more kisses than there were wounds on his breast or dents on his shield. All the triumphal splendor vanishes. Holding back this child from his heaving breast, and pushing the locks back from the fair brow, and looking into the eyes of inextinguishable affection, with choked utterance he says, "Would God I lay stark on the bloody plain. My daughter, my only child, joy of my home, life of my life, thou art the sacrifice!"

The whole matter was explained to her. This was no whining, hollow-hearted girl into whose eyes the father looked. All the glory of sword and shield vanished in the presence of the valor of that girl. There may have been a tremor of the lip as a rose-leaf trembles in the sough of the south wind; there may have been the starting of a tear like a rain-drop shook from the anther of a water-lily; but with a self-sacrifice that man may not reach, and only woman's heart can compass, she surrenders herself to fire and to death. She cries out in the words of my text, "My father, if thou hast opened thy mouth unto the Lord, do unto me whatsoever hath proceeded from thy mouth."

She bows to the knife, and the blood, which so often at the father's voice had rushed to the crimson cheek, smokes in the fires of the burnt-offering. No one can tell us her name. There is no need that we know her name. The garlands that Mizpeh twisted for Jephthah the warrior had gone into the dust; but all ages are twisting this girl's chaplet. It is well that her name came not to us, for no one can wear it. They may take the name of Deborah, or Abigail, or Miriam, but no one in all the ages can have the title of this daughter of sacrifice.

Of course this offering was not pleasing to the Lord; but before you hurl your denunciations at Jepthah's cruelty, remember that in olden times, when vows were made, men thought they must execute them, perform them, whether they were wicked or good. There were two wrong things about Jephthah's vow. First, he ought never to have made it. Next, having made it, it were better broken than kept. But do not take on pretentious airs and say, "I could not have done as Jephthah did." If to day you were standing on the banks of the Ganges and you had been born in India, you might have been throwing your children to the crocodiles. It is not because we are naturally any better, but because we have more Gospel light.

Now, I make very practical use of this question when I tell you that the sacrifice of Jephthah's daughter was a type of the physical, mental, and spiritual sacrifice of ten thousand children in this day. There are parents all unwittingly bringing to bear upon their children a class of influences which will as certainly ruin them as knife and torch destroyed Jephthah's daughter. While I speak, the whole nation, without emotion and without shame looks upon the stupendous sacrifice.

In the first place, I remark that much of the system of education in our day is a system of sacrifice. When children spend six or seven hours a day in school, and then must spend two or three hours in preparation for school the next day, will you tell me how much time they will have for sunshine and fresh air, and the obtaining of that exuberance which is necessary for the duties of coming life?

No one can feel more thankful than I do for the advancement of common school education. The printing of books appropriate for schools, the multiplication of philosophical apparatus, the establishment of normal schools, which provide for our children teachers of largest calibre, are themes on which every philanthropist ought to be congratulated. But this herding of great multitudes of children in ill-ventilated school-rooms, and poorly equipped halls of instruction is making many of the places of knowledge in this country a huge holocaust.

Politics in many of the cities gets into educational affairs, and while the two political parties are scrabbling for the honors, Jephthah's daughter perishes. It is so much so that there are many schools in the country to day which are preparing tens of thousands of invalid men and women for the future; so that, in many places, by the time the child's education is finished the child is finished! In many places, in many cities of the country, there are large appropriations for everything else, and cheerful appropriations; but as soon as the appropriation is to be made for the educational or moral interest of the city, we are struck through with an economy that is wellnigh the death of us.

In connection with this I mention what I might call the cramming system of the common schools and many of the academies: children of delicate brain compelled to tasks that might appal a mature intellect; children going down to school with a strap of books half as high as themselves. The fact is, in some of the cities parents do not allow their children to graduate, for the simple reason, they say, "We cannot afford to allow our children's health to be destroyed in order that they may gather the honors of an institution." Tens of thousands of children educated into imbecility; so, connected with many such literary establishments there ought to be asylums for the wrecked. It is push, and crowd, and cram, and stuff, and jam, until the child's intellect is bewildered, and the memory is wrecked, and the health is gone. There are children turned out from the schools who once were full of romping and laughter, and had cheeks crimson with health, who are now turned out in the afternoon pale-faced, irritated, asthmatic, old before their time. It is one of the saddest sights on earth an old-mannish boy, or an old-womanish girl.

Girls ten years of age studying algebra! Boys twelve years of age racking their brain over trigonometry! Children unacquainted with their mother tongue crying over their Latin, French, and German lessons! All the vivacity of their nature beaten out of them by the heavy beetle of a Greek lexicon! And you doctor them for this, and you give them a little medicine for that, and you wonder what is the matter with them. I will tell you what is the matter with them. They are finishing their education!

In my parish in Philadelphia a little child was so pushed at school that she was thrown into a fever, and in her dying delirium, all night long, she was trying to recite the multiplication table. In my boyhood I remember that in our class at school there was one lad who knew more than all of us put together. If we were fast in our arithmetic, he extricated us. When we stood up for the spelling-class, he was almost always the head of the class. Visitors came to his father's house, and he was almost always brought in as a prodigy. At eighteen years of age he was an idiot. He lived ten years an idiot, and died an idiot, not knowing his right hand from his left, or day from night. The parents and the teachers made him an idiot.

You may flatter your pride by forcing your children to know more than any other children, but you are making a sacrifice of that child, if by the additions to its intelligence your are making a subtraction from its future. The child will go away from such maltreatment with no exuberance to fight the battle of life. Such children may get along very well while you take care of them, but when you are old or dead, alas! for them, if, through the wrong system of education which you adopted, they have no swarthiness or force of character to take care of themselves. Be careful how you make the child's head ache or its heart flutter. I hear a great deal about black men's rights, and Chinamen's rights, and Indians' rights, and women's rights. Would God that somebody would rise to plead for children's rights. The Carthaginians used to sacrifice their children by putting them into the arms of an idol which thrust forth its hand. The child was put into the arms of the idol, and no sooner touched the arms than it dropped into the fire. But it was the art of the mothers to keep the children smiling and laughing until the moment they died. There may be a fascination and a hilarity about the styles of education of which I am speaking; but it is only laughter at the moment of sacrifice. Would God there were only one Jephthah's daughter.

Again: there are many parents who are sacrificing their children with wrong systems of discipline—too great rigor or too great leniency. There are children in families who rule the household. They come to the authority. The high chair in which the infant sits is the throne, and the rattle is the sceptre, and the other children make up the parliament where father and mother have no vote! Such children come up to be miscreants.

There is no chance in this world for a child that has never learned to mind. Such people become the botheration of the Church of God and the pest of the world. Children that do not learn to obey human authority are unwilling to learn to obey divine authority. Children will not respect parents whose authority they do not respect. Who are these young men that swagger through the street, with their thumbs in their vest, talking about their father as "the old man," "the governor," "the squire," "the old chap," or their mother as "the old woman?" They are those who in youth, in childhood never learned to respect authority. Eli having heard that his sons had died in their wickedness, fell over backward, and broke his neck, and died. Well he might. What is life to a father whose sons are debauched? The dust of the valley is pleasant to his taste, and the driving rains that drip through the roof of the sepulchre are sweeter than the wines of Helbon.

There must be harmony between the father's government and the mother's government. The father will be tempted to too great rigor. The mother will be tempted to too great leniency. Her tenderness will overcome her. Her voice is a little softer, her hand seems better fit to pull out a thorn and soothe a pang. Children wanting anything from the mother, cry for it. They hope to dissolve her will with tears. But the mother must not interfere, must not coax off, must not beg for the child when the hour comes for the assertion of parental supremacy and the subjugation of a child's temper. There comes in the history of every child an hour when it is tested whether the parents shall rule or the child shall rule. That is the crucial hour. If the child triumphs in that hour, then he will some day make you crouch. It is a horrible scene. I have witnessed it: a mother come to old age, shivering with terror in the presence of a son who cursed her gray hairs, and mocked her wrinkled face, and begrudged her the crust she munched with her toothless gums!

> How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is,
> To have a thankless child!

But, on the other hand, too great rigor must be avoided. It is a sad thing when domestic government becomes cold military despotism. Trappers on the prairie fight fire with fire, but you cannot successfully fight your child's bad temper with your own bad temper. We must not be too minute in our inspection. We cannot expect our children to be perfect. We must not see everything. Since we have two or three faults of our own, we ought not to be too rough when we discover that our children have as many. If tradition be true, when we were children we were not all little Samuels, and our parents were not fearful lest they could not raise us because of our premature goodness.

You cannot scold or pound your children into nobility of character. The bloom of a child's heart can never be seen under a cold drizzle. Above all, avoid fretting and scolding in the household. Better than ten years of fretting at your children is one good, round, old-fashioned application of the slipper! That minister of the Gospel of whom we read in the newspapers that he whipped his child to death because he would not say his prayers, will never come to canonization. The arithmetics cannot calculate how many thousands of children have been ruined forever either through too great rigor or too great leniency. The heavens and the earth are filled with the groan of the sacrificed. In this important matter, seek divine direction, O father, O mother. Some one asked the mother of Lord Chief Justice Mansfield if she was not proud to have three such eminent sons, and all of them so good. "No," she said, "it is nothing to be proud of, but something for which to be very grateful."

There are many who are sacrificing their children to a spirit of worldliness. Some one asked a mother whose children had turned out very well, what was the secret by which she prepared them for usefulness and for the Christian life, and she said, "This was the secret: When, in the morning, I washed my children, I prayed that they might be washed in the fountain of a Saviour's mercy. When I put on their garments, I prayed that they might be arrayed in the robe of a Saviour's righteousness. When I gave them food, I prayed that they might be fed with manna from heaven. When I started them on the road to school; I prayed that their path might be as the shining light, brighter and brighter to the perfect day. When I put them to sleep, I prayed that they might be enfolded in the Saviour's arms." "Oh," you say, "that was very old-fashioned." It was quite old-fashioned. But do you suppose that a child under such nurture as that ever turned out bad?

In our day most boys start out with no idea higher than the all-encompassing dollar. They start in an age which boasts it can scratch the Lord's Prayer on a ten-cent piece, and the Ten Commandments on a ten-cent piece. Children are taught to reduce morals and religion, time and eternity, to vulgar fractions. It seems to be their chief attainment that ten cents make a dime, and ten dimes make a dollar. How to get money is only equalled by the other art, how to keep it. Tell me, ye who know, what chance there is for those who start out in life with such perverted sentiments? The money market resounds again and again with the downfall of such people. If I had a drop of blood on the tip of a pen, I would tell you by what awful tragedy many of the youth of this country are ruined.

Further on, thousands and tens of thousands of the daughters of America are sacrificed to worldliness. They are taught to be in sympathy with all the artificialities of society. They are inducted into all the hollowness of what is called fashionable life. They are taught to believe that history is dry, but that fifty-cent stories of adventurous love are delicious. With capacity that might have rivalled a Florence Nightingale in heavenly ministries, or made the father's house glad with filial and sisterly demeanor, their life is a waste, their beauty a curse, their eternity a demolition.

In the siege of Charleston during the Civil War, a lieutenant of the army stood on the floor beside the daughter of the ex-Governor of the State of South Carolina. They were taking the vows of marriage. A bombshell struck the roof, dropped into the group, and nine were wounded and slain; among the wounded to death, the bride. While the bridegroom knelt on the carpet trying to stanch the wounds, the bride demanded that the ceremony be completed, that she might take the vows before her departure; and when the minister said, "Wilt thou be faithful unto death?" with her dying lips she said, "I will," and in two hours she had departed. That was the accidental slaughter and the sacrifice of the body; but at thousands of marriage-altars there are daughters slain for time and slain for eternity. It is not a marriage: it is a massacre.

Affianced to some one who is only waiting until his father dies, so he can get the property: then a little while they swing around in the circles, brilliant circles; then the property is gone, and having no power to earn a livelihood, the twain sink into some corner of society, the husband an idler and a sot, the wife a drudge, a slave and a sacrifice. Ah! spare your denunciations from Jephthah's head, and expend them all on this wholesale modern martyrdom.

I lift up my voice to-day against the sacrifice of children. I look out of my window on a Sabbath, and I see a group of children, unwashed, uncombed, unchristianized. Who cares for them? Who prays for them? Who utters to them one kind word?

When the city missionary passing along the park in New York, saw a ragged lad and heard him swearing, he said to him, "My son, stop swearing! You ought to go to the house of God to-day. You ought to be good; you ought to be a Christian." The lad looked in his face and said, "Ah! it is easy for you to talk, well clothed as you are, and well fed; but we chaps hain't got no chance." Who lifts them to the altar for baptism? Who goes forth to snatch them up from crime and death and woe? Who to-day will go forth and bring them into schools and churches? No. Heap them up, great piles of rags and wretchedness and filth. Put underneath them the fires of sacrifice, stir up the blaze, put on more faggots, and while we sit in the churches with folded arms and indifferent, crime and disease and death will go on with the agonizing sacrifice.

During the early French Revolution at Bourges there was a company of boys who used to train every day as young soldiers; and they carried a flag, and they had on the flag this inscription: "Tremble tyrants, tremble; we are growing up." Mightily suggestive! This generation is passing off, and a mightier generation is coming on. Will they be the foes of tyranny, the foes of sin and the foes of death, or will they be the foes of God? They are coming up!

I congratulate all parents who are doing their best to keep their children away from the altar of sacrifice. Your prayers are going to be answered. Your children may wander away from God, but they will come back again. A voice comes from the throne to-day, encouraging you: "I will be a God to thee, and to thy seed after thee," And though when you lay your head in death there may be some wanderer of the family far away from God, and you may be twenty years in heaven before salvation shall come to his heart, he will be brought into the kingdom, and before the throne of God you will rejoice that you were faithful. Come at last, although so long postponed his coming. Come at last!

I congratulate all those who are toiling for the outcast and the wandering. Your work will soon be over, but the influence you are setting in motion will never stop. Long after you have been garnered for the skies, your prayers, your teachings and your Christian influence will go on, and help to people heaven with bright inhabitants.

Which would you rather see?—which scene would you rather mingle in, in the last great day—being able to say, "I added house to house, and land to land, and manufactory to manufactory; I owned half the city; whatever my eye saw I had, whatever I wanted I got;" or, on that day to have Christ look you full in the face and say, "I was hungry, and ye fed me; I was naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick and in prison, and ye visited me; inasmuch as ye did it to the least of my brethren, ye did it to me?"

Jephthah's Meeting with his Daughter.

FOR THE MASTER'S SAKE.

BY JAMES CLARENCE HARVEY.

DOWN at the end of the road which led through the village, the old factory hummed all day with its iron tongues and at nightfall winked its flaming eyes at the gloom around it. As the workmen passed the window of a little cottage that stood flush with the street, half way down the road toward the great arched entrance to the factory enclosure, they stopped to leave a flower, a bit of ribbon, an apple or a broken scrap of bright colored glass in the little white hands of the crippled boy within.

They had known his father when he had been the leading spirit in all their humble merry-makings and they had seen this little fellow, striving with the courage of a man, forgetful of his own danger, trying to save his father's life when he had been caught in one of the great machines.

Ever since that dreadful day, the little fellow had lain here, smiling through his pain and they had learned, day by day, to give a few minutes in the morning and again at evening to the widow's loom at the factory that she might have more time to give her boy a mother's care.

They did not speak of it to each other. It was all too sad for them to talk about, but no day passed that did not find some little gift upon the window ledge.

By and by, the workmen seemed to grow gentler and kinder and some of them stopped swearing as the pale face at the window took on a patient but weary look which told that the end was drawing near.

One morning the bell in the tower of the village church was tolled slowly and when the little coffin was borne out of the cottage door, a hundred brawny men followed it to the church-yard with uncovered heads and moistened eyes.

And when the preacher had spoken the last word of his tender tribute to the dead boy's memory, a fervent "Amen" was breathed in a hoarse whisper from the sympathetic breasts of those rough men, as they turned to resume their daily toil.

The sorrowing widow went back again to the lonely cottage and there upon the window ledge where they had so often left their little gifts, she saw, shimmering in the sunlight, a pile of coin, dimes, quarters, half-dollars and dollars, and peeping out from amongst the silver, here and there, even the glitter of a piece of gold, and on a bit of paper, roughly scrawled, she read with tear-dimmed eyes: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

PAUL AT JERUSALEM.

8 S. Lesson for Aug. 13 Acts 21: 27-39. Golden Text, Phil. 1: 29. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

SUFFERING was neither a strange nor an unexpected thing to Paul. Even before his conversion, the Lord had said to Ananias at Damascus concerning him: "I will shew him how great things he must suffer for my name's sake." (Acts 9: 16.) In his personal testimony and in his exhortation to the church, he shows how he looks on suffering as a part of his life's vocation. He even went so far as to suffer that he might further suffer: "For whom I have suffered the loss of all things . . . that I may know . . . the fellowship of his sufferings." (Phil. 3: 8–10.) Thus, instead of pitying the Philippians when they passed through trial, he said to them: "Unto you it is given on the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for his sake." (Phil. 1: 29.) In the eyes of Paul, suffering for Christ's sake was not an injury or a wrong from man, he did not look on that side of it, he knew no man after the flesh, and so did not see his persecutors, he saw only the privilege of suffering for him who had borne so much for him.

It is Given

. . . to suffer for his sake. Thus it came to pass that when he sailed from Miletus, and after calling at other places, he landed at Cæsarea, and the prophet Agabus declared how he should be bound at Jerusalem and delivered into the hands of the Gentiles, Paul accounted it "no strange thing," but said: "What mean ye to weep and to break mine heart for I am ready, not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus." The church at Cæsarea had to learn that Paul's life bore out his teaching, and that he could stand the test when he was put to the proof. All they could then say was: "The will of the Lord be done." They had learned their lesson and the Church was richer for it.

Thus Paul went up to Jerusalem, knowing that bonds and afflictions awaited him and that, like his Master before him, he was to be delivered into the hands of the Gentiles. Yet like his Master, he "steadfastly set his face to go up to Jerusalem." There the brethren received him and his companions "gladly," and they glorified the Lord for his work among the Gentiles by his ministry, yet they were not without some fear, as was evidenced in the counsel given him to join four brethren who had a vow, and who were going through the ceremonial purification (Num. 6) which was ordained for Nazarites or those that had a vow. The elders of the church at Jerusalem thought by this stratagem, to disarm the opposition of the Asiatic Jews who were at Jerusalem, and Paul, without waiting as was his wont to take counsel with God, agreed to their proposition and spent seven precious days in these rites. Being this could not, and did not, answer. The seven days had not expired when persecution broke out. On a mere supposition that Paul had brought his Ephesian disciple, Trophimus into the temple, and polluted the holy place, by the presence of a Gentile, they stirred up the people, arrested Paul, and were about to take [illegible] when the chief captain, hearing of the uproar, called out the military and rescued Paul. This was no accident: God had testimony for Paul to bear in Rome, and epistles to the churches which Paul must write, and which should be blest to the saints of God in all ages. God would not have Paul die at that time, and therefore the chief captain, a Roman idolater [illegible]

But the chief captain had some difficulty to get at the truth about his prisoner, and, judging from the violence of the people he imagined that Paul was some revolutionary leader of a faction. When he found out that Paul could speak Greek, that he was an educated man, and was a citizen of Tarsus in Cilicia, he permitted him at his request to speak to the people. Speaking in the Hebrew tongue, which was understood by all the people, he gave a clear uncolored statement of the facts of his awaking and conversion, of God's dealing with him direct from heaven, of the revelation of Jesus of Nazareth to him, of God's own declaration that they would not receive his tesimony in Jerusalem, and how he should be sent

Up to this moment they heard him calmly, but this exasperated them beyond measure. They saw the Romans masters of their land and they clung with the utmost tenacity to the one little superiority on which they prided themselves, their religious faith, although it had deteriorated until it had become a mere round of outward ceremonial. How strange that now when the glory had departed and their faith was a powerless sham, they should nevertheless have been so sensitive about it! All the bitterness of the natural heart, which sees all it has clung to vanishing away, possessed these infuriated Jews, when they heard a man that was born a Jew, a man who by his own showing had real intercourse with God, and yet by preaching among the Gentiles would break down the only bit of Jewish prestige which remained, their supposed spiritual superiority to the Gentiles! Wounded pride rouses the maddest anger, which has neither reason nor justice in it. The very quintesence of self dwells in wounded religious pride.

"Away with such a fellow from the earth," was the cry of the populace. But why? He had only known and spoken of true communion with God, and carried the blessed news of salvation to people of other nations. Yes: but this was to put Gentiles on a level with the Jews and this infuriated them. Like lunatics, they yielded to the frenzy of their anger, rending their clothes and casting dust into the air. But the chief captain commanded that Paul should be bound and scourged, whereupon he inquired: "Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman, and uncondemned?" Tell me, art thou a Roman?" said the chief captain. "Yea," was the answer. "With a great sum obtained I this freedom." "But I was free born."

Through all this the hand of God was at work. Paul was no cipher in the hands of man. God's purposes were being worked out in him. He did not speak of his birth or aught else with the idea of self-aggrandizement or of saving himself from suffering: his object was to get an opportunity to bear testimony to his Master. Who knows how many of those who heard him from the castle stairs—bruised as he was from the "beating" of the multitude, and yet detailing with such zest and unction the dealings of God with him, and using no single moment to ask for liberty, or to ingratiate himself either with the chief captain or with the Jews—who knows how many may have been awakened, perhaps even saved? What other prisoner would have acted thus? Who else would have turned every place into a pulpit to preach Christ?

Paul's declaration of his being a free born citizen of a Roman city procured for him yet another and a most important audience. The chief captain feeling he had gone too far, loosed him from his bonds, and called together the chief priests and their council to judge his unusual prisoner. Paul was at home in all he went though. This was not a kind of exception in his life, no "strange thing;" it was a part of his calling, he was in his element as much in being thwarted, unjustly accused, misunderstood, as when he was preaching or writing his epistles. His calling, when he was first converted was "to bear my name before the Gentiles and kings, and the children of Israel; for I will shew him how great things he must suffer for my name's sake." (Acts 9: 15, 16.) To testify and to suffer was his vocation, the one as much as the other. If his testimony by word was to be interrupted by persecution, it was to make more room for his testimony by suffering. He meant it when he said: "I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses for Christ's sake." (II. Cor. 12: 10.)

Paul's first word before the council was a bold one: "Men and brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day." This was a testimony which might easily convict the hypocritical and sinful man who sat to judge him. The unpriestly and utterly unworthy answer of the high priest Ananias was a command to smite him on the mouth. This stirred Paul. In Jerusalem then, as in many lands now, the law was administered in a very lax and partial manner; interest rather than justice gaining the day. He knew that Ananias was violating his rights and acting unjustly, and he said, "God shall smite thee, thou whited wall," a prophecy which was fulfilled for Ananias was slain at the beginning of the Jewish war. Paul seems at that moment to have been unconscious or forgetful that he was God's high priest, but he spoke with God's authority in pronouncing his doom.

LESSON POINTS.

The Castle of Antonia. (Acts 21: 34).

THE interview at Miletus with the representatives of the Ephesian church, described in last week's lesson, being over, Paul resumes his journey to Jerusalem. Luke being now with him we pass from the cursory history of the Apostle's proceedings to the methodical style which charcterizes Luke's writing when he is describing events of which he was an eyewitness. Leaving Miletus the little party sailed to Patara, where they arrived after a three days' voyage. There they found a trading vessel about to set out for Tyre, three hundred and fifty miles away as the crow flies, the course being southwest of Cyprus, thus being much shorter than the journey by land. The ship was probably laden with wheat or wine, or both, and it would require a week to discharge the cargo. Paul, according to custom, sought out the local church and spent the time in teaching and preaching. The people begged him not to go to Jerusalem, but without avail. They accompanied him to the ship and held a last solemn service on the beach. Thence the ship proceeded to Ptolemais, thirty miles distant, where they stayed one day, finding brethren there, too. Thence the party went to Cæsarea, taking the land route with which Paul was familiar. There they were entertained by Philip, one of the seven evangelists whose appointment is recorded in Acts 6: 5. Here, again Paul was advised and entreated not to put his life in peril by going to Jerusalem, and in a vivid way one of the brethren showed what would happen to him. Paul, however, was firm and went forward fearlessly. His reception from James, who appears to have been at the head of the Church in the holy city, was cordial. But sad reports had preceded him, which shocked the conservative brethren, and James, always the cautious, prudent man, advised Paul to put himself right with them. It was, James argued, quite right for the Gentile Christians to disregard Jewish rites and ceremonies, but Paul, being a Jew, should observe them. Paul did not wish to cause any ill-feeling in the church, so he did as James advised. But he was speedily recognized. Some Asiatic Jews probably from Ephesus, saw him in the temple and pointed him out. They had previously seen him about the city with one of his Ephesian friends whom they knew to be a Gentile, and they supposed he had brought him with him into the temple. The trouble which followed is the subject of the lesson.

This is the man that teacheth . . . against the law. The charge was false, as Paul's writings and his presence in the temple under those conditions proved. He was teaching a more exalted idea of God and the temple, and he worshipped, loved, and served the God whom his assailants claimed as their God and Father. There is a very pretty story told by Miss Strickland in her "Queens of England," of a little girl who saved her father's life. It was in the time of Queen Mary, the daughter of James II., and Lord Preston, the father of the child, was condemned to death for conspiring to bring back the exiled King James to the throne. Her name was Lady Catharine Graham and she was only nine years old. The poor child was (during the trial of her father) left in the Queen's apartments in Windsor Castle. The day after the condemnation of Lord Preston the Queen found little Lady Catharine in St. George's gallery gazing earnestly on the full length picture of James II., which still remains there. Struck with the mournful expression on the young girl's face, Mary asked her hastily what she saw in that picture which made her look on it so intently. "I was thinking," said the innocent child, "how hard it is that my father must die for loving yours." The Queen, deeply touched by this artless reply, immediately went to her husband, King William III., and induced him to sign the pardon of Lord Preston. Paul's trials came from loving the Being whom the Jews called their Father.

Polluted this holy place. The Jews were horrified at the idea of a Greek entering the temple. It may therefore be imagined how they must have felt when Antiochus Epiphanes, after he had captured Jeruselem, offered swine's flesh on the altar and sprinkled the temple with the blood—an offence for which the Jews would never be reconciled to him; and the Emperor Hadrian, anxiously wishing to drive away the miserable remnant who still sought the Hope of Israel amid the ruins of the conquered city, when he found all other means unavailing, accomplished his purpose by erecting the statue of a marble hog on the principal gate. The frantic devotees fled from the holy city, as if at length they deemed their cause to be desperate, since God had permitted so great a pollution. The real pollution of a sacred place, however, does not consist in such things but in the evil deeds of the people who worship in it. Speaking of the loveliness of St. Mark's Church at Venice, Mr. Ruskin says: "And what effect has this splendor on those who pass beneath it? You may walk from sunrise to sunset and not see one countenance brightened by it. Up to the very recesses of the porches the meanest tradesmen of the city push their counters; nay, the foundations of its pillars are themselves the seats—not 'of them that sell doves' for sacrifice, but of the venders of toys and caricatures. Round the whole square in front of the church there is almost a continuous line of cafes. And in the recesses of the porches, men and children gamble and fight, although the images of Christ and his angels are before them continually."

Bound with two chains. As if he were a dangerous, desperate man, when really his strongest characteristic and the very thing which had brought the indignity upon him was love of his fellow man. Some time ago a war raged in India between the English and a native monarch named Tippoo Sahib. On one occasion several English officers were taken prisoners, among them one named Baird. One day a native officer brought in fetters to be put on each of the prisoners, the wounded not excepted. Baird had been severely wounded, and was suffering from pain and weakness. A gray-haired officer said to the native official, "You do not think of putting chains upon that wounded young man?" "There are just as many pairs of fetters as there are captives," was the answer, "and every pair must be worn." "Then," said the officer, "put two pairs on me. I will wear his as well as my own." The end of the story is that Baird lived to regain his freedom, lived to take that very city, but the generous friend died in prison. He wore two pairs of fetters.

What he had done. Nothing worthy of chains or imprisonment. He suffered much all his life long, but never for evildoing. If there were no heaven the wrongs of this world could never be righted. As in this case, the charges brought against him at other times and places were false. Not long ago the papers contained an account of a man who served a full term in Sing Sing prison, but who subsequently applied for a vindication of his character on the ground of entire innocence of the crime for which he was imprisoned, and because he wished to remove the stain from his good name, especially in order that he might take out papers of American citizenship. The evidence in his favor was exceptionally strong, and the confession of the real criminal, exonerating the one thus applying, formally signed and witnessed, was in the hands of the Governor. Letters from the warden and the chaplain of the prison, from a former employer, and other documents of much importance as indicating the innocence of the man, were also laid before the Governor.

There is something very pathetic in the thought of an innocent man suffering punishment and bearing disgrace. There is coming a time when every child of God who has had cast upon him any unjust reproach, or has suffered any persecution, will have every such stain wiped forever away, and be given a bright, joyous inheritance.

A FLOATING EVANGEL.

The Gospel Boat "Good News" Sent Out by the Rescue Mission at Syracuse, N. Y. Commander Gibbud and his Work—Interesting Incidents of the First Trip.

RDINARY means of reaching with the Gospel message the many people who are literally and metaphorically "out of the way" have failed to satisfy some of the most earnest and consecrated workers for Christ in the present day. The Central Union Mission of Washington inaugurated a Gospel wagon; and its example has been followed by others. We have also Gospel cars on several railroads all carrying the good news to outlying and neglected districts. To these has now been added by The Rescue Mission of Syracuse, N. Y., another form of moving evangelistic effort in the Gospel Boat, Good News, of which a picture appears on this page. It is intended for service on the Erie Canal and its tributaries, and has already performed one successful trip.

The idea of the boat originated in the fertile brain of Mr. H. B. Gibbud, who for some time past has had charge of the Mission. From his own observation and from the reports of men who found their way to the Gospel services which he conducts in Syracuse, he became convinced that a rich field for Gospel effort existed in the floating population on the canal, in the farmhouses, factories and stores which line both its banks throughout its course, and in the cities, towns, villages and hamlets to which it is the simplest and cheapest route. Many of these people had no opportunity of hearing the Gospel message and a still larger number were disinclined to avail themselves of such opportunities as were within their reach. Business men used the canal as a means of communication but the men who were offering the Pearl of Great Price had somehow failed to turn the great avenue of commerce to account in their mission.

This was another instance in which "the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light." The reproach, however, was soon to be removed. Mr. Gibbud spoke of the opportunity of extending Christ's kingdom. Among those to whom he mentioned it was Mr. H. B. Andrews, a prominent business man of Syracuse, to whom the Mission was already indebted for its building and equipment. Mr. Andrews entered heartily into the project, and offered to provide a boat if Mr. Gibbud and his friends would undertake to use it in aggressive Christian work. The promise was gladly given and the project was fairly launched.

The boat secured by Mr. Andrews for the work was no stranger to the people on the canal. It was the property of a circus company and many an audience had gathered on board it to witness performances which were mirth-provoking if not edifying. Mr. Andrews is not the kind of man to do things by halves. Having purchased the boat from the circus people he set himself to the task of adapting it to its new occupation. The auditorium was already constructed. That part of the equipment the circus people had provided. It would seat comfortably about seventy-five persons. It was tastefully and prettily repainted and in place of the garish, florid decorations of the walls which were suitable for the performances formerly seen in the room, appear graceful wreaths and scrolls bearing appropriate passages of Scripture. Thus the silent walls were made to utter warnings and invitations and as the prophet said, when the wall spoke "the beam out of the timber answered it, for the crossbeams bear sharp, terse observations and questions. Among them are the following:

> Boycott the Devil, he don't give living wages, for "the wages of sin is death."
> Wilt thou have thy sins and go to hell, or leave them and go to heaven? It must be one or the other.
> Has drink got the best of you? Jesus can save and keep.
> One thing you may be sure of—"Be sure your sins will find you out."

In the hot summer evenings the meetings will be held on the deck around which runs a substantial railing. Here one hundred and fifty persons can be accommodated. Aft of the auditorium is a living room, and forward is a regular maritime dormitory in the shape of bunks and close to it is the indispensable kitchen. The entire length of the boat is seventy-five feet and the width twelve. It has been thoroughly repaired, renovated and embellished and has had its name changed to that of the Good News.

THE MANAGERS OF THE GOSPEL CANAL BOAT, "GOOD NEWS."

The first trip of the boat was from Syracuse to Utica. Its appearance on the way excited much interest, as it was promptly recognized as the circus-boat and not all of the people perceived that its occupation had undergone a transformation. Before the boat started, a deep, spiritual interest was aroused by the Scripture texts, and the meetings held. All along the line it attracted great attention. People came out from their homes, heads were thrust from all the factory windows, and the workers on the boat were able to throw many packages of religious reading to people along the line. Mr. Gibbud has rigged up a fish-pole, and as the canal boats pass by, packages of religious reading matter are passed over to the boatmen. Over four hundred boats were thus supplied on this first trip, which lasted sixteen days.

When the boat came to a town the workers went out with tracts and invitations, visiting the saloons and non-church going people, preaching Christ and inviting them to the meetings. Six hundred and twenty visits were made to families, and one hundred and ten were made to saloons. At eventide an open-air service was held from the deck, and a talk given on a large oil painting of the "Two Ways." At ten of these meetings, 7,590 people heard the Gospel. In one town, the population of which was two hundred, one hundred and fifty people came to the open-air service. At the close, a service was held in the boat. There was a large crowd at each meeting, and hundreds stood around on the outside, listening to the preaching. Nearly three thousand attended the indoor services; many of these people had not, on their own confession, been to a religious service for years. Forty-one requests were made for prayer, and twenty-nine professed conversion during these days of meeting. Thousands of tracts were given away, and many more read the message of salvation from the boat. As soon as it was daylight, the passing boatmen began to read the Scripture texts and to call on their families to look at the strange craft. All day long this continued. As a general rule, all seemed to have respect for the boat and its mission. Perfect order was preserved at the open-air and indoor services.

Many who had known the boat in other days, being unable to read, and not knowing of the change in owners, would ask the workers where they were "going to show." Two boys were overheard quarreling, and one finally appealed to one of the workers. "Say, Mister, this is a dog show, ain't it?" "No, 'taint," said the other, "it's snakes. I oughter know'd, I was on it when it was here before." They were greatly surprised that the admission was free, and that all could have reserved seats for nothing. They ran off, eager to tell the news and to bring the rest of the family.

One man remarked confidentially to a friend that he knew all about it, "it was going to the World's Fair to show itself."

There were many interesting incidents during the trip. A telegraph lineman was on top of a large telegraph pole which was on the roof of a four-story building. He heard the open-air service, and the following morning he came to the boat inquiring for the speaker of the previous evening. On meeting him, he said: "You said last night that Christ can save any one, do you honestly believe he can save me? I am a drunkard, I have tried everything to get away from the appetite for drink, but all have failed, if you think Christ can save me I want him to do so." He readily consented to pray and finally went away trusting him as his personal Saviour. One man who had not been in a religious service for twenty years was among the seekers. The majority of those attending the meeting were of the non-church-going class, including sailors, longshoremen, freight-handlers, artisans working in factories, and their wives and children. All were genuinely surprised that any disinterested effort should have been made to reach them with the Gospel.

In a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the history was published of a similar work to that of Commander Gibbud, which had been in operation on the great lakes for the last seventeen years. What Captain Bundy and his crew of hearty sailor-evangelists have done on Lakes Michigan, Huron and Superior in the Gospel steamship Glad Tidings, Commander Gibbud aims to do on the Erie Canal. The warm welcome everywhere accorded to the Good News, and the wide-reaching Gospel field that has already opened before it, in its early cruises, have greatly encouraged the workers. With brave consecrated hearts, they trust to find their service under the Great Captain of Salvation, blessed to the saving of many thousands from among the heedless and neglected population along the canal.

The managers understand the art of advertising and have suspended from the deck railing such invitations as the following:

> MEETING TO-NIGHT.
> You are invited. Don't fix up; come in your working clothes.
> MEETING TO-NIGHT.
> Man or woman, boy or girl, rich or poor, black or white, large or small, short or tall, Come one! Come all!
> MEETING TO-NIGHT.
> Mother bring the baby, it won't disturb us if it does cry.
> MEETING TO-NIGHT.
> Drinking men especially invited. Welcome drunk or sober.
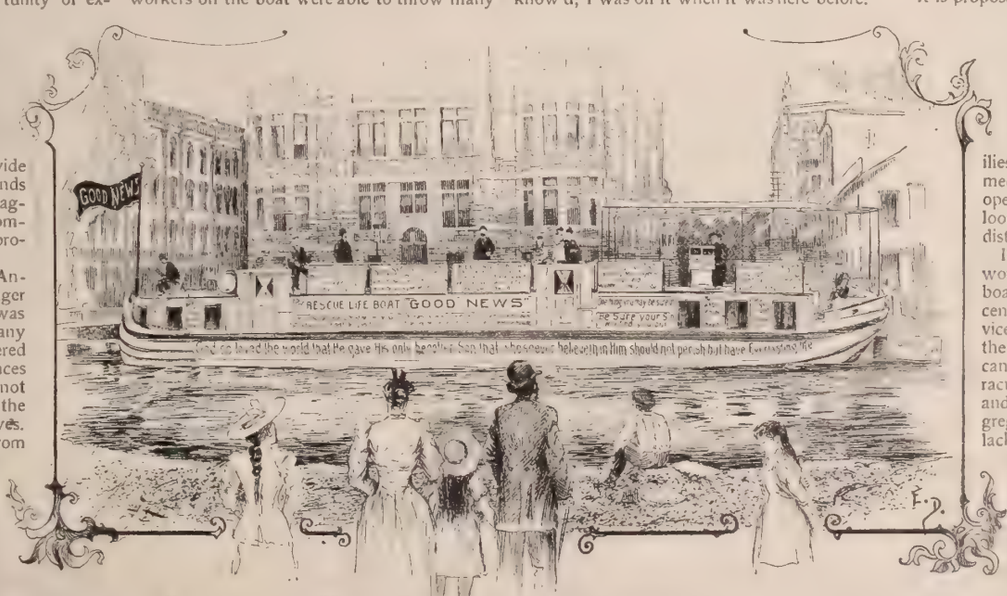
> MEETING TO-NIGHT.
> Come and bring your father, mother, sister, brother, and all the rest of the family and the neighbors.



THE ERIE CANAL GOSPEL BOAT, "GOOD NEWS."

It is proposed to hold evangelistic meetings in villages, towns and cities along the waterway, stopping in a place for a few meetings, working especially with non-church-goers, drinking men and the masses generally, and also to carry on a much-needed work with the boatmen and their families along the way. All this by meetings on board the Good News, open-air services, visitations of saloons and families, and by tract distribution and selling Bibles, etc.

It is intended to carry on the work during the summer and tie the boat up for the winter near the centre of some city and hold a service every evening. Next winter, the boat will be moored in the canal at the Market Square in Syracuse. Hundreds of farmers, buyers and sellers of various kinds congregate there and there will be no lack of audiences. Every evening there will be a service on the usual plan of Rescue Mission Meetings.

The work is to be under the general supervision of Mr. H. B. Gibbud; and Mr. Charles MacClinchey of Brooklyn, N. Y., will occupy the position which if the craft were a sea-going vessel, would entitle him to the rank of Captain. He is a Christian worker of several years' experience, who has given up his other engagements and has disposed of his business, in order to devote himself exclusively to this novel form of religious effort. He and his wife will have charge of the meetings, assisted by Mr. Sanford Van Luven, a convert of the Syracuse Mission, who has resigned a lucrative position to devote himself to the work. Both workers have displayed their faith in the promises of God to provide, for they have undertaken the work without salary. In fact the whole work is one of faith, as the Mission in Syracuse has no funds available for the support of the boat and its crew, but has opened two funds, one of which will be for defraying the expenses of the trips, keep of the towing horse, etc., and the other for the support of the workers. Mr. H. B. Andrews of Syracuse, who provided the boat and equipped it, is the Treasurer for both funds.

WIDE-AWAKE SERMONS.

IN our boyhood days we tried every kind of art to keep awake in church. We ate caraway-seed, and cloves, and cinnamon, and held up one foot until it began to ache, and pinched ourselves until we were black and blue, or got stimulus from an older brother who stuck us with a pin, or saw the reproving look of some older sister that filled us with a sense of self-abnegation, until we looked up to the elders' and deacons' pew in the old Dutch church, and saw the seven sleepers, these consecrated men having lost their hold at the end of the second head of the discourse, and then we felt encouraged to think that, after all, there might be some chance for us when such very good men got asleep. What is the use of hiding the fact that there is more sleeping done in the churches than in any other kind of buildings? Many of our churches are great Sunday dormitories. Men who are troubled at home with insomnia and cannot sleep on the pillow at night, find churches sometimes the needed anodyne. What morphine and chloral and pillow of hops cannot do, sometimes the sermon and the long prayer accomplish. Said the old Puritan clergyman, "And now, to be brief, eighteenthly!" Oh, how many arts to appear awake in church! You have seen men put their heads down on the pew in front, pretending they are overcome with emotion, when they are really overcome with drowsiness. I tell you, if we do not keep our audiences awake, it is the fault of us, the clergy, and not the fault of the [illegible].

An old Scotch minister, preaching, saw one of his hearers sound asleep, and he said, "Donald, wake up; if you can't keep awake in any other way, take a pinch of snuff." "Ah!" said Donald, "Doctor, put the pinch of snuff in the sermon!" With all the artillery of eternity at hand, if a man cannot keep his audience awake, it is because he has missed his calling. When men keep taking out their watches during religious services, it is evidence of the fact that they are bored. What would you think of a man at a banquet taking out his watch every few moments to see how soon he could stop eating a cream merangue? The gospel is a banquet, and our populations are starving for it, and their souls must have something to eat, and they have no patience with an entertainment which is all made up of napkin-ring, finger-bowl, and red-[illegible].

I put the complaint that the people do not like to come to church where it belongs. I say to the young men who are entering the ministry, if you want an audience, do as Paul did—make a big stir. "There arose no small stir about that way." Men want help. Give them help and they will come again. What do they care about the conventionalities of religion? How much of your Latin do they understand? What do they know about those sesquipedalian words that crawl through your senses like thousand-legged worms? They know your chief anxiety is lest you lose your place in your notes. They know it is all a matter of calculation that the soap-lock curl comes down half way on your forehead, so that at the right moment you may brush it away with a hand delicate and diamonded. What do you care about your Arian controversy, when the controversy with them is how they can pay a note of $500 with $200, and how they can get comfort for the child they buried yesterday in Greenwood?

RURAL REFLECTIONS.

THE outdoor life of our country friends has already begun. We hope that they have ploughed up more health and good cheer than ever before. Standing and walking so much in the sunshine, they ought to be bright and gladsome. The breath of the fields and woods ought to make them healthy. Their hard work ought to sharpen their appetite three times a day, and afford them eight or nine hours of sound sleep. We pray for their freedom from flood and drought, weevil and curculio; that there may be no long storms after they get the grain down, no ring-boned or spavined horses at the time when they want all the teams, no hollow-horn to depress the cow, no gaps for the rising generation of chickens, no incursion of neighbors' cattle into the bean-patch. We shall have a prosperous agricultural year. "How do you know?" cry out the rural population. "What sign in sky or ground or atmosphere do you judge by?"

Our reason for thinking so is that it is almost always so. The good Lord has a way of abundantly blessing the fields. When one crop fails others make it up, as blind eyes almost always insure super-excellent ears. In the last six thousand years we do not believe that there have been twenty that might be called dead failures. We are certain that this year, with not more than one or two exceptions of crops, we shall have large peaches, luxuriant corn, golden wheat, sound potatoes, rich grass, and great affluence of turnips, celery, cabbage and squash. While you are guessing by the moon, or the squirrel's storage of nuts, or the state of the mountain stream, or the almanac, as to what is coming to pass, we refer to the first agricultural journal ever written, and find in it: "While the earth remaineth, seed time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease."

PREACH CERTAINTIES.

THAT religion is a sedative to soothe all nervous perturbation, that it is a stimulus to arouse inertia, that it pulls up by the root the red dahlia of war, and plants instead thereof the white lily of peace; that we know. That it hangs around the dying couch of the Christian—the saffron, and orange and purple clouds of a heavenly sunrise, and swings back the gates of glory so wide that they shiver the gates of the sepulchre; that we know. Now, knowing these things beyond all controversy, knowing them beyond all mistake, knowing them from our own experience, or from our own observation, what is the use of our taking precious time in telling what we do not know? We had a great fire at my house one day. I burned up five hundred manuscript sermons, for when I began to preach I wrote out all my sermons, word for word. In those sermons that I burned up I explained all the mysteries of religion, and the doctrine of election was as clear as a Scotch mist or a London fog. As I stood by the kitchen fire where these manuscripts were burning, I really thought they threw out more warmth than they had ever thrown out before! Really, the best thing you can do with any style of Christian work that has not warmth in it is to burn it.

The pulpit and the church ought to be a great fireplace around which the people, benumbed of the cold world, can come and warm their entire nature. Stir up the fire around the great back-log and bring all the chairs up closer. There is a severe irony in the usual term descriptive of a minister's notes when they are called a minister's skeleton. Cold statements of truths are skeletons that need round them the warmth, the life, and the eternal sympathy of Christ's Gospel. There is nothing in romance or novel so enchanting as the religion of Christ, if you see it fairly; but put it down on the dissecting-table of sharp analysis and rip its heart out, and you have made it loathsome and a corpse.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Clarence Parrish, Rio Vista, Va. How many different pieces of furniture were placed inside the Ark of the Covenant? Also please state their names?

The tables of stone, the pot of manna, and the rod of Aaron. (see 1. Kings 8: 8; and Heb. 9: 4.)

Frank Gurney, Wappingers Falls, N.Y. I read that wild flowers, which are so plentiful here and are little thought of, are very much prized by the children in the city. I would like the address of the distributors of those flowers that are sent there, as the Missionary Committee of our society would like to do some work of that kind?

Write to the secretary of the Flower Mission, 104 E. 20th Street, New York.

Mrs Rachel Baxter, Manchester, Ia. Do you believe it is right for ministers to go to horse races?

Generally speaking, it is not, although circumstances altogether apart from the sport or its sinful surroundings, might take them there. A man of God may enter a den of sin on the Master's business; but he would not therefore be accused of frequenting such a place.

"Panhandle," Tex. What is meant by the abomination of desolation (Matt. 24:15?

Expositors of prophecy are now generally agreed that in the years preceding the second coming of Christ, the Antichrist will have his image erected in a temple which the Jews will build in Jerusalem, and require them to worship it. This they believe is the abomination of desolation standing where it ought not.

Emily C. Waterhouse, West Kennebunk, Me. What is the meaning of the command, "Arise and thresh, O daughter of Zion" (Micah. 4:13)?

The prophet was encouraging his people with a prospect of final triumph over their enemies. They had been assailed and beaten and imprisoned and persecuted. He told them that the time would come when their enemies would be at their feet, and they could treat them as they had been treated. The image is that of threshing corn, which was done by a flail.

Inquirer, Akron, O. Please give your opinion as to the legal and Scriptural position of a man who left his wife because she was unfaithful to her marriage-vows. After two years she married again. Is he free to marry?

Not if he did not obtain a divorce. The wife committing bigamy does not justify him in committing the same crime. He is, as a Christian, entitled to a divorce, if the facts are as you state them, and after obtaining it he may marry again. That is the view according as we understand the Scripture. As to the legal aspect, you should consult a lawyer.

P. S. Wallace, Shaw, Miss. 1 Did Judas partake of the Lord's supper? 2. Ought Christians to partake of the Lord's Supper privately or in the presence of persons who are not Christians?

1. It is a question on which Bible students are not agreed. Having carefully weighed the arguments on both sides, our own opinion is that he withdrew before the sacrament was instituted. He was not excluded, but voluntarily went out when, by giving him the sop, Christ showed that he knew of the purpose Judas was cherishing. 2. It does not signify. If unconverted persons wish to witness the celebration there can be no harm in their doing so.

Magnhe Mortborn. Was the temple of Christ's time the temple built by Zerubbabel, or the temple of Herod?

When Herod proposed to rebuild the temple the Jews objected to his razing it to the ground lest he should die before rebuilding it, or should grow weary of the work, and so they be left without a temple. They also protested against being deprived of temple worship during the whole period of demolition and reconstruction. Herod therefore built the temple by piecemeal, restoring and repairing one part at a time. The Jews therefore regarded the work as one of restoration, and held that it was the original temple restored and beautified and not a new temple. Probably the foundations were not disturbed and it may be that some parts of the original structure remained.

J. L. Vinson, Valonia, Ind. 1. Who was the first person to publicly advocate the abolition of slavery in the United States? 2. Give the best figures you can as to the court expenses, jail and asylum expenses, etc., caused by the liquor traffic? 3 What amount does the liquor traffic yield in internal revenue? 4. Give estimate of amount liquor traffic pays us in city, state and government licenses?

1. The Pennsylvania Quakers were the first to take action against it. They publicly advised its discontinuance in 1696, 1754 and 1774 and in 1776 excluded slaveholders from membership. The men prominent in the early agitation were William Burlin, (1718), Thos. Lay, John Woolman, (1720-1773), and Anthony Benezet, (1713-1784.) 2, 3, and 4. For all statistical information relative to the liquor traffic address Mr. J. N. Stearns, Secretary, National Temperance Society, 58 Reade Street, New York.

Edward Cramp, Erie, Pa. 1. What did Christ mean by the Times of the Gentiles in Luke 21: 24? 2. What did the vision of the tree symbolize in Dan. 4: 9-19? 3. Were the divine and the human natures in Christ distinct and therefore the human extinct before his exaltation?

1. The times of Gentile supremacy during which the Holy Land would not be under a Jewish government. 2. The vision was explained in verses 22–27. It symbolized the king's affliction. During his aberration of mind he was stripped of power and majesty although still living. Cut down, but not rooted up, as the prophet said. 3. Many attempts have been made to accurately define the mystery of the Incarnation, but none have been successful. It is better to take the Bible phrases, "God was manifest in the flesh;" "In him dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily" and similar passages as matters for faith rather than comprehension.

Witt Archibald, Nokomis, Ill. What is the examination mentioned 1 Cor. 2: 26-28 as being necessary to eating and drinking worthily?

A personal self-examination of the heart. If a man is conscious of hatred toward any one, of malice, of sinful purposes, of sinful connections which he ought to sever, but has not severed, or of cherishing any feeling inconsistent with his relation to Christ, he should not partake of the communion. This does not imply that only perfect persons should do so. If a man is honestly and earnestly striving after holiness and doing all that lies in him to live consistently; and sincerely deplores every failure and means to strive to avoid them in the future; if he loves Christ and is trusting in him for salvation, he is right in partaking of the communion although he may be conscious of having fallen into sin.

Julius P. Albrae, Perkins, Ia. 1. Is it right for a Christian to play croquet or other like games? Would it not be better for him to spend his time for the glory of God and to the edifying of some one else? 2. Do you think it proper for a Christian to shout and make much noise in church? Can you give any Scripture that would show that it is required of them?

1. There is nothing in the Bible or in the teachings of Christ or his apostles that condemns innocent mirth or recreation, in its proper time and place. An infusion of cheerfulness would greatly improve the quality of some people's Christianity, and make it vastly more attractive to others. 2. Christianity is a religion less of the head than of the heart, and it is not surprising that the joy of the heart should find expression in songs and shouting. These are the natural, unrestrained outlet of a soul filled with deep religious fervor and spiritual gladness. Scripture literally teems with invitations to God's people to such expressions of feeling. Ezra 3: 13, tells of the "noise of the shout of joy" at the laying of the foundations of the Temple. In Psalm 33: 3, the congregation is urged to sing new songs and make a "loud noise," and in Isa. 42: 10, we read "let them shout and declare his praise;" Job 38: 7, relates that the "sons of God shouted for joy," while Psalm 65: 13, describing the condition of the righteous who had been blessed with prosperity, says, "they shout for joy. . . they also sing." "Let them that put their trust in thee rejoice," says the Psalmist (Ps. 5: 11), "let them shout for joy." In marked contrast is the picture in Isa. 16: 10, of the unrighteous from whom the Lord has turned his face, "There is no singing, neither shall there be any shouting." Surely the Christian who feels his heart overflowing with joy and gratitude to God, has the best of all warrants for publishing his gladness to the world by singing and shouting, if he be so minded.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE SIAMESE COMPLICATION.

THE difficulty, in which the far-off kingdom of Siam has suddenly become involved with France, seems to have developed the long slumbering jealousies of European powers into an acute condition. As usual the initiative is taken by France. Her control of Annam in the Indo-Chinese peninsula is the basis of her grievance. The frontier line between Annam and Siam in the South is the Mekong river, but in the north it is a range of mountains on the east of the river. Between the river and the mountains is a region nearly a hundred thousand square miles in extent. The French contend that this region should belong to Annam and the river Mekong through its whole course be the frontier. In addition to this cause of dispute there is another, arising out of murder on Siamese territory of two French officials. The French made demands on Siam for an indemnity for its murdered citizens and for other alleged wrongs and fixed the amount at three million francs (equivalent to $600,000). They also demanded the cession of the disputed territory, and despatched a number of warships up the river to enforce their claims. As the passage of the vessels was disputed, the French shelled the Siamese forts, killing two hundred Siamese soldiers. The gun-boats passed up the Mekong, entered the Menam river, and anchored off Bangkok, the capital of Siam. An ultimatum was sent to the king of Siam formulating the French demands and giving him forty-eight hours in which to return an answer. If at the expiration of that time a favorable answer had not been given the French declared they would bombard Bangkok. There would be no interest for European statesmen in the dispute, if the question of the indemnity for the murdered Frenchmen stood alone; but Great Britain is interested in the proposal to dismember Siam. In the territory claimed by France there are many British subjects engaged in mining and other industries under concessions of the Siamese Government, and the inhabitants of the region buy a considerable quantity of British goods. Beside this, the northern portion of the country claimed, abuts on British territory in Burmah and its independence of European control has formed a buffer against dangerous approach of rival powers. Great Britain is consequently opposed to the cession of the region and her dislike of it is increased by the fact that Russia, her great and dreaded rival in Asia is supporting the French demands. Germany and Italy also have an interest in the question arising out of the residence of some of their citizens in Siam. China is also interested, inasmuch as the King of Siam is a tributary of China and is under Chinese protection. The King of Siam knowing his inability to contend with France single-handed, has appealed for help to England and to China. Should that help be given and should Germany and Italy send war vessels to Bangkok, as they now propose, a great struggle might be precipitated in which France and Russia on the one hand would be opposed to England, Germany, Italy and China on the other. The diplomats are endeavoring to avert such a struggle by trying to induce France to moderate her demands, but not with much prospect of success. This is not the first time France has attempted to extend her territory by a region lying between her frontier and a river. Twenty-three years ago she tried to make the Rhine the frontier between herself and Germany. The penalty she had to pay then for the outrage should have taught her that the business of removing ancient landmarks which God prohibited, may be attended with unpleasant results. (Prov. 23: 10, 11.)

The Cost of a Debauch.

A MAN who was arrested at Rochester, N.Y., a few days ago for drunkenness, has been condemned to pay a heavy penalty for his indulgence. When the case was proved against him and the judge was about to impose the usual penalty of ten dollars or ten days, one of the officers of the Court called the judge's attention to the prisoner's record. It appeared that in 1889 he was convicted of robbery in the first degree and sentenced to imprisonment for thirteen years. Six months ago, however, Gov. Flower gave him a free pardon on condition that he abstain from intoxicating liquor for a period of five years. When the judge learned the facts, he declared that the man having violated the conditions on which he obtained his pardon must go back to jail to serve out his incompleted sentence. The prisoner has also forfeited the time allowance to which he would ordinarily be entitled for good behavior, so that he will have to remain in prison for about ten years as a consequence of his intoxication. At first sight the penalty seems unreasonably severe, but a pardoned man is under special obligations. The Christian ought never to forget the fact. Sin is much worse in him than in an unconverted man and may be punished by more severe chastisement. (II. Peter 2: 20.)

Rust Under the Paint.

A DISCUSSION took place a few days ago at the Engineers' Club of Philadelphia, on the merits of several kinds of paint which have been prepared specially for use on iron buildings. Several members gave their opinions derived from their experience. There was a difference between them, but all agreed that no matter which variety of paint was used, an essential preliminary was under all circumstances, that the iron be absolutely free from rust before the paint was applied, otherwise the rust would spread from a point under the coating, if there be the slightest chance for it to do so, flaking off the paint, and thus gradually exposing the bare surface of the iron. An analogous precaution may be commended to the pastors of churches. In the examination of candidates for membership care should be taken to impress upon them the necessity of putting away secret sin and getting rid by the Holy Spirit's power of the corroding worldliness which is apt to spread under the covering of religious profession. (I. Cor. 11: 28-30.)

Thirty Years Unburied.

A remarkable funeral took place at Rock Island, Tenn., recently. It was that of an aged widow and her son; and both were interred in the same grave. The son had been dead for thirty years. He was killed at the battle of Murfreesboro, in January, 1863, fighting in the Confederate army. He was the widow's only son, and she almost idolized him. His death was so terrible a shock to her that it was feared she would lose her reason. She insisted that the body should not be buried, and in that time of confusion she had her way. An air-tight cedar coffin with a glass top was prepared, and the body of the young man placed in it. The widow had it placed in the room her son had formerly occupied, and there it remained, among his books, fishing-rods and other possessions. The widow would go there frequently and remain for hours. The body did not decay, but in process of time it dessicated. The widow left instructions that it should be buried with her, and when she died, lately, her wishes were carried out. Every one must sympathize with such sorrow as her retention of her son's corpse implies. It deserves sympathy, on account not only of its intensity, but its hopelessness. The body she cherished so long, could never again be the abode of the son whom she loved; her only ground of hope lay in his receiving through faith in Christ that new body which the Bible assures us will be given to those who die in Jesus (I. Cor. 15: 35-43.)

Cleansing the Immigrants.

THE appearance of the immigrants who arrived at New York on July 20, by the steamer Amsterdam from Rotterdam caused general surprise in the Health Department. Instead of the dirty, unkempt appearance that people usually present on emerging from the steerage, after a voyage from European ports, the Amsterdam's passengers had a fresh and tidy aspect. Every one had clean hands and faces and the men were either clean-shaven or wore beards neatly trimmed. Health Officer Jenkins complimented the captain and his officers on bringing into port the cleanest lot of immigrants ever received. It appeared from the captain's story that the compliment was paid where it belonged. When the immigrants came on board, the ship's surgeon was alarmed by their filthy appearance and feared that there would be a great deal of sickness on the voyage. On the second day out one-half the passengers were marched to a secluded part of the steerage where there was a collection of bath tubs. Each member of the group was required to wash from head to foot and they were assisted by the use of the fire hose. While the process was going on, their clothes were well brushed and their sleeping quarters thoroughly scrubbed. After dressing, they were introduced to the barbers. On the next day the other half of the immigrants were similarly treated and the practice was continued through the voyage, one-half the passengers being well cleansed each day. The result was eminently satisfactory as far as it went. The captain could not do more toward making the immigrants acceptable. His story implies that the ablutions were not altogether voluntary on the part of the immigrants so that it is possible they may relapse into their filthy condition. Permanent reformation as to physical cleanliness and still more as to moral and spiritual cleanliness can only come from the desire of the individual himself and God himself will not impart the latter without that desire. (Matt. 13: 58.)

THE MENACED CITY OF BANGKOK, THE CAPITAL OF SIAM.

A Harmless Process.

A DISCOVERY has been made by scientific examiners in the employ of the Government, which will enhance the value of property in some varieties of timber. It has hitherto been a popular belief that when the turpentine has been extracted from the growing pine its timber is less valuable. The announcement is now made officially in a Government publication that it has been proved beyond question by a variety of tests that the timber is in no way affected by the process of tapping, and this, it is stated, refers to its mechanical as well as chemical properties, and hence even the reservation that it might suffer in durability is now no longer tenable, and any prejudice against the use of bled timber in construction must be regarded as having no foundation in fact. The basis for the statement is furnished by a series of tests comprising no less than three hundred investigations on thirty-two trees belonging to different localities. Thus the fact is established that the tree loses none of its valuable and useful qualities in yielding its product, and the same fact holds good in spiritual life. The good that a man imparts to others does not impoverish his own soul, and as to money "there is that giveth and yet increaseth." (Prov. 11: 24.)

BRIEF NOTES.

There is remarkable activity in Uganda since British protection was assured. Sir Gerald Portal, is laying down roads, organizing a postal service, building light bridges, planting swamps, placing ferries, and establishing "religious spheres of interest."

A Hindu writer says that the danger now threatening the overthrow of the national religion and heathenism is not from the schools or preaching, but from the women and doctors. Such a testimony to the value of the Zenana workers and the medical missionaries is very significant.

A cot in a London Hospital, to be called "The Abraham Lincoln Cot," will shortly be permanently endowed by the subscriptions of American ladies who have married Englishmen and now reside in England. The cot is not named for the Martyr President, but for his little grandson who died in London a few months ago.

Dr. A. T. Pierson has returned to this country, having completed his engagement at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, where he so ably filled the post vacated by the death of Pastor C. H. Spurgeon. Dr. Pierson was urged to remain in London to become minister of Westminster Chapel, and take up the "Forward Movement."

A statue to John Knox is about to be erected in Edinburgh, in the old High street, with its junction with Lawmarket. The only memorials to the great reformer at present in the city are the house in which he lived and the metal plate with his initials in the roadway behind St. Giles' Cathedral, which marks the supposed place of his burial.

The Russian Stundists who were banished some months ago to the Trans-Caucasian district complain bitterly of their condition. They cannot earn a living where they are, as they are chiefly farmers and the land is poor. Many of them have joined in a petition asking the Czar to send them to Siberia where they would at least have food.

A correspondent at Tallapoosa, Ga., writes us that much good has resulted in that town from three weeks' Gospel Services, which have been held in a tent there by Mr. Herland Glen McWilliams. Many persons have been brought to conviction and are earnestly seeking Christ, and more than twenty have made public profession of faith.

Dr. Barnardo, whose institutions for the shelter and education of homeless children have been described in this journal is rivalling Mr. Geo. Muller in the extent of the support supplied to him by the Christian public. His mail on one day about three months ago comprised 1,413 separate letters enclosing in the aggregate nearly $10,000. On another day more recently he received 1,651 letters, the remittances in which amounted to $12,500. The cost of the food alone used in his institutions is $750 a day.

New contributions received last week for the support of Rev. Geo. W. Sharp, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday School Missionary in the Southwest for the coming year, are as follows: A friend, Chambersburg, Pa., $1; M. T. Gunderson, Kenyon, Minn., $10; Sarah A. THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

MARAH---THE WELL OF BITTERNESS.

Sermon preached before the Tremont Temple Church, now meeting in Music Hall, Boston, last Sunday evening, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D. Text: "And when they came to Marah, they could not drink of the waters of Marah, for they were bitter: therefore the name of it was called Marah, etc." Exodus 15: 23-26.

THE joy of the children of Israel, as they stood on the shore of the Red Sea recognizing their deliverance from Egypt and the destruction of their foes, was unspeakably great. Their minds were filled with grateful and reverential fear. Their souls were under the influence of a perfect delirium of joy, and that tumultuous joy finds expression in the triumphal ode of Moses. It was a song so lofty that the roll of the sea and the thunder of the sky would have been its fit accompaniment. Dr. Murphy calls attention to the fact that nations do not need a high degree of culture in order to express in measured flow of winged words their joyful thanksgiving. All primitive tribes, whether among the Hebrews or Greeks, or in the Highlands of Scotland, have showed great skill in chanting strains of emotion in simple measure but with poetic beauty and patriotic fervor. Primitive peoples have as instruments of music at least the harp and the pipe; and these instruments pre-suppose modulations of the human voice, which after all is the most wonderful of all instruments. The artless poetry of many primitive peoples has made their names immortal. Music is evermore the handmaid of Patriotism and Piety.

We do not wonder that the sublime miracle God had wrought should call forth from Moses a sublime song. This is one of the oldest and one of the noblest of triumphal odes of which we have any knowledge. It does not lose its honors even when compared with the epics of Milton, or with any of the grandest poems of our more modern singers. It burst in beauty and grandeur from the soul of Moses under the inspiration of the Almighty. Moses sang loftily without any consciousness of poetic genius,and without any thought of immortality. No poet of our day could suggest changes in thoughts or words which would add to the beauty of this magnificent ode. Moses asks no favors from the literary critics even when compared with Isaiah, with Tennyson, with Longfellow or with Browning. He stands in triumph on his own lofty peak of Parnassus. This song rises and falls like the sea in its grandest movements. A wonderful moment was that on the shore of the Red Sea. The refrain was led by Miriam, the leader of the choir of the women. We may well suppose that it was uttered first by a single voice, then all took it up until the song rolled over the mighty host in its divine sublimity. Miriam was well known for her skill in speaking to God for men and to men for God. With timbrel and dance she led the way and the other women followed. We know that women danced in groups by themselves and the men by themselves. This was

A Sacred Dance.

A dance was almost always a part of ancient religious services. Geikie tells us that even [illegible] women of Egypt greet the rising Nile with sacred dances, and that the Indians of the East employed sacred dances as a part of their worship; so did the Romans. The Greek Church still, in connection with its Easter services, retains traces of this ancient sacred dance. The dancing dervishes of Turkey and Central Asia are well-known. Dancing is closely akin to singing; indeed, it is but the extension of the thought of beating time as now practised among ourselves. The Hebrew word for a religious festival really means a [illegible] three days' journey into the wilderness.

The song of Moses inspired the genius of later poets. Indeed it is carried over into the Book of Revelation, and those who stand on the sea of glass mingled with fire harping with their harps are represented as singing the song of Moses and the Lamb. We have in this song a fine example of noble words wedded to lofty music. We ought to make more of musical instruments in modern religious services. The drum and fife and the trumpet and cornet ought oftener to have their place in our solemn services. We should consecrate to God all instruments of music. We have been too timid in the introduction of the timbrel and flute and other instruments of music. Perhaps the Salvation Army may give us valuable suggestions at this point. We have made our services too cold, too prosaic, too dead. From this joyous company chanting their triumphant song on the shores of the Red Sea we may learn useful lessons in the religious work of our own day. No doubt as the waves broke upon the shore bearing with them horses and horsemen, destroyed in the Red Sea by the power of God, the refrain would break out still more clearly, "Sing ye to the Lord; for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea."

Hardships.

In the first place we may notice these hardships as they begin their journey. They may not linger too long upon the shore with its oasis of greenness and its triumphant music. They must begin their journey; they must abandon for the moment their joyful mood and leave the flowing springs, the palms, the acacias and the tamarisks. The journey must be renewed. We must not linger long over triumphs or defeats. The disciples could not build tabernacles on the Mount of Transfiguration, because down in the valley were a poor boy and a broken-hearted father who needed help; so the children of Israel must leave the sea shore and begin their march into the wilderness. They must leave the wells of Moses and tread a rough pathway under a scorching sun. As they begin their journey they experience unexpected hardships. The distance from the wells of Moses to Marah is supposed to be about forty miles.

Their route lay along the Gulf of Suez over a desert region, gravelly and stony by turns. For a time they would see the blue waters of the gulf on their right hand, and on their left a mountain chain stretching before them as they advanced. After traveling a few miles they would enter an extensive desert plain,and now they would march under glowing skies without a cloud and over a desert road hot and hard to the feet. Nothing would meet their gaze except perhaps a raven,a beetle or some other dweller in those lonely regions. Soon high sand hills near the coast would shut out the view of the sea. Theirs was of a new national life. Travelers tell us that at dawn the atmosphere is mild and balmy, but soon after sunrise the fierce heat makes traveling almost impossible, and at noon the eyes become blind, the skin blisters and the mouth parches under the scorching sun. The air reflected from the barren hills comes to the face like a blast from a heated furnace. In such circumstances the want of water is bitterly felt, and the people begin to murmur. It is easy for us to rebuke their murmurs, and we may become sarcastic when we contrast the sudden change which had taken place. Their singing on the shore is soon changed to their sighing in the wilderness. As Dr. Hamilton expresses the thought, the Red Sea minstrels have become the wilderness murmurers and mutineers. Finely Mendelssohn in the opening passages of his "Elijah," represented the despair of a whole people perishing from thirst. Their anguish expresses itself at first in solemn, restless murmurs,then it gathers terrible power, and finally it bursts forth in heart-rending cries of agony. We must, however, be considerate of the people as we remember their difficulties and sufferings. Travelers who pass over the same country to-day fully appreciate the sufferings of the hosts of Israel. These Israelites were not accustomed to this kind of self-discipline. They were indeed accustomed to hardships in Egypt; for Egypt was governed then, and is to some degree now, by the lash. Then it was not uncommon for masters even to break the bones of their slaves, but the children of Israel never were trained in self-discipline. They had not the opportunity of developing self-reliance, nor of cultivating individualism. They came out of Egypt as a mass, and crossed the Red Sea in a rush, and so did not develop their individual character.

A Disappointment.

Let us notice, in the second place, their great disappointment. It is now near the close of the third day of their weary march, and off in the distance they descry the rough outline of a lofty peak of mountains. That rugged mountain suggests cool glens and rippling waters; and but for that sight they might have been utterly discouraged. It cheers them on; and forward goes that mighty, weary, panting host. Nearer and still nearer do they approach this mountain range; the outlines become more definite; and the people see the dark verdure which indicates the presence of tamarisk and palm and water. Hope almost becomes fruition for they well know that water must be near, and onward under the inspiration of this assurance they march. They have traveled about forty miles from the shore of the Red Sea. That distance was much greater in that day than in our day,as now an ambitious traveler can cover the distance in a day and a half, or in two days at most. The evening of the third day is approaching. Let us glance a moment at the spot which now is reached. Here indeed are wells. Travelers tell us that there are seven of these wells. One of them is found in a basin ten feet broad and six feet deep; and in that basin there is water to the depth of three feet. It may have been so then. Oh, how their eyes dance with joy as they approach! How the laggards that have fallen into the rear begin to quicken their steps! The faces of all are lighted with gladness. On they press. Their weary limbs have new vigor as their hearts beat high with hope. Watch them as they hasten their journey. Doubtless they were again ready to take up the song which they had so gladly chanted on the shore of the Red Sea and say, "Sing unto the Lord for he hath triumphed gloriously." See them as they hasten to the sparkling waters. Now but as they touch it they find it is bitter to the taste, it is poison to the throat; it is perhaps death to the body! Oh, Marah—bitterness! To the children of Israel especially was this bitterness dreadful. They had been accustomed to the sweet waters of the Nile; and we are told that those who for a long time have been accustomed to that water regret nothing so much as its absence when they travel to distant countries. No people in Oriental countries so suffer from the want of good water as do the present natives of Egypt. It is said that even the camels will not drink the waters of Marah except they are especially thirsty. Man has as have no other creatures the power of adaptation to circumstances. He can live in frigid or torrid zones, and he knows how to dress according to his surroundings. He has elasticity and faculty of adaptation,but he never can entirely overcome the sad effects of disappointment. Disappointment finds him ungirded for its presence and power. Disappointment struck home to the hearts of the distressed people on this occasion. They had just put the cup to their lips; mothers had been cheering their children for miles on that weary march with the hope of refreshing water, and now neither mothers nor babes can touch the waters of Marah. Theirs was a deadly disappointment. The word Marah has passed into all languages where the Bible is known as the symbol of bitterness and disappointment. After all the experience of the Israelites is but a symbol of our experience today. The world is full of wells of Marah. In every sphere in life disappointments and bitternesses are sure to come. God has his wise purposes in all these experiences. When our hearts turn rightly to God our wells of bitterness may be change into fountains of gladness.

They Stoop to Drink

Observe, in the third place,

experienced by the children of Israel. We are told that they murmured. Did you ever think of the composition of the word murmur? It is simply mur, mur, mur, representing in the form of the word the sound expressive of discontent. There is no reason why this word should stop with two murs; it might go on indefinitely multiplying syllables. Doubtless it often did so prolong itself. The word was coined from the sound made by persons in disagreeable moods. The people were especially unreasonable in murmuring against Moses. What had Moses done? Did he have a private well from which he might drink? Was he not subject to the inconveniences which they suffered? How was he to blame? Was he God that he could open wells for them in the wilderness? He might have spoken to them in great bitterness. He might have thundered against them for their ingratitude and stupidity. He needed great patience. They whimpered like disappointed children. They forgot the great services of their heroic leader; and they showed how unstable human creatures can be. Their present distress made them forget their former hallelujahs. An unpalatable beverage made them forget the glorious triumphs at the Red Sea.

Moses here sets us an example which we may well follow. The people murmured against him, but he cried unto the Lord. They murmured: he prayed. It is a wonderful blessing when men in high stations can bring their own burdens and those of others to God. The people rolled their burden upon Moses; he cast all his burdens upon God. One in authority, as was Moses, possessing this spirit, can than human leadership. Blessed are you as teachers, pastors, parents, when you can look to God for guidance in every critical experience! I thank God and I thank Moses for this blessed example. He prayed. What then? "The Lord showed him a tree,which, when he had cast into the waters, the waters were made sweet." Many questions suggest themselves at this point. Was this result produced by some inherent properties in the tree? Was the selection of this tree arbitrary, or was it miraculous? Except we admit that there was some efficacy in the tree itself it is difficult to understand why this particular tree was pointed out to Moses. We know that there are trees and plants which possess properties of this sort. The discoverers of Florida found that sassafras thrown into stagnant waters would greatly improve their quality. It is said that the first use of tea on the part of the Chinese was to improve the waters in their ponds and rivers. We know that in South America there is a shrub called alumbre which posseses curative properties of this general character. It would be easy to give other and similar instances in other countries. We know also that chemical examinations prove that the bitterness of these waters is caused by the presence of sulphate of lime, and that any vegetable substance containing oxalic acid thrown into the waters will precipitate the lime and render the waters comparatively wholesome; but if the result was secured simply by the inherent qualities of the tree it is strange that after the lapse of all these years the Arabs in the vicinity are unacquainted with a tree possessing such qualities. Granting that there was some inherently in the tree, we must still believe that the miraculous power of God was shown in guiding Moses to its selection, and in giving it additional efficacy when thrown into the water. In addition to the healing of the water God gave the people a statute and revealed himself to them by a new name.

There are a few lessons which we can learn from this interesting narrative. First, the way to our Canaan is not free from trial. Those trials came upon the children of Israel while in the way of duty. Had they wandered out of the right path we could more readily understand why they suffered afflictions. This law of life is illustrated in our own experience. We have to march through an enemy's country. Often our pathway is rough and our burdens are heavy. God in this way develops character. Virtue would be impossible if vice were not real. God puts the metal of true manhood into us by giving us fierce trials in our Christian experience. Only thus can we develop our spiritual sinews and muscles. When trial is sanctified our crosses will be as precious as our crowns. The grandest lives are those that had their baptism of sorrow. Second, the true resort in disappointment and sorrow is prayer to God. Great triumphs are often followed by equally great trials; but when trials drive us to the feet of Jesus Christ they increase our strength and ennoble our lives. Disappointments develop character. We may thank God for the prick of truth that drives us to the heart of God. Third, God always has a cure near at hand. Perhaps there is in the natural world. Even poisonous plants are near curative plants. Earth has no sorrow which heaven cannot heal. There is a tree now which can cure the world's bitterest woes. The Cross of the Lord Jesus thrown into the Marah of sin will make its waters pure and healing to the soul. On that tree the Christ of God died for the world's redemption. Lastly, we learn from this incident that obedience is the only proof of true discipleship. When God revealed himself as the healer he placed a new obligation upon the people. With the refreshing water there was a new outburst of praise and a new vow of obedience. Jehovah is the true healer for soul and body. He who destroyed the Egyptians by disease comes to Israel with the blessing of healing. Come, then, to Christ that he may sweeten the fountain of disappointment, the fountain of sin, the fountain of sorrow. He alone can soothe the heart, purify the soul, and ennoble the life. Come to him and you shall find every Marah in life transformed into waters of delicious sweetness.

DISPUTES ENDED.

An evangelist relates that during a visit to a dangerous part of the coast he one day passed a life-saving station. He stayed a minute or two to look at it from the outside where he could see the breeches-buoy, the rocket apparatus and everything in readiness to go to the rescue of any perishing mariner whose cry might reach the ear of the brave men. He thought how like this place was in its object and purposes to the church and wished that every church was as well prepared and as thoroughly on the alert as the crew must be. A storm was coming up and he stepped inside for a moment to shelter. To his surprise, he heard from an inner room the sound of high and angry voices. Evidently a serious quarrel was in progress. The noise grew louder, and from the words that he heard he learned that the question at issue was whether a button on one of the coats was sewn on in the wrong place. It seemed a trivial matter, but the men were so much excited about it that from words they came to blows. In the midst of the scuffle, a low booming sound was heard. Instantly the struggling ceased and there was deathlike silence. Every man was listening. Soon the solemn note came again and was recognized as the minute gun of some ship in distress. Without a moment's delay the men who, a minute before had been struggling and fighting, were helping each other with the boat and the life-saving apparatus. "Ah!" said the visitor, "so it will be with the church, when it realizes its duty. The theologians will stop quarrelling about dogma and get to work saving souls."

A GAMBLER'S LUCK.

Much has been said and written about the luck of gamblers but if all the truth were told the stories would be monotonous in the kind of luck they have. It is the men who entertain them and provide the facilities who have all the luck. The following is one case in point which occurred recently at Monte Carlo. A young Russian nobleman was seen at the tables playing desperately. At first the tide was against him and he lost heavily; but after a while it turned, and he began to win. People watched him, and wondered upon what he based his calculations, but he laughed and said that it was pure chance. He wished, he said, to win $20,000 to free an estate from a mortgage, and to make his old mother happy and comfortable for life. Such a wish was excellent, but to attempt it by gambling was bad. However, the young Russian went forward; and on the last day of the year, amid the breathless excitement of the dense crowd, he carried off the whole sum. "A happy and a successful man," many a one would say. Now, what should he do? The money was safe in his pocket. Should he keep watch and ward all night, and go straight home to help his mother? Reason and judgment said "Yes." The next day came, and with it a wild temptation to go down to the Casino, and to increase—perhaps double—his money at the roulette table. He was in a run of luck, and why shouldn't it run on? He went down. In about half-an-hour he had lost his all, and in desperation he took his own life.

AN ELDER'S DREAM.

An old church record in Scotland states that an elder disputed angrily at a church meeting until he had broken his minister's heart. During the night he had a dream which deeply impressed him. Next morning his wife said to him, "Ye look very sad, Jan; what is the matter wi' yei?" He replied, "And well I am, for I have had a dream that I had hard words with our minister, and he went home and died, and soon after I died, too, and I dreamed that I went up to heaven, and when I got to the gate out came the minister, and he put out his hands to welcome me, saying, 'Come along Jan, there's nae strife up here; I'm sae glad to see ye!'" So the elder hastened to the minister's house to ask his pardon, but found, in very truth, that he was dead. The fact so affected him that within a fortnight he followed his pastor to the skies. Let us hope that the rest of the dream proved true likewise.

dark-ness thy path-way will be; Turn from thy roam-ing, lieve Him, and thou shalt be free; Won-der-ful mer-cy, full of com-pass-ion, Lo! the Good Shep-herd is call-ing to thee.
fly from its dangers, While the Good Shep-herd is call-ing to thee.
boundless com-pass-ion, Still the Good Shep-herd is call-ing to thee.

Call-ing to thee, call-ing to thee; Je-sus is call-ing, "Come unto Me," Call-ing to thee, call-ing to thee, Hear the Good Shepherd calling to thee.

MY PRAYER

In thy secret place most holy
Let me hide:
Let me bring to thee my troubles,
And confide.

Turn me not away, Oh Father,
In distress,
I have sought thy secret presence,
Now, oh bless.

If I wander from the pathway—
Lose my track;
Draw me with thy chords of mercy,
Draw me back!

And when life's o'er, may I triumph
In thy love;
Then receive me in that glorious
Home above.

There to join the mighty chorus
Of the blest;
Who, once burdened down with trials,
Now find rest.—Ernest W. Ide

A KINDLY DEED.

A kindly deed
Is a little seed,
That groweth all unseen;
And lo, when none
Do look thereon,
Anew it springeth green!

A friendly look
Is a better book
For precept, than you'll find
'Mong the sages wise,
Or the libraries
With their priceless wealth of mind.

The little dole
Of a humble soul,
In all sincereness given,
Is like the wings
Of the lark, as it springs,
Singing clear to the gates of heaven.

The Seventieth Week.

The Events of the Last of the Seventy Seven-Year Periods of Daniel's Vision.

BY REV. A. J. STEED.*

In a previous article [published in this journal on July 5] I showed that the events of the seventieth of the seven-year periods described to Daniel by the angel (Dan. 9: 24-27) have never taken place; from which we conclude that the seventieth period is still to be fulfilled. The 25th verse brings us down to the 69th week. After the 69th week, the Jews crucify Christ. They are then punished for their wickedness. The Romans come upon them under Titus. They massacre thousands of them, and destroy their city and sanctuary. These Jews then become a scattered people. They cease to exist as a nation. And so the stream of time, in the whole period of the seventy weeks ceases to run. The stream is cut off. A gap follows. And we are living in the gap now. The stream of the period of the seventy years, which is determined upon the Jews and upon their city is still at a standstill. It has yet one more period of seven years to go; and then the seventy weeks will be up.

And now we come to the final seven years in the period of seventy weeks. And what is the history of those seven final years. The words of Scripture are, "And he shall confirm a covenant with many for a week, and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and for the spread of abomination, he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolator." During the final seven years, then, the following events are to occur:

(a) A covenant is to be made with the Jews.

(b) That covenant is to be broken in the midst of the seven years.

(c) The covenant-maker and the covenant-breaker is then to spread abominations in the city of Jerusalem.

(d) And this spreading of abomination is to continue to the end (3 1-2 years) when that determined shall be poured upon the desolator. Now all this refers to Antichrist—the prince, whose future and certain coming is spoken of in the 26th verse.

Now what had Daniel seen in the vision recorded in the 8th chapter. He had seen a little horn arise in the midst of four horns. This horn waxed great; and it magnified itself even to Christ; took away the daily sacrifice; and trampled truth to the ground. What was the interpretation which Gabriel gave to Daniel of this strange vision? He told him that that horn represented the rising of a king of a fierce countenance; that that king would destroy many; that he would act most wickedly; and that, at last, he would be destroyed without hands, i. e. destroyed by Christ without human agency.

Now surely it is impossible to read the details of the vision, respecting the little horn, and Gabriel's interpretation of those details, side by side with what is written in this 27th verse, without at once seeing that the one who is spoken of in the 27th verse is and must be identical with the wicked one seen in the vision. Yes, this 27th verse is about the Antichrist. The one referred to in this 27th verse is the one spoken of in the 8th chapter of Daniel, who is said to be a king of fierce countenance, and to trample truth to the ground, and to take away the daily sacrifice, and, at last, to be destroyed without hands.

Now, the question is, when do we expect these final seven years to begin? Why, we expect them to begin very, very shortly. The Jews are fast going back to their own land, Palestine. The Exodus of the Jews from different parts of the earth, to Palestine, is something most remarkable. And this return of the Jews must lead to the establishment of their national existence, which event is to mark the last days of this Age. But in addition to the return of the Jews, Scriptural computations based upon different lines, are being made in the present day, and all converge around one point, and that is, that these seven years are close upon us. All students of prophecy concur in believing that, during the next few years, we shall see many wonderful changes and events taking place, in fulfilment of all prophecy, which has to do with the last days of this Age. And who is not glad thereof? Surely as we think of the glories of the Millennium, and hear the voice of the King saying: "Behold, I come quickly," we cannot refrain from raising our voices in one great and prolonged shout: "Even so, Lord Jesus, Come!"

SUFFERING FOR CHRIST.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Aug. 13. Acts 21: 30-36; Phil 1: 29

SINCE religion has become fashionable, suffering for Christ, in the form it assumed in the early days of Christianity, has not been common. But it would be a mistake to conclude that the Christian is relieved of the duty of cross-bearing. It is still true that they who would live godly in the world must suffer persecution. Many a Christian workingman in his shop, many a soldier in a barrack-room, many a boy in boarding-school, many a Christian woman with an unbelieving husband could tell stories of bitter persecution, still. The offence of the cross has not ceased. It is true that not all suffer who bear the name of Christians. Some escape because their religion goes no deeper than the name. A man may lead a good moral life and attend church regularly without incurring hostility; but he cannot escape it if he attempts to put in practice the teaching of Christ, such as we have in the Sermon on the Mount. Obloquy, scorn, contempt and the charge of fanaticism will surely be the result of such an attempt. The man who is "righteous overmuch" is not esteemed in our day any more highly than he was in the day of Solomon. There are many business men still who complain that it would be very expensive to keep a conscience. They would suffer in pocket by doing so. They would suffer in reputation too as smart business men. If a man were to declare that he would not defend a lawsuit because Christ had commanded that if a man is sued at law and loses his coat he shall not resist even if he lose his cloak also, what would be said of him? In the matter of relieving the poor, Christ would have his follower give so liberally that he should not keep two coats, if he knew of a brother who was without one. If a Christian man in our day gave to that extent he would suffer not only in estate but in reputation for he would be regarded as insane. Even the clergyman who dares preach against a sin in which one of his leading pew-holders indulges, is considered lacking in prudence. But this age is not destitute of Christian heroism. There are still many who are willing to sacrifice anything and everything for Christ The wealthy and cultured men and women who have gone to live in the slums that they may help the poor; and the thousands of missionaries who have gone to Africa and China and Turkey, taking their lives in their hands, are conspicuous examples. Of all such, and many others of whom the world hears nothing, but who are living and suffering for Christ, the promise still holds good that they who suffer with him shall reign with him.

ECHOES OF CLEVELAND CONFERENCE

Among the noteworthy utterances at the great Epworth League Conference were the following: Bishop Fitzgerald reminded the Conference that the League was born in Cleveland, and that it was there that Helman, its originator and its earliest friends and supporters live. The question had been asked, "Why not have a League that is not peculiar to Methodism?" The answer was that the Methodist Church has things it wants to set forth which cannot be set forth unless in a body in which all agree. There are many points in which Methodists do not agree with others, and there are other points upon which Methodists desire to lay special emphasis. The Bishop thought that the answer fully justified the existence of the League as an organization separate and distinct from an inter-denominational Society. — Dr. W. H. Withrow said that there were more than one thousand Chapters in Canada although the church membership was only one-tenth that of the church in the United States. The Canadian organ of the League had a circulation relatively much greater than the Epworth Herald. The solidarity of young Methodism throughout the continent was a most hopeful sign of future greatness. They must not suppose that religious union meant future political union. As the Doctor once told General Grant, Canada was much too democratic to be satisfied with the constitution of the United States. When Canada wished to change its policy or its political leaders, it did so promptly and did not have to wait for the end of a four-years' term to do so.—Bishop Ninde said: "The Epworth League hss been criticised because it is a Methodist institution. The criticism is not kind or just. Methodists believe that they can best serve the common cause by training their young people in their own way and along their own lines. No wise man will deny the right of Methodism to thus train her young people. The division of the body of believers into denominations is not an unmixed evil. There is a certain picturesqueness in denominationalism."—On the motion of Bishop Fitzgerald, the following resolution was adopted by the conference: Resolved, That we have heard with great satisfaction of the action of the Epworth League cabinet of the Methodist Episcopal Church in ordering its exhibits removed from the grounds of the Columbian Exposition, and we heartily congratulate world-wide Methodism upon this wise and consistent action.

A NEW RAILROAD Y. M. C. A.

On this page is a picture of the new building now in course of erection in Philadelphia for the Pennsylvania Railroad Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association. Its corner-stone was laid a few weeks ago by President George B. Roberts of the Pennsylvania Railroad, and the building is making rapid progress. It is being constructed of gray stone, tiled brick trimmings, and will have a frontage of 115 feet on Westminster Avenue and 70 feet on Forty-first Street. On the ground floor will be a gymnasium, with baths, a running track and a hand-ball court. The first floor will contain a large reception room, reading and smoking rooms and library. The entertainment hall will be provided with 825 seats, and on the second floor will also be a lecture-room, parlor, kitchen and class rooms.

The Association has been in existence seven years. It started with only five members but has now over two hundred, a large proportion of whom are now on the active list. President Roberts in his address at the ceremony of laying the stone bore testimony to the excellent results of the Association's work among the employees of the road, in which he was supported by Mr. J. O A. Herring of the Adams Express Company. The latter made a lengthy speech in which he dwelt on the mutual advantages of the Association to employers and employees in introducing and fostering relations outside the purely business relation, which drew them together and encouraged reciprocal kindnesses. State Secretary Hurlburd and International Secretary R. C. Morse responded to the cordial speeches of the railroad officials and expressed their gratification at the excellent arrangements for the new building.

THE B. Y. P. U. CONVENTION

An immense gathering filled the great Tomlinson Hall at Indianapolis, at the opening of the third Convention of the Baptist Young People's Union. President Chapman was in his place and gave the delegates hearty greeting. He congratulated the Convention upon the rapidity and magnitude of the Union's growth during the two years of its existence. There had been no time when, notwithstanding the difficulties they had met, they had cause to doubt God's hand in the work they had been seeking to do. The report of the Board of Managers which was read by the General Secretary, Dr. F. L. Wilkins, showed that the Union is steadily growing. One new Provincial Union and six new State Unions have been organized during the year. There were still, however, 26,000 Baptist churches which had not organized Unions. Much missionary work had been done, and the President, busy business man as he is, had travelled no less than seventeen thousand miles during the year in his efforts to extend the organization. The three and a half million Baptists in the country were surely awaking to the value of the Union and next year would witness a larger advance than any previous year. Reciting at length the formal endorsement of the Baptist Young People's Union at Denver and Nashville, Dr. Wilkins reminded the Convention that it was pledged to buttress the work of each of the great Baptist missionary societies, and to make more effective along all lines the work of the individual church. Educationally, the Union had endeavored to carry out the plans outlined at the last Convention, and had been efficiently aided by Professor Ira M. Price, Dr. David Spencer, of Racine, Wis., and the Rev. O. C. S. Wallace. At the examination held in May last, 347 successful papers had been presented, and three prize banners would be presented to the State or Provincial Unions whose total local records represented the highest standing in the three courses of study pursued during the year, viz.: Bible reading, study in the life of Christ, and conquest meeting observance. As to the future courses of study, Dr. Wilkins said: "So great has been the encouragement received, that larger things will be attempted in the future under the general designation of 'Christian Culture Courses,' popularly known as 'the three C's.' These courses will complete the reading of the historical books of the Bible under the direction (as heretofore) of Professor Price and Dr. Spencer. The conquest missionary course will complete the popular themes already announced, in January, 1894, and will be under the direction of Mrs. Sophia Bronson Titterington, the well-known authoress. The sacred literature course will be in the care of Mr. Henry C. Vedder, and will be under the title of 'The Dawn of Christianity, or Studies in the Apostolic Church.' Besides these the pastor's lecture course, which was largely adopted during the past year, it is hoped to carry out more extensively in the year to come. The best results of the year, however, remain to be mentioned under the last designation of Enlistment. At Detroit the prayer had been that the members of the Union might be harvesters in the kingdom of the Lord. We pledged to him and to each other that we would each try to win one soul during the year. In consequence hundreds of churches have been stirred with revival influences, conversions, and baptisms have followed, and hosts of our associate members have been persuaded to confess Christ as their Saviour. Much valuable work has also been done in asylums and jails, in the homes of the poor, and in mission Sunday Schools."

The Prize Banners to which the Secretary referred were presented to the following unions: To the union of the Maritime Provinces for excellence of record in the study of the life of Christ This will ultimately be given to the Young People's Society of the church at Amherst, Nova Scotia. The second banner won by the society of the Waterman church, Illinois, was for excellence of record in the "conquest meeting" observance. The third banner, for excellence of record in daily Bible reading, was conferred upon the society at Brookings, S. Dak.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, John H. Chapman of Illinois; Vice-Presidents (in the order named), Frank H. Field of New York, Rev. George B. Eager of Alabama and A. A. Ayer of Toronto; Recording Secretary, A. M. Brinckle of Pennsylvania; Treasurer, J. O. Staples of Illinois. Vacancies on the Board of Managers were filled by the election of A. E. Baten Texas; Thos. Urquhart, Ontario; George Anderson, Mississippi; C. H. Holden, North Dakota; President Sutherland, Nebraska; D. B. Oviatt, Wyoming; W. S. Pennick, Louisiana; W. S. Roberts, Vermont; G. B. Taylor, Georgia; E. W. White, Wisconsin, S. E. Price, Minnesota.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

At Frankfort, Ind., the Presbyterian Christian Endeavor Society has established a flourishing missionary library. These workers have also been holding regular Sunday afternoon and occasional week-day services in the part of the city where few, if any, of the people attend church. The results have been most encouraging.

An enthusastic convention of the Baptist Young People's Unions of the State of Washington was held recently in the First Church, Tacoma, Wash. It was conducted by Rev. C. C. Marston, missionary evangelist of the Northwest Convention. There was a large attendance and the reports indicated rapid growth and general appreciation of the benefits of union.

A Baptist Young People's Union has just been organized in the Main St. Church in St. John, N. B. It starts with a large membership composed almost entirely of active members. The Secretary says "We believe that our Society will be the means of uniting us in Christian work, and of quickening the spiritual life of the whole church. We have organized for work."

The Young People's Societies of the Illinois Swedish Baptist Conference held a meeting recently to organize a State Union. This was the first meeting of the kind in this country, and it speaks much for the rapid growth and the practicable phases of the B. Y. P. U. movement.

The St. Louis Young Men's Christian Association has purchased the northeast corner of Grand and Franklin avenues as the site of its new central building. The lot is 103 by 172 feet in size and cost $51,250. The location is a most imposing one. The new building will face the entrance of Vandeventer Pl.

On one Sunday recently the members of the Junior Christian Endeavor Society of the South End Tabernacle, Boston, carried out to the hospitals nearly one hundred bunches of violets, each bearing its precious verse of comfort.

A number of members of the Young Men's Christian Association of London recently organized a walking tour in the Highlands of Scotland. The tour has been very successful. The party had a large evangelistic meeting at Kingussie, which it is believed will result in the formation of a Y.M.C.A. at that place.

BUT A DAY.

We should fill the hours with the sweetest things
If we had but a day;
We should drink alone at the purest springs
On our upward way;
We should love with a life-time's love in an hour
If the hours were few;
We should rest, not for dreams, but for fresher power
To be and to do.

We should waste no moments in weak regret
If the day were but one;
If what we remember and what we forget
Went out with the sun,
We should be from our clamorous selves set free
To work or to pray,
And to be what the Father would have us be,
If we had but a day.

Workers in Jerusalem.

Some of the Industries that are Carried on there—The Cotton Carders and their Manner of Living.

JERUSALEM cannot, in the strict modern sense, be called a manufacturing or commercial city, yet there are many thriving industries conducted among its people. In ancient times, when the Holy City was indeed "the glory of the whole earth," the tradesmen of Jerusalem were at the very head of their different handicrafts. Goldsmiths and silversmiths plied their delicate arts in open booths or lightly enclosed shops; coppersmiths beat out trays, basins and pitchers of renowned patterns, armorers fashioned swords and spear-heads for the nations round about; brass-founders, and the makers of household and artistic implements; builders, the dealres in gems and all sorts of precious stones, the carvers of wood, ivory and ebony, and the stone-cutters, masons, carpenters, brick-makers, potters, tanners, tailors, bakers and tent-makers all combined to make the capital city of David and Solomon a bustling, active metropolis.

Not the least important of the industries that still remain to Jerusalem are those of the weaver and spinner. In the manufactures of cloth and fine linen, the East has never been excelled. The Bible tells us that in the days of Amos, rich men lay on couches of damask. The Tyrian bride of the King of Israel had garments that were inwrought with threads of gold. Curtains and tapestries were inwoven with the richest of figured and floral designs. Damascus still retains something of its oldtime supremacy in this respect, but Jerusalem holds but the shadow of its ancient pre-eminence.

The illustration on this page shows a group of cotton carders at work in the court of a building in Jerusalem. The cotton carders are chiefly Jews who, if not in possession of a small store or workshop, go about from house to house where they get more or less work to do. Their usual charge is from ten to fifteen cents for six pounds of cotton, the employers also supplying the worker with food meanwhile. The latter is usually very plain, consisting of bread and a dish of olives. These carders are also usually skilled upholsterers. When called to the villages round about, where money is scarce, they are paid in chickens, eggs, dried figs or raisins. Each carder has an overdress made of cotton, long and wide enough to wrap the whole body, which, with light undergarments, a fez and shoes, constitute the entire costume.

An instrument for carding (such as that shown in the picture), costs very little and can be used for years. It is a piece of wood in the form of a bow, to which a string is attached, which is beaten by a mallet till the the quantity of cotton or wool is carded. The carders are called in Palestine "Faddafeen," and their instrument "Kos." During the cold weather they stay in town and in summer travel about in search of work among the peasants and farmers.

Home the School of Manners.

The only way to make the world a better place to live in, is for each individual to make himself a better person to live with. How to live with others is therefore the great question for every human being. The most trying place in which to start is the home, the family itself; and yet the home is the great school of manners and for the education of the heart. The very certainty of responsive family affection may easily develop disregard for the restraints and requirements of the wholesome rule. It is using a dangerous license that because this affection is natural, and is tolerant, forgiving and charitable, it can not be abused, and that a carelessness in the treatment of others which would be intolerant and impossible elsewhere is permissible and defensible in the family circle. If in the narrow relations of the family, of marriage and fraternity, people scrupulously and sensitively regard each other, they will acquire a habit which will enable them to live with all other people, however and wherever they encounter them.

The Flowers and the Children.

How the little folks revel amid the flowery fields at this delightful season! Let a child loose in a clover patch or in a wild flower bank and it will spend hours and hours in innocent enjoyment and sweet prattle; communing with the buttercups, the daisies, the pinks and the roving honeysuckle that twines in and out among the hedges. All the poets are singing of flowers just now, and it seems as though they sung specially for the children. Mary N. Prescott prettily says:

If the buttercups could sing,
What a pretty ting-a-ling
We should hear in summer time.
Could the daisies pipe a strain
It would be like falling rain—
Just a silvery chime.

James Whitcomb Riley who lives among the flowers all the year round, has this:

I never set foot on a clover field now,
Or stroll round the stable, or climb in the mow,
But my childhood comes back just as clear and as plain
As the smell of the clover I'm sniffin' again:
And I wander away in a bare footed dream,
Where I tangle my toes in the blossoms that gleam
With the dew of the dawn of the morning of love.
Ere it wept o'er the graves that I'm weeping above.

And another writer sings of the clover, too:

It's queer that one clover blossom
Is white, and another red,
When the same black earth surrounds them,
The same rain waters their bed.
It's queer that of all those wonders
We take so little heed,
And that as for feeling thankful,
We seldom see the need.

One Girl's Cinderella Coach.

A ranch-owner in Goleta, Santa Barbara Co., Cal., had growing upon his place some enormous squashes, one of which was so large that he had it hollowed out to make, as he said, a Cinderella coach for his little girl. He was expecting a visit from an eastern friend, and after the guest came, accompanied by his little girl, was showing him over the ranch. Giving his daughter a sly look, which she understood, she slipped away and ran and got into the squash. As he was going over the field he said to his friend, "You may not believe it, but sometimes we have little girls in our squashes, and I shouldn't wonder if there is one in this one." So saying, he tapped the squash, the side fell apart and out from the middle sprang his little girl. It is said the eastern gentleman was so astonished that his face turned white! Probably it was white before; but the rest of the story is true. This squash was over three feet in length and weighed two hundred and fifty pounds.

A CLERICAL FARMER

THE average taste developes a more or less bucolic strain in the summer season when the meadows smell of new hay and the hedge-rows are all abloom. Every year a certain class of people are smitten with the farming craze. Rev. Dr. Talmage thus relates a typical experience:

"Clerical farming does pay. Notwithstanding a weasel invaded the poultry-yard, and here and there a chicken died of the 'gaps,' and one of the frosts saved us a great deal of trouble picking peaches, and one day, in the process of making butter, 'soda-ash' was taken for salt, and the caterpillars of our neighborhood were very fond of celery, and the drinking of milk without any chalk at first made us all sick—the shock too sudden for the constitution—still we feel that we made our fortune last summer. With a long-handled hoe we turned up more than our neigbors dreamt of. Our first cow has furnished the cream of a good many jokes to our witty visitors, and stands, I warrant, this cold day, chewing her cud like a philosopher—the calmness of the summer's pasture-field sweeping from her nostrils. Gentle thing! When the city boy came out, and played 'Catch', running under her, or afterward standing on both sides, four boys milking at once, she dissented not. May she never want for milk or slops!

"We were largely successful with one of our two pigs. Our taste may not be thoroughly cultured, but we think a pig of six weeks is positively handsome. It has such an innocent look out of its eyes, and a voice so capable of nice shades of inflection, whether expressive of alarm or want. Such a cunning wink of the nose, such artistic twist of the tail! Our geese too, flourished. Much-maligned birds! They are wise instead of foolish, save in the one item of not knowing how to lower their necks when you want them to go under the fence. (Who of us has not one weak point of character?) They are affectionate, and die if shut up alone, and with wild outcry sympathize with any unfortunate comrade whose feathers have been plucked.

"If a city clergyman have no higher idea than a crop of turnips or corn, he had better not take a farm. It will be cheaper to let somebody else's hen lay the eggs, and to buy your tomatoes by the peck. But he who would like to look out of his window to see "rain on the new-mown grass," and at five o'clock would love to walk out and see 'the day-spring from on high,' or in the garden hear Christ preaching from the text, 'Consider the lilies,' or watch God feeding the raven, or see him him clothing 'the grass of the field,' or in the gush of full moonlight learn the sweetness of the promise, 'At evening tide it shall be light,'—let such a minister get a place in the country, and spend the weeks that he has usually passed among the bright shawls of starched watering-place, with his coat off, in check shirt, and coarse boots, listening while 'mountains and all hills, fruitful trees and all cedars, beasts and all cattle, creeping things, and flying fowl' at matins and vespers praise the Lord; geranium and branch of apple-blossoms swinging their censers."

A Queen's Advice to a Girl.

A young lady whose father held a high official position, enjoyed the honor of a luncheon with Queen Victoria, previous to leaving for the East, where her father was going as an ambassador. After the lunch the Queen taking her hands, said, "You are of the same age that I was, when I was called to the duties of Queen of England. You are now going to take your dead mamma's place at the head of your father's household. I do not expect you at once to do all that your mother was able to do. I shall not advise you about this duty or that in detail. Knowledge will come with the everyday requirements of the position. But I wish you to carry out with you one suggestion from me which I hope you will not forget. You will meet many people, whom you will not understand, and many whom you cannot love. Bury the bad in people and always seek for the good. Do this, and with the intelligence and good judgment which you have, England will honor you as she honored your mother."

CHAPTER I.

THE OLD MAN'S WILL.

"To my eldest grandson, Guy Monkswold Dangerfield."

A sudden deep breath of relief telling of release from great tension of mind passed Mrs. Dangerfield's lips at the sound of these words. The lawyer continued his reading in the cold, mechanical way peculiar to his profession, but all uncertainty and excitement was now at an end. Mrs. Dangerfield hardly listened to the peroration. The fine property and the bulk of her father-in-law's large fortune had been secured to her son, and she was content. She had always felt—and few who knew the circumstances of the case would differ from her—that in common justice this was the right disposition to make and yet the harsh, suspicious nature of the hard old man whose house she had kept for so many years had rendered her painfully uncertain as to his intentions toward her and hers. She had played a daughter's part to him as faithfully and dutifully as she knew how both during her husband's life time, and also during the three years of her widowhood: and yet she had never felt that she drew any nearer to the misanthropic old man, or that he ever truly liked or trusted her. She had always felt that he bore her a certain amount of tacit hostility—that he half resented the presence of herself and her children in his house, and even when he lay upon his death bed, and told her that he thought she would have no reasonable ground of complaint with his will, there had been a gleam almost as of malice in his half closed eyes, and she had felt more uncertain than ever as to the disposition he might have chosen to have made with regard to his property. Men had been known before this to will away their own in extraordinary fashions and to forget the claims of those nearest and dearest to them and Mr. Dangerfield had long been regarded by those who knew him best as a very eccentric man, so that the relief of the present moment was intense.

Twenty thousand to herself for life, and ten thousand settled absolutely on each of his grandchildren, the London house bought latterly and independent of the estate to her second son Fulk—always as it seemed the old man's favorite—and the estate and the bulk of the large fortune to Monk, as her eldest boy had always been called—what could be more just and thoroughly satisfactory in every way? The very intensity of her relief told Mrs. Dangerfield how very uncertain she had been all this time as to the old man's intention toward her and hers.

For there was a hidden skeleton in the cupboard ever present in the mind of this ambitious woman, a secret fear which never let her rest. Nor was this fear altogether unreasonable: for her husband, Charles Dangerfield—steady, trustworthy, dependable, Charles, was not the eldest son of the cynical old man. The eldest son, the wild scape-grace, Guy, had quarrelled with his father and had left home in a towering rage two years before Mrs. Dangerfield had ever entered it, and his name, so far as she knew had never since passed his father's lips. There had not been the ghost of an attempt at reconciliation all these years. Nobody knew [illegible] become of the run-away, or whether he were alive or dead. It hardly seemed probable that the silence of years would ever be broken. Yet Mrs. Dangerfield had never felt safe. She had an instinct that her father-in-law cared more for his lost eldest son than for Charles, his wife, and children all put together. Indeed her husband had told her again and again how proud he had always been of Guy, how well [illegible] stand one another, how Guy with all his recklessness and insubordination was dearer to the old man's heart than the lad who had never given him an hour's anxiety, and how that heart had been half broken by the quarrel which had darkened his home for him for ever.

There must have been something fascinating about the lost Guy, for his brother would kindle into enthusiasm when he spoke of him, and though he had profited from a worldly standpoint through the quarrel, he never ceased to lament it: and up to the very day of his death he hoped to see the reconciliation, and to yield his place as eldest son to the brother whose right came before his own.

It was hardly unnatural that his wife did not share these hopes. She had never seen Guy, who was nothing but a name to her, and she, not without reason, considered that Charles had won the position he now held by the right of solid merit. It was he who had watched over his father's declining years, and borne with his trying temper and changing moods, and had played the part of the dutiful son of the house. He had given up all chance of pushing his own way in the world so that his father should not be left alone, and it seemed only common justice that his eldest son should be looked upon as the heir. No objection had been raised to the name of Guy—the regular family name for the eldest son of the house—when it had been suggested for the eldest son of Charles; but it had seemed to grate on the old man's ears when they had begun to call the child by it, and so it had gradually dropped into disuse, and his second name substituted and his brothers and sisters knew him by no other.

Monkswold was the maiden name of the old man's wife, the mother of Guy and Charles, a loving and lovely woman, idolized both by her husband and sons, in whose lifetime there had been none of the troubles and discords which had led to the final rupture between father and son. It had pleased the old man that her name had been revived in her grandson, and Monk was in better favor with his grandsire after the Guy had been completely dropped.

Mrs. Dangerfield's mind had glanced back through the vista of the ten years of her married life, with all its conflicting hopes and fears, whilst the lawyer was finishing the reading of the will.

The few guests who had been present at the ceremony were already taking their leave, with little formal speeches of mingled condolence and congratulation. The short winter's day was drawing to a close and they were anxious to be moving. They were only friends, not relatives, for the Dangerfields were very much alone in the world. The family lawyer who was joint trustee with Mrs. Dangerfield for the children, was the only guest sleeping in the house, and when the room had emptied itself of visitors and the old servants who had been admitted to the reading of the will, and who had all been remembered by their late master in a substantial manner, he turned to the lady and said:

"I suppose I may congratulate you in the name of your son—on his behalf, I ought to say."

"Thank you, Mr. Lumly. I will not pretend that I feel no relief at this certainty. Mr. Dangerfied was a man upon whose good will there was no depending."

"Just so, and in this case there was an element of uncertainty independent of idiosyncracy of temperament. I presume nothing has been heard of or from the lost son?"

"Nothing at all. My own impression is that he has been long dead. I think that has been the impression of his father for many years."

"There is no suspicion that he ever married?"

"Not that I have ever heard. My husband certainly knew nothing in his lifetime, and my father-in-law never mentioned the name of his eldest son in my hearing. You know nothing yourself, I suppose?"

"No. I merely ask as executor to this will: for if Guy had married and had children, each of them would be entitled to the ten thousand pounds Mr. Dangerfield has bequeathed to each of his grandchildren without specifying them by name."

"I see. I had not thought of that. If by chance there should be a large family in existence somewhere, it would make a large hole in the fortune otherwise coming intact to Monk."

"Well, my dear madam, with a long minority before us, the estate could bear a good drain upon it. Your whole family is amply provided for in all cases. The money accumulating for them whilst they remain minors will in the case of the younger members almost double itself before they have the handling of it, and the two elder boys have property as well. By the by, did you notice one small peculiarity in the wording of the will?"

"I did not observe any ambiguity."

"No? Well, it is in the expression 'my eldest grandson, Guy Monkswold Dangerfield.' So far as we can tell, Mr. Dangerfield could not have been certain that your eldest son was his eldest grandson."

"But that would not make any difference surely—even if Guy had married and had a son older than Monk?"

"Possibly not, unless he had chanced to hit upon the same name, but there might be the loophole for a quibble under such circumstances. And if would have been far better if my late client would have mentioned your other children by name, instead of lumping them all together in a clause which might include any number of other grandchildren besides. If I had had the drawing of that will I should have taken care that it was less vaguely worded. As it stands it gives the impression that my old friend had some purpose in his mind when he made it—some purpose that does not yet appear. I do not wish in any way to disturb you. I should say that there was little probability of your son's ever being disturbed in his possession of the Dangerfield property; but until we can find traces of the missing Guy, and ascertain whether he is alive or dead and whether or not he is married, it will be impossible to administer this will in a perfectly satisfactory manner; but that of course will be my business to find out. I will make every inquiry. You need not trouble yourself in the matter. There is no reason as things stand at present for you to feel any uneasiness."

Poor Mrs. Dangerfield, it seemed as if she had only escaped from one anxiety to meet with another. When she had heard the terms of the will, she had felt that nothing could now disturb her son in the possession of the family estate; and yet before half an hour had passed new difficulties of which she had not dreamed rose up to confront her. Could it be possible that after all the old man had known something about his lost son, and had framed a will that should benefit him and his, whilst seemingly omitting him altogether? Mr. Dangerfield had always been a shrewd hard-headed man, and it seemed scarcely likely that he would have drawn up this vague and ambiguous will by accident; yet if it had been done of set purpose what could that purpose be? But the widow would not pursue the thought too far. She crushed down her rising suspicions and turned to the lawyer.

"You see no reason, I presume why I and the children should not remain on here? I am the only guardian they have. I suppose we have the right to stay in this place!"

"Certainly, certainly, my dear madam. You must not attach too much importance to the remarks I have just made. I thought it best to mention what struck me, as we are joint executors: but I have not any fear that unpleasantness will arise. There may be more claims upon the property than we know of as yet, but only the very strangest cancatenation of circumstances could disturb your son in his possession of the estate. Indeed I am not certain that anything could really oust him under present circumstances."

"Mrs. Dangerfield breathed a sigh of relief. The shadow lifted itself from her brow.

"I suppose I am prone by nature to fear the worst, and I always had a feeling that my husband was not appreciated by his father, and I am certain Mr. Dangerfield never liked me—"

"O do not say say so, my dear madam. Who could have done more for him than you did?"

"That is hardly the point," answered the lady with one of those strange smiles of hers, so strongly tinged with bitterness. "I did what I could to be a daughter to him, as Charles was certainly the best of sons, but he never cared for either of us as he had cared for Guy. I do not know what the attraction was—and certainly the rupture could not have been more complete, yet he never cared for anyone but his eldest son, and I know in his heart of hearts that he resented our presence in his house and the position we could not help holding there."

"Do you not think you may exaggerate the matter somewhat? No doubt he was very fond of his elder son—but surely if he felt toward him as you describe, he would have sent for him at the last, would have made some overture of a conciliatory character. Had he loved him so tenderly he would hardly have let him vanish without keeping some kind of watch upon his movements. Did he betray no longing for his presence as his death drew near?"

"No, not in the least. Yet I cannot get rid of the impression that Guy held the first place in his heart."

"He may have known of his death," suggested the lawyer musingly.

"He may have done so. I cannot tell. Certainly there was no restlessness or craving for his presence when he lay dying. He spoke once or twice of Charles, but of Guy never once."

"Then I think you may set your mind at rest. He could hardly have kept perfect silence on a point that might affect you so nearly afterwards had he anything to communicate."

And then the interview terminated. Mr. Lumly had letters to write before the afternoon post went out, and Mrs. Dangerfield went upstairs to her children, whom she had hardly seen that day.

The nurseries and children's quarters were in one of the wings of the house well shut off by themselves, as the late master had a great dislike to any noise or tumult connected with the young life upon the place. He had not been at all the ideal grandfather of either life or fiction, and he was sterner towards his grandchildren than he had been to his own sons in their boyish days.

Against Monk he had always seemed to bear a hard grudge, and the boy had never been at ease in his presence. Yolante, who idolized her eldest brother, who was barely a year older than herself, cordially detested the old man who was so harsh and scornful towards him, and it was only Fulk, the second son who seemed exempt from the general fear inspired by the master of the house. The five-year old twins, Humphrey and Cissy, were still too much in the baby stage to have an opinion either for or against the grandfather they seldom saw. He was merely one of the elements of existence, to be accepted without any questioning. They did not enter into the stormy disputes that sometimes went on amongst the others as whether or not he was a detestable old man. Yolante always declared that he was; Fulk was as a rule his champion, whilst good-natured, easy-going Monk generally contented himself with laughing at both the combatants, and vowing that he could not see what on earth all the fuss was about.

The first death in a house always produces a certain effect upon children, and though some of them could remember their father's death they had been sent away from home during his last illness, so that none of the pomp and circumstance of such an event had passed beneath their eyes. But the death of the master of the house had been different, and this very afternoon they had watched with great interest the start and return of the gloomy procession, and had realized better than they had ever done before that they would never see the upright figure, the stern face of the old man again, or start and scutter away into hiding at the sound of his harsh voice.

When the mother entered the large, low-wainscotted room, the children were all gathered together about the glowing hearth. Their first words, however, showed that they were not entirely ignorant of what had been passing downstairs. Some gossip had reached them already, for Yolante at once sprang forward crying out,

"O mamma, is it really true? Is Monk really the master here—as grandpa was till he died?"

"It is true in one sense of the word, though I wish you would not be ready to listen to servants' idle gossip. Some day Monk will be the master here. But at present he is a minor, and will have no more power than he had before: and if he is a wise boy, he will work just as hard as if he had his own living to get, and will not be idle and useless on the strength of his prospects."

Monk understood the spirit of his mother's words if not the exact words themselves, and looked at her with his frank, pleasant smile.

"All right, mamma, I will be a good boy, I don't want to waste my time, for fellows have to know an awful lot now, people say, before they can get into the army."

"And, mamma, shall we all be rich, too?" persisted Yolante, who had a large share of feminine curiosity in her composition, and a good deal more ambition than her brothers.

"My dear child, there is no need at your age to trouble yourself as to whether or not you will be rich. In all probability you will have enough for comfort during your lifetime, and no one need wish for more. Your grandfather has been kind and liberal to us all all, and I hope you will think kindly and gratefully of him now that he is taken away from us; but as for the details, there is no reason why you should trouble your head over them, and I hope you will ask no more questions."

A Journey in Corea.

Dr. W. J. Hall's Fourth Missionary Journey from Seoul into the Interior of Corea.

THE following graphic story of missionary labor, hardship and peril has just come to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Rev. W. J. Hall, M.D., who, as our readers will remember, is laboring in that distant land as a medical missionary:

Since my last letter to you, I have made another long journey into the interior. I had the pleasure of Mr. Noble's company on this trip, which was my fourth since I came to Seoul. It was wintry weather when we started and our little pack ponies were well loaded with books and medicines and a little foreign food. The weather was still cold, and, although we were very well equipped, we suffered considerably. The rivers were frozen so we could cross them on ice.

One cold morning we came to a man lying in the road. At first we thought he was sick or drunk, but on closer examination, we found he was dead and frozen stiff. The natives passed by without paying any attention to what seemed to us such a terrible sight. We tried to find out all we could about the case and learned that the poor man had been sick, was without house or friends, and being unable to go farther, and as the night was bitter cold, he had frozen to death. When the sick are without friends here they have a hard time, often they are put out on the city wall to die, and frequently we find them before it is too late and take them to the hospital where they are clothed and fed, and with proper treatment in a good room they soon recover. Many precious lives are saved in this way and led to Christ.

We traveled about thirty miles each day, and as our pack ponies could not go fast we walked most of the time in order to keep warm. Upon arriving at the inns, often we would find them very cold and at other times too hot. The vermin troubled us a great deal, although not so much as in warm weather. The diet was very unpalatable, but hunger soon enabled us to consume a good portion.

After six days' travel we reached Pyong Tang, 180 miles from Seoul. We at once went to a friend's house where I had been entertained last fall. He was one of the Governor's assistants and last summer I was called to treat his son, who was in a dying condition. God blessed the means and speedily restored the boy to health. The gratitude of the parents knew no bounds. They made me several presents of eggs, chickens and ducks. When I returned in the fall I was invited into their home, and given a very pleasant room. What an agreeable change from the filthy inn where I had been stopping in a room eight feet square, in which I had treated my patients one by one, to a place of cleanliness and comfort!

Our new friend manifested a deep interest in Christianity, and would frequently come in late at night after his duties at the Governor's office were done, and we would talk of the things of God until midnight, and then we would kneel together and pour out our hearts to God. We are looking for good results from this seed-sowing. When I went back the second time he said he was more glad to see me than he would be to see his parents, and he wanted me to use everything he had just the same as if it were my own.

Through our native helper we were able to get a place well situated for our work, which I trust will soon be our hospital. As it was in a different section of the city from where I had been before, the people did not know me and they felt uneasy over my presence, and went to the Governor and asked him to remove the foreigner as they were much afraid. The Governor replied, "The foreigner is not a bad man, but a gentleman. He cures the sick and helps the poor. Is he not a good man?" He gave orders to the captain in charge of the district I was in to quiet the people and arrest any giving me trouble. Their fears were allayed, and soon my hands were filled with patients flocking from all parts of the city and surrounding country. Long before the appointed time they would gather on the street in front of the dispensary and wait until the hour arrived.

Before I left Pyong Tang I was treating over sixty patients daily. Others would come for me with chairs carried by coolies and take me to their homes to see the sick unable to come to the dispensary. Nearly every patient bought a Christian book and appeared to be deeply interested in Christianity. We held services with the patients before treating them; and each night and upon Sunday we gathered those together who appeared interested, and further instructed them.

Since returning to Seoul I have received letters urging me to return as soon as I could, that those I had taught met together every Sunday and read the Bible and prayed to God. Others have come the whole distance, six days' journey on foot, for medicine for their friends.

How much we need more workers so that we could stay longer with the people instructing them in the truth. But we did all we could and will leave the result confidently to him to whom all power belongeth in heaven and in earth.

After reaching Pyong Tang we had made only one-fourth of our tour. We went 170 miles farther north, treating the sick, preaching the Gospel and selling Christian books in the cities and towns, through which we passed. Many expressed a desire to become Christians.

In We Chu we had stopped nearly a week before we knew the danger to which we were exposed by our room having just previously been occupied by small-pox patients. In our journeyings, the pack ponies often fell and threw us to the ground. In one place, going over a steep mountain-pass, I was walking behind the pony when it commenced to slide, and soon fell over backwards, rolling with the pack on its back to the base of the mountain! There was just room for me to step aside in a cleft to let it pass by or I would have been crushed. Strange to say the pony appeared but little injured and was able to travel on with us with its load.

The hardships, dangers and privations of the missionary appear as nothing compared with the joy of carrying the blessed tidings of salvation to the lost. We feel that God has a special care over missionaries and suffers not harm to befall them. Oh, that those who are his may place themselves where God can make the most use of their lives in his service!

Not for ease or earthly pleasure
Nor for fame, my prayer shall be,
Gladly will I toil and suffer,
Only let me walk with Thee.

W. J. HALL M.D., American Mission, Seoul, Korea, June 12, 1893.

A FAMOUS ENGLISH MANSION.

THE recent marriage of Prince George of Wales, Duke of York to the Princess Victoria Mary of Teck, (better known as Princess May), has revived the history of Marlborough House, the birthplace of the young bridegroom, who is now heir presumptive to the British throne. This famous old building is shown in the illustration. It is now the town residence of the Prince of Wales and is situated at the end of Pall Mall, in the most exclusive club quarter of London. It is a plain structure but its beautiful surroundings make it sufficiently picturesque.

Marlborough house was built in 1709–10, by Sir Christopher Wren, the famous architect, for John Churchill, the "great Duke" of Marlborough and hero of many battles. The ground was leased to the Duke by Queen Anne. Such was Marlborough's fame and the splendor of his establishment there that it is said he vied with royalty itself in magnificent diplay, and his Duchess used to speak familiarly of "our neighbor, George"—meaning the king, whose palace was nearby. In 1817, the building was purchased by the Crown as a residence for Princess Charlotte and Prince Leopold. Queen Adelaide afterward lived there for a time, and at a later date it was given over for the purpose of a gallery in which to display the Vernon and Turner art collections. In 1859, these collections were removed and the mansion was again used as a residence.

THE SILENT PREACHERS.

IT has been impossible to preach the Gospel throughout the vast Empire of China. In many towns it has never yet been preached and could not be unless the force of missionaries was increased a hundredfold. But God's silent messengers in the shape of single Gospels have been sent broadcast and many of the people have been prepared for the coming of the preacher. Rev. E. Pearse, of the China Inland Mission, says: "I was preaching in a country place away from home, and when I had done, an old man of over seventy years of age said to me, 'I have one of your books; I bought it some time ago and read it, and I want to know how to worship the God the book speaks about.' He seemed very anxious to worship God, and I took him to the inn where I was staying, and this old man knelt by my side and repeated after me words of prayer to God in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. When we had finished, he said, 'Now I am going home, and I am an old man, and I cannot go a distance to the city where the missionaries are. I want to worship this God always. Will you write me a prayer, that when you are gone away I may worship God myself?' He was greatly delighted when I gave him a Gospel according to Matthew containing the Lord's Prayer, and showed him how in those words he could worship God day by day. He went away. I never saw that old man again. He was like many others in China, who have bought portions of the Word of God and are waiting as the Ethiopian officer was waiting for some man like Philip to come, so that they may understand what they read."

THE NEW SYRIAC BIBLE.

came dissatisfied with his religion, not finding in it that rest for his soul for which he greatly yearned.

He longed to use the Christian Scriptures. He had been told that they contained test proofs of the truth of Mohammedanism, but that the Christians would not let him use their sacred book. Then with grim determination he began to study English in the hope of finding a copy of the Scriptures that would bring to him the lacking proof about his own religion. In this way, he came under the influence of Christian teachers. It was a great joy to his heart when he found that he was allowed to examine the Christian Scriptures, but to his dismay, they contained no such proof of Mohammed's claims as he had hoped to find. This resulted in his accepting Christ as his Master and Saviour.

He was then taken to the Mission Printing Press, learned to compose both in Turkish and Syriac, little imagining at that day, the important service he was to render in Syrian printing in America years afterwards. After a time it became too uncomfortable for him to remain at home and continue the profession of his new faith. He was exposed to no little persecution, and even his near relatives were vehement against him. With a companion who was like himself a convert from Islam to Christianity, he set out on the way to Constantinople, where he sought employment in the bindery of the American Bible House. After some months his friends from Persia recognized him and again his position became one of peril. For months he was compelled to eat and sleep, and live in the Bible House, lest he should encounter some malicious Mohammedan who would decoy him to destruction. At a later date, he found it expedient to come to America, where he secured employment in a bookbindery until the Syrian Bible began to be prepared, when he was engaged exclusively upon the work.

David Ismail is a native of the village of Gulpashan. His mother was a devoted Christian and left a widow early with five children to care for. She secured an education for them all at the Mission village school, with no little self-denial and hardship on her own part. Mr. Ismail's brother is now pastor of an Evangelical church in his native town, one of the largest, wealthiest and most flourishing of all the missionary churches in the Oroomiah field. David has been for some years an elder in this church, and one of its most active and devoted members. He came to this country less than two years ago, to engage upon the printing of the Syrian Bible.

The Nestorians form an ancient Christian sect who take their name from Nestorius, a patriarch of the fifth century, and who followed him in rejecting the statement that "Mary was the mother of God." Originally they dwelt for the most part in the north of Persia, and were far more numerous than now; but the tyrant Tamerlane, in the fourteenth century, came down from Tartary with his hordes and almost annihilated them. Their churches were demolished, their sacred books and literature destroyed, the rivers made red with their blood and only a remnant of them was spared. These escaped to the fastnesses of the Koordish Mountains, where they dwelt among the wild tribes, built simple churches and worshipped after the manner of their fathers. Later, many of them ventured down upon the plains of Persia, where they have since lived, remaining, practically, in villages by themselves, but sometimes obliged to mingle with the Mohammedans and to accept a position of inferiority to these.

After many such persecutions, with their literature well nigh destroyed, except a few books in manuscript, and these written in the ancient Syriac tongue—this old Church has yet maintained the primitive faith in far greater purity than any other Oriental Church. They have tenaciously clung to their Bibles and reverence them as the very word of God. The Nestorians, in both Persia and Koordistan (under Turkish rule), probably number 75,000 to 100,000 souls, fully 25,000 being in Persia. The A. B. C. F. M. began its missionary work among the Persian Nestorians in 1833. The Presbyterian Board in 1870 ceased its support of [illegible] conduct of "the mission to Persia." In no quarter [illegible] consecration and the American Protestant Churches have sent, as a whole, fully 100 of their noblest sons and daughters to this special [illegible].

The work of evangelization among the [illegible] titudes have been won to Christianity.

THE MARY WASHINGTON'S "NAME FUND"

IN THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 12, appeared a chapter selected from The Story of Mary Washington, by Marion Harland, a little book published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston, Mass., for the benefit of the National Mary Washington Memorial Association. The object of this Association is to build a monument in the memory of the mother of Washington. I said in a foot-note appended to this chapter that if every woman in the United States who bore the name of "Mary," would subscribe twenty-five cents to this movement, it would be speedily erected, and asked such readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as claimed the name, to send this sum to Marion Harland in care of that paper.

To my great gratification, contributions immediately began to flow in upon me. For awhile, I thanked the donors to a cause so dear to me, by personal note. Finding at length, this to be a too-arduous undertaking for one pressed by many duties, I have begged a corner of the courteous editors of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in which to acknowledge these tributes to the memory of a true Christian mother. Should others wish to aid in the work, the above-mentioned proposal is hereby renewed for their benefit.

I am especially touched by the fact that so many Maries who have passed from earth are remembered by loving friends in this list of subscriptions, and wish it were possible or proper for me to transcribe the letters accompanying such tokens of tender recollection, as well as some other which lie upon my desk. Since this cannot be, will the writers accept my sincere thanks for words that are to me like "apples of gold in pictures of silver."

A MODERN JONAH.

THE prophet who tried to close his ears to the call of God to unpleasant service has had a number of followers who have come to a sense of their fault without his extraordinary experience. Not long ago a young minister who had received a call to become a foreign missionary, asked a missionary for advice. In reply he gave a piece of his own experience. He said: "A similar call once came to me, but I was prospering in my church, and accordingly responded, 'No.' From that time my troubles began. I felt I no longer had the presence of the Holy Spirit, and I soon lost my influence on my people. Troubles come to my home, and I lacked the sympathy of others. At last I was glad to leave my country and become a foreign missionary, and now I am beginning to realize the joys of obedience but oh, what have I lost through not obeying at first. My young friend, if you are sure you are called to this work, or any work, be prompt. Do not hesitate or delay. It may cost you more than you can conceive to vacillate. Make any sacrifice to go right ahead."

A PEDDLER'S BARGAIN.

ONE of the first diamonds found on the South Africa diamond fields, was picked up by the child of a small farmer, as he was playing beside a brook near his father's cottage. Some months afterward a peddler came to the cottage with a pack on his back. He had brought calico, and cloth, and all manner of things, which he hoped the colonists might buy. As he was displaying his wares, the peddler spied the stone on the shelf. He took it up and examined it, and then asked the mother what she would take for it. She pointed to the child, and said, laughing, "It belongs to that bairn, not to me." The peddled then offered the boy a box of wooden soldiers, worth a few cents in exchange for the stone, and the child gladly accepted his offer. That stone was a very precious jewel. The peddler took it to Capetown where he sold it for a large sum to a jeweler. It is not known precisely how much he obtained but when the jeweler sent it to Europe to be sold he obtained $125,000 for it and it now adorns a royal neck. Neither the child nor its parents was wise enough to know its real value. Similarly multitudes barter away for a mess of pottage, the Pearl of great price which is within the reach of everyone.

Boiled baby was the preference of Charles Lamb.

A lady asked him: "How do you like babies?" He replied: "Boiled, madam." This bachelor sarcasm perhaps arose from the idea of some fond parents that fine clothes make a fine baby; they don't. It is the little fellow inside of the clothes, who has only one tooth and a spectacular smile, dimpling off at the ends of his toes. Pretty dress completes the charm—as it does with everything. Even a watch should have a handsome outside; but the main point is the time it keeps. You find all this in the new, quick-winding Waterbury.

Sailing Away,

and both of them for pleasure,—with the chances for safety in favor of the washboard. In fact, there isn't much chance for safety until it's gone. If you want to keep your clothes, if you don't want them rubbed to pieces—throw it away. Then use Pearline.

That washes clothes without harming them. The washboard wears them out while it's getting them clean. It's rub, rub, rub, and wear, wear, wear, without Pearline. It's work, work, work, too. Pearline takes away the rubbing and takes away the work. There's no use for either, because, asily, quickly, safely, and cheaply, Pearline takes away the dirt.

Beware Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back. 380 JAMES PYLE, New York.

THE MOUNDS AT NIMROUD.*

MR. LAYARD set out from the Turkish capital in the autumn of 1845, and after a quick journey arrived at Mosul. The Turkish authorities there were not only unwilling to give him any assistance, but determined to throw every obstacle in the way of his undertaking. He was obliged to content himself with commencing the work on a very small scale, and conducting it as far as possible in secret. He purchased some tools and weapons, and giving out that he was going on an expedition to hunt wild boars in the neighborhood, he floated in a raft down the Tigris to the Arab village he had formerly visited, near which lay the ancient mounds that had excited his curiosity. On his arrival he found the place deserted, having been recently plundered by a hostile tribe of desert Arabs. Only a single Arab with his family remained on the desolate scene. The man, however, proved to be the sheik of the village; and when Mr. Layard explained the object of his coming, and promised liberal payment for work done, he willingly undertook to collect a sufficient number of his followers to carry on the excavations. He professed himself well acquainted with the mounds opposite his village, and imparted to Mr. Layard the popular Arab opinion as to their origin and destination. "The palace," said he, "was built by Arthur, the kiayah or lieutenant of Nimrod. Here the holy Abraham, peace be with him, brake in pieces the idols that were worshipped by the unbelievers. The impious Nimrod, enraged by the destruction of his gods, sought to slay Abraham, and waged war against him. But the prophet prayed to God, and said, "Deliver me, O God, from this man, who worships stones, and boasts himself to be the lord of all beings." And God said to him, "How shall I punish him?" and the prophet answered, "To thee armies are as nothing, and the strength and power of men likewise; before the smallest of thy creatures will they perish." And God was pleased at the faith of the prophet, and he sent a gnat, which vexed Nimrod night and day, so that he built a room of glass in yonder palace, that he might dwell therein and shut out the insect. But the gnat entered also, and passed by his ear into his brain, upon which it fed, and increased in size day by day, so that the servants of Nimrod beat his head with a hammer continually, that he might have some ease from his pain, but he died after suffering these torments four hundred years.

One morning, as Mr. Layard was returning from a visit to an Arab encampment in the neighborhood, he was met by two Arabs urging their horses to the top of their speed. "On approaching me," he says, "they stopped. 'Hasten, O Bey!' exclaimed one of them; 'hasten to the diggers, for they have found Nimrod himself. Wallah! it is wonderful, but it is true; we have seen him with our eyes. There is no god but God!' and both joining in this pious exclamation, they galloped off, without further words, in the direction of their tents. On reaching the ruins I descended into the new trench, and found the workmen, who had already seen me as I approached, standing near a heap of baskets and cloaks. Whilst Awad advanced and asked for a present to celebrate the occasion, the Arabs withdrew the screen they had hastily constructed, and disclosed an enormous human head sculptured in full out of the alabaster of the country. They had uncovered the upper part of the figure, the remainder of which was still buried in the earth.

The figure whose discovery was thus greeted proved to be one of the numerous human-headed lions which adorned the gateways and doors of Assurizirpal's palace. Mr. Layard succeeded in removing four of these enormous sculptures from the Nimroud mounds, where they had so long been buried, and in bringing them in safety to England.

THE LITTLE TRAVELER IN THE SNOW.†

THE ghostly mountains rose all around, grim and white against the stormy sky. The wind beat the fine, icy snow against her furiously, blinding her so that she could scarcely see her way, and she was now so stiff with cold that she could hardly drag her numbed limbs along. She reached the narrow, perilous pass, half dead with cold and fatigue, keeping close to the rocks that loomed above her, knowing well that she would be hurled down, down, hundreds of feet below, if the wind should but take her off her feet—poor little feet, so stiff and numb she could hardly step upon them. To add to the terrors creeping over her the short winter day was closing, and darkness was settling over the wild, stormy mountain. A starless night would soon enfold her, and then what should she do if Lone Man's Gulch were not reached?

The terrible pass was made in safety by the lonely little toiler; still no lights shone out from any settlement or cabin. But Nora remembered that it was not yet time for that; she would see the lights, she knew, when she reached the point where the trail took a downward turn. Then she could once more "shoot" over the snowy wastes, down through the woods again—only her feet were so heavy—something seemed to hold her back.

A sleepiness began to steal over her, but she tried to rouse herself, and the story of how the blessed Lord had fasted in the wilderness came into her mind. She wondered dimly if there had been blinding snow and howling winter storm on that sacred mountain so long ago; and she wondered if the Lord had suffered with the bitter cold. But angels had come to him, the Saviour of men, and ministered to him. Mightn't they come also to her, one of his little ones, alone upon the stormy mountain top, for the sake of saving men?

The thought gave her fresh courage, new strength. Through the fast gathering darkness the brave child struggled on, each step growing more uncertain and faltering as the bitter cold now began to gain the mastery.

She passed the point where the trail turned down toward the Gulch, when, her stiffened hands failing to plant her pole, she fell, and unable to regain her footing, sank in a heap upon the snow, with a prayer upon her poor blue lips for the men she was trying to save. God pity her! The camp was so near! Oh! why had her trusty pole failed her just then?

Nora was neither cold nor tired now; beautiful visions flitted before her, though she could not see the twinkling lights of Lone Man's Gulch just below that she had almost reached—that she might have reached but for that slip. The wind became more quiet; it had spent its wild fury, and now sighed through snow-laden pines as if it were sorry—alas! all too late—for its wanton cruelty to so frail and small a creature.

Softly the fleecy snow fell over the quiet form, and soon covered the brave child heart that had risked life itself for the sake of other lives. Just a little mound there was now, over which the snow still fell, all silently, while the repentant wind moaned about it sorrowfully.

Only God and his angels knew what was hidden there under the silent snow on the lonely mountain side.

Pears' Soap

People have no idea how crude and cruel soap can be.

It takes off dirt. So far, so good; but what else does it do?

It cuts the skin and frets the under-skin; makes redness and roughness and leads to worse. Not soap, but the alkali in it.

Pears' Soap has no free alkali in it. It neither reddens nor roughens the skin. It responds to water instantly; washes and rinses off in a twinkling; is as gentle as strong; and the after-effect is every way good.

All sorts of stores sell it, especially druggists; all sorts of people use it.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON

QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION

MODENE

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—In Compounding, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts mildly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SUPERCEDES ELECTROLYSIS.

——Recommended by all who have tested its merits—Used by people of refinement.——

Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. ☞Correspondence sacredly private. Postage stamps received the same as cash. (ALWAYS MENTION YOUR COUNTY AND THIS PAPER.) Paul's Prison by the Sea.

The Gloomy Fortress of Cæsarea where the Great Apostle was Confined—Its Ancient Splendor and Present Appearance.

PERHAPS there is no more gloomy and depressing recital of persecution and suffering, endured for Christ, than that of Paul, the Apostle to the Gentiles. Recognized by the enemies of the Christian religion as a man of extraordinary ability, capable of confuting their shrewdest representatives and of bringing the truths of the Gospel home with power and conviction to the hearts of the multitudes, Paul had acquired an influence and a fame as an evangelist more far-reaching even than that of John the Baptist, the Saviour's forerunner. By his missionary journeys he had stirred up the entire religious world in the East, from Palestine to Greece and Macedonia, and had planted churches and organized circles of believers at many places.

After much plotting, the factions at Jerusalem formed a conspiracy against Paul, and he was arrested. The history of this remarkable conspiracy and its results is fully told in Acts 23. He was seized by the Jews in the Temple, dragged out to the street where they were beating him, when Claudius Lysias, the chief captain of the Roman guard, observed the riot from his post on the Tower of Antonia. He sent a company of soldiers who seized Paul, taking him by force from the mob, who followed to the castle doors. There Paul asked permission to speak to the people, and when he put a question in Greek, the captain was greatly surprised, believing him to be an ignorant fellow, like his assailants. He granted him permission to address the Jews, but the mob was so riotous that it was evident he could not be heard. When one of the men went to scourge him, the Apostle asked with much dignity: "is it lawful to scourge a Roman?" and the captain was then more than ever surprised to learn from his prisoner's own lips that Paul was a free-born citizen of Rome. Lysias then, no longer hesitating, took him into the castle for safe-keeping. Next day, Paul's nephew, having heard heard of the conspiracy, informed the captain. It was unquestionably the purpose of the forty conspirators to incite the populace to kill Paul, but they were baffled by the decision of Claudius Lysias, who, in the middle of the night, sent Paul under a strong military escort, by the Roman road to Antipatris and thence to the fortress at Cæsarea, there to be delivered to Felix, the governor. In this gloomy stronghold, on the coast of Palestine, on the line of the great highway from Tyre to Egypt, the Apostle was confined; but the imprisonment was a protection rather than a hardship, since it removed him from the immediate reach of the violent animosity of the Jews. The Apostle had previously visited Cæsarea, but under different auspices. It was toward the close of his second missionary journey, after he had sailed from Ephesus and passed the southern shores of Cyprus, that he touched at the port on his way to Jerusalem. From the capital, he went almost immediately to Antioch, which was the point of departure for his third and last great missionary expedition. Thence he went all over the country of Galatia and Phrygia, strengthening the disciples. (Acts 16 : 6.) On his return, he touched at Tyre and journeyed to Jerusalem by the way of Ptolemais, Cæsarea and Antipatris.

Cæsarea was one of the fortified cities built by Herod the Great. It was erected on the site known as Strato's Tower, and had a natural harbor which gave it the facilities of a port to receive the commerce of the west. It its prime, Cæsarea had broad quays, magnificent bazaars, great public buildings and courts and broad, shady avenues. The pier, (whose ruins are shown in the photograph), was fully 390 feet in length and built to resist the roughest seas. The mole, or breakwater, was one of the most stupendous works of antiquity and afforded a perfect shelter. Mariners many miles off shore could descry the colossal statues of Jupiter Olympus and Juno. The amphitheatre could accommodate 20,000 spectators. Herod had also built for himself at Cæsarea a spacious palace, which was afterwards used as the residence of the Roman governors. In this splendid fortress, of which little more than the walls are now standing, Paul was confined and he remained in "Herod's judgment hall" until he was conveyed to Rome. In the interval occurred some of the most remarkable episodes in the Apostle's eventful life, the most notable being his explanation before Felix and his encounter with Agrippa and Bernice. Felix, knowing that Paul had many friends, and hoping that they might raise money, to be used as a bribe in procuring his liberation, held him a prisoner two years. But there was no bribe forthcoming and Paul when he embarked on a ship of Adramyttium for Italy (Acts 27 : 2), bade farewell to Cæsarea forever.

There are several other Bible incidents that combine to make this old Herodian city a spot of peculiar interest to the Christian. Here occurred the conversion of Cornelius (Acts 10), and here also was the residence of Philip the Evangelist (Acts 21 : 8). In the great amphitheatre built by his grandfather, Herod Agrippa was smitten by a plague and perished (Acts 12 : 21–23). After the destruction of Jerusalem, Cæsarea became the spiritual metropolis of all Palestine, but was afterwards reduced to a simple patriarchate. Eusebius, the distinguished church historian, was a native of this city, and in the martyrdoms of the early Christian era, Cæsarea held a prominent place.

OLD TIMES RECALLED.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., Founded on the Text: "While I was musing the fire burned." Psalm 39 : 3.

HERE is David, the psalmist, with the forefinger of his right hand against his temple, the door shut against the world, engaged in contemplation. And it would be well for us to take the same posture often, closing the door against the world, while we sit down in sweet solitude to contemplate.

In a small island off the coast I once passed a Sabbath in delightful solitude, for I had resolved that I would have one day of entire quiet before I entered upon autumnal work. I thought to have spent the day in laying out plans for Christian work; but instead of that it became a day of tender reminiscence. I reviewed my pastorate; I shook hands with an old departed friend, whom I shall greet again when the curtains of life are lifted. The days of my boyhood came back, and I was ten years of age, and I was eight, and I was five. There was but one house on the island, and yet from Sabbath daybreak, when the bird-chant woke me, until the evening melted into the bay, from shore to shore there were ten thousand memories, and the groves were ahum with voices that had long ago ceased.

Youth is apt too much to spend all its time in looking forward. Old age is apt too much to spend all its time in looking backward. People in mid-life and on the apex look both ways. It would be well for us, I think, however, to spend more time in reminiscence. By the constitution of our nature we spend most of the time looking forward. And the vast majority of people live not so much in the present as in the future. I find that you mean to make a reputation, you mean to establish yourself, and the advantages that you expect to achieve absorb a great deal of your time. But I see no harm in this, if it does not make you discontented with the present, or disqualify you for existing duties.

It is a useful thing sometimes to look back, and to see the dangers we have escaped, and to see the sorrows we have suffered, and the trials and wanderings of our earthly pilgrimage, and to sum up our enjoyments. I mean to-day, so far as God may help me, to stir up your memory of the past, so that in the review you may be encouraged and humbled, and urged to pray.

There is a chapel in Florence with a fresco by Guido. It was covered up with two inches of stucco until our American and European artists went there, and after long toil removed the covering and retraced the fresco. And I am aware that the memory of the past, with many of you, is all covered up with ten thousand obliterations, and I propose this morning, so far as the Lord may help me, to take away the covering, that the old picture may shine out again.

I want to bind in one sheaf all your past advantages, and I want to bind in another sheaf all your past adversities. It is a precious harvest, and I must be cautious how I swing the scythe.

Among the greatest advantages of your past life was an early home and its surroundings. The bad men of the day, for the most part, dip their heated passions out of the boiling spring of an unhappy home. We are not surprised that Byron's heart was a concentration of sin, when we hear his mother was abandoned, and that she made sport of his infirmity, and often called him "the lame brat." He who has vicious parents has to fight every inch of his way if he would maintain his integrity, and at last reach the home of the good in heaven.

Perhaps your early home was in the city. It may have been in the days when Canal Street, New York, was far uptown. That old house in the city may have been demolished or changed into stores, and it seemed like sacrilege to you—for there was more meaning in that plain house, in that small house, than there is in a granite mansion or a turreted cathedral. Looking back this morning, you see it as though it were yesterday—the sitting-room, where the loved ones sat by the plain lamplight, the mother at the evening stand, the brothers and sisters, perhaps long ago gathered into the skies, then plotting mischief on the floor or under the table; your father with a firm voice commanding silence, that lasted half a minute.

Oh, those were good days! If you had your foot hurt, your mother always had a soothing salve to heal it. If you were wronged in the street, your father was always ready to protect you. The year was one round of frolic and mirth. Your greatest trouble was an April shower, more sunshine than shower. The heart had not been ransacked by troubles, nor had sickness broken it, and no lamb had a warmer sheepfold than the home in which your childhood nestled.

Perhaps you were brought up in the country. You stand now to-day in memory under the old tree. You clubbed it for fruit that was not quite ripe, because you could not wait any longer. You hear the brook rumbling along over the pebbles. You step again into the furrow where your father in his shirt-sleeves shouted to the lazy oxen. You frighten the swallows from the rafters of the barn, and take just one egg, and silence your conscience by saying they will not miss it. You take a drink again out of the very bucket that the old well fetched up. You go for the cows at night, and find them wagging their heads through the bars. Ofttimes in the dusty and busy streets you wish you were home again on that cool grass, or in the hall of the farmhouse, through which there was the breath of new-mown hay or the blossom of buckwheat.

You may have in your windows now beautiful plants and flowers brought from across the seas, but not one of them stirs in your soul so much charm and memory as the old ivy and the yellow sunflower that stood sentinel along the garden-walk, and the forget-me-nots playing hide-and-seek mid the long grass. The father who used to come in sunburnt from the fields, and sit down on the door-sill and wipe the sweat from his brow, may have gone to his everlasting rest. The mother, who used to sit at the door a little bent over, cap and spectacles on, her face mellowing with the vicissitudes of many years, may have put down her gray head on the pillow in the valley, but forget that home you never will.

Have you thanked God for it? Have you rehearsed all these blessed reminiscences? Oh, thank God for a Christian father; thank God for a Christian mother; thank God for an early Christian altar at which you were taught to kneel; thank God for an early Christian home.

I bring to mind another passage in the history of your life. The day came when you set up your own household. The days passed along in quiet blessedness. You twain sat at the table morning and night, and talked over your plans for the future. The most insignificant affair in your life became the subject of mutual consultation and advisement. You were so happy you felt you never could be any happier. One day a dark cloud hovered over your dwelling, and it got darker and darker; but out of that cloud the shining messenger of God descended to incarnate an immortal spirit. Two little feet started on an eternal journey, and you were to lead them; a gem to flash in heaven's coronet, and you to polish it; eternal ages of light and darkness watching the starting out of a newly-created being.

You rejoiced and you trembled at the responsibility that in your possession an immortal treasure was placed. You prayed and rejoiced, and wept and wondered, and prayed and rejoiced, and wept and wondered; you were earnest in supplication that you might lead it through life into the kingdom of God. There was a tremor in your earnestness. There was a double interest about that home. There was an additional interest why you should stay there and be faithful, and when in a few months your house was filled with the music of the child's laughter, you were struck through with the fact that you had a stupendous mission.

Have you kept that vow? Have you neglected any of these duties? Is your home as much to you as it used to be? Have those anticipations been gratified? God help you to-day in your solemn reminiscence, and let his mercy fall upon your soul if your kindness has been ill requited. God have mercy on the parent, on the wrinkles of whose face is written the story of a child's sin. God have mercy on the mother who, in addition to her other pangs, has the pang of a child's iniquity. Oh, there are many, many sad sounds in this sad world, but the saddest sound that is ever heard is the breaking of a mother's heart. Are there any here who remember that in that home they were unfaithful? Are there those who wandered off from that early home, and left the mother to die with a broken heart? Oh, I stir that reminiscence to-day.

I find another point in your life history. You found one day you were in the wrong road; you could not sleep at night; there was just one word that seemed to sob through your banking-house, or through your office, or your shop, or your bedroom and that word was "Eternity." You said, "I am not ready for it. O God, have mercy." The Lord heard. Peace came to your heart. You remember how your hand trembled as you took the cup of the Holy Communion. You remember the old minister who consecrated it, and you remember the church officials who carried it through the aisle; you remember the old people who at the close of the service took your hand in theirs in congratulating sympathy, as much as to say, "Welcome home, you lost prodigal;" and though those hands have all withered away, that Communion Sabbath is resurrected to-day; it is resurrected with all its prayers, and songs, and tears, and sermons, and transfiguration. Have you kept those vows? Have you been a backslider? God help you? This day kneel at the foot of mercy and start again for heaven. Start to-day as you started then. I rouse your soul by that reminiscence.

But I must not spend any more of my time in going over the advantages of your life. I just put them all in one great sheaf, and I bind them up in your memory with one loud harvest song, such as reapers sing. Praise the Lord, ye blood-bought mortals on earth! Praise the Lord ye crowned spirits of heaven!

But some of you have not always had a smooth life. Some of you are now in the shadow. Others had their troubles years ago, you are a mere wreck of what you once were. I must gather up the sorrows of your past life; but how shall I do it? You say that is impossible, as you have had so many troubles and adversities. Then I will just take two, the first trouble and the last trouble. As when you are walking along the street and there has been music in the distance, you unconsciously find yourselves keeping step to the music, so when you started life your very life was a musical time-beat. The air was full of joy and hilarity; with the bright clear oar you made the boat skip; you went on, and life grew brighter, until, after awhile, suddenly a voice from heaven said, "Halt!" and you halted; you grew pale, you confronted your first sorrow. You had no idea that the flush on your child's cheek was an unhealthy flush. You said it cannot be anything serious. Death in slippered feet walked round about the cradle. You did not hear the tread; but after awhile the truth flashed on you. You walked the floor. Oh, if you could, with your strong stout hand, have wrenched the child from the destroyer. You went to your room, and you said, "God, save my child! God, save my child!" The world seemed going out in darkness. You said, "I cannot bear it, I cannot bear it." You felt as if you could not put the lashes over the bright eyes, never to see them again sparkle. Oh, if you could have taken that little one in your arms, and with it leaped into the grave, how gladly you would have done it! Oh, if you could let your property go, your houses go, your land and your storehouse go, how gladly you would have allowed them to depart if you could only have kept that one treasure!

But one day there arose from the heavens a chill blast that swept over the bedroom, and instantly all the light went out, and there was darkness—thick, murky, impenetrable, shuddering darkness. But God did not leave you there. Mercy spoke. As you were about to put that cup to your lips, God said, "Let it pass," and forthwith, as by the hand of angels, another cup was put into your hands: it was the cup of God's consolation. And as you have sometimes lifted the head of a wounded soldier, and poured wine into his lips, so God puts his left arm under your head, and with his right hand he pours into your lips the wine of his comfort and his consolation, and you looked at the empty cradle and looked at your broken heart, and you looked at the Lord's chastisement, and you said, "Even so, Father, for so it seemeth good in thy sight."

Ah, it is your first trouble. How did you get over it? God comforted you. You have been a better man ever since. You have been a better woman ever since. In the jar of the closing gate of the sepulchre you heard the clanging of the opening gate of heaven, and you felt an irresistable drawing heavenward. You have been purer and holier of heart ever since that night when the little one for the last time put its arms around your neck and said, "Good-night, papa; good-night, mamma. Meet me in heaven."

But I must come on down to your later sorrow. What was it? Perhaps it was sickness The child's tread on the stair or the tick of the watch on the stand disturbed you. Through the long weary days you counted the figures in the carpet or the flowers in the wall-paper. Oh, the weariness and exhaustion! Oh, the burning pangs! Would God it were morning, would God it were night, were your frequent cry. But you are better, perhaps even well. Have you thanked God that to-day you can come out in the fresh air; that your are in this place to hear God's name, and to sing God's praise, and to implore God's help, and to ask God's forgiveness? Bless the Lord who healeth all our diseases, and redeemeth our lives from destruction.

Perhaps your last sorrow was a financial embarrassment. I congratulate some of you on your lucrative profession or occupation, on ornate apparel, on a commodious residence—everything you put you hand to seems to turn to gold. But there are others of you who are like the ship on which Paul sailed where two seas met, and you are broken by the violence of the waves. By an unadvised indorsement, or by a conjunction of unforeseen events, or by fire or storm, or a senseless panic, you have been flung headlong, and where you once dispensed great charities, now you have hard work to make the two ends meet.

Have you forgotten to thank God for your days of prosperity, and that through your trials some of you have made investments which will continue after the last bank of this world has exploded, and the silver and gold are molten in fires of a burning world? Have you, amid all your losses and discouragements, forgot that there was bread on your table this morning, and that there shall be a shelter for your head from the storm, and there is air for your lungs, and blood for your heart, and light for your eye, and a glad and glorious and triumphant religion for your soul?

Perhaps your last trouble was a bereavement. That heart which in childhood was your refuge, the parental heart, and which has been a source of the quickest sympathy ever since, has suddenly become silent forever. And now sometimes, whenever in sudden annoyance and without deliberation you say, "I will go and tell mother," the thought flashes on you, "I have no mother." Or the father, with voice less tender, but at heart as earnest and loving—watchful of all your ways, exultant over your success without saying much, although the old people do talk it over by themselves—is taken away forever.

Or there was your companion in life, sharer of your joys and sorrows, taken, leaving the heart an old ruin, where the ill winds blow over a wide wilderness of desolation, the sands of the desert driving across the place which once bloomed like the garden of God. And Abraham mourns for Sarah at the cave of Machpelah. Going along your path in life, suddenly, right before you was an open grave. People looked down, and they saw it was only a few feet deep and a few feet wide, but to you it was a chasm down which went all your hopes and all your expectations.

But cheer up in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, the Comforter. He is not going to forsake you. Did the Lord take that child out of your arms? Why he is going to shelter it better than you could. Blessed the broken heart that Jesus heals. Blessed the importunate cry that Jesus compassionates. Blessed the weeping eye from which the soft hand of Jesus wipes away the tear.

Some years ago I was sailing down the St John River, which is the Rhine and the Hudson commingled in one scene of beauty and grandeur, and while I was on the deck of the steamer a gentleman pointed out to me the places of interest, and he said, "All this is interval land, and it is the richest land in all the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia."

"What," said I, "do you mean by interval land?" "Well," he said, "this land is submerged for a part of the year; spring freshets come down, and all these plains are overflowed with the water, and the water leaves a rich deposit, and when the waters are gone the harvest springs up, and there is the grandest harvest that was ever reaped." And I instantly thought: "It is not the heights of the Church and it is not the heights of this world that are the scenes of the greatest prosperity, but the soul over which the floods of sorrow have gone, the soul over which the freshets of tribulation have torn their way, that yields the greatest fruits of righteousness, and the largest harvest for time, and the richest harvest for eternity." Bless God that your soul is interval land.

But these reminiscences reach only to this morning. There is one more point of tremendous reminiscence, and that is the last hour of life, when we have to look over all our past existence. What a moment that will be! I place Napoleon's dying remiscence on St. Helena beside Mrs. Judson's dying reminiscence in the harbor of St. Helena, the same island, twenty years after. Napoleon's dying reminiscence was one of delirium—as he exclaimed, "Head of the Army!" Mrs. Judson's dying reminiscence, as she came home from her missionary toil and her life of self-sacrifice for God, dying in the cabin of the ship in the harbor of St. Helena, was, "I always did love the Lord Jesus Christ." And then, the historian says, she fell into a sound sleep for an hour, and woke amid the songs of angels.

I place the dying reminiscence of Augustus Cæsar against the dying reminiscence of the Apostle Paul. The dying reminiscence of Augustus Cæsar was, addressing his attendants, "Have I played my part well on the stage of life?" and they answered in the affirmative, and he said, "Why, then, don't you applaud me?" The dying reminiscence of Paul the Apostle was, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course." Augustus Cæsar died amid pomp and great surroundings. Paul uttered his dying reminiscence looking up through the roof of a dungeon. God grant that our dying pillow may be the closing of a a useful life, and the opening of a glorious eternity.

Faith Built This Home.

Mrs Whittemore of the "Door of Hope" tells how the Country Home for Girls was Established in Answer to Prayer.

MRS. E. M. WHITTEMORE, the founder and manager of "The Door of Hope," a Rescue Home for Fallen Girls in New York, which has been instrumental in saving numbers of the unfortunate class from a life of sin and shame and leading them to Christ, has for many months been endeavoring to establish a Rest or Retreat in the country, where the sick, or those who would be benefitted by an outing, might be sent for recuperation. She has now succeeded and the country home is established and in operation. The work, which has been wholly one of faith, is thus described by Mrs. Whittemore:

"For sometime I had been praying for a country home in connection with the Door of Hope (at 101 E. 61st Street, New York), where I could provide more suitably for the most delicate girls, and also to give a pleasant outing occasionally to the others during the warm weather. Two or three months elapsed, when a letter was received from a gentleman who knew nothing of my project—in fact, I had not communicated my desire to anyone, as in all matters concerning the work, so this need was only made known to God for, from the beginning, it has always been strictly a faith work. The letter conveyed a proposition that, having a vacant house in Tappan, N. Y., unrented, he had been impressed to write and ascertain if I thought a Home out-of-town might not be helpful to some who came to me at the Door of Hope and who needed quiet and general toning up.

"He continued by saying that if I desired such a place and would take the mortgage of $2,000 upon the property, he would sell me the house and grounds for one dollar. At that particular time, a debt of $2,000 was still resting upon the Door of Hope and, therefore I did not feel clear about undertaking the responsibility for this extra amount. Meanwhile, a dear friend and her sons, in a most unexpected manner, presented me with $1,500 and having before set apart $500 towards liquidating what was due upon the first home, I felt that God was inviting me to trust more implicitly and take the Country Home for the 'Door of Hope,' which I did with praises and thanksgiving.

"The Home was quickly furnished, put in order, and opened by a dedication service conducted by the Rev. Dr. Kittredge, of the Madison Avenue Reformed Church, on June 1. A large party of over fifty persons went out on this occasion and several took part in the service. The Home is situated in Tappan, near New York, and is most accessible, very healthy, and picturesque. We can accommodate twelve girls very comfortably at a time. At present the Home has ten girls under its roof, and a much happier little circle can scarcely be found, and, best of all, Christ is finding his way into their hearts, lighting up their understanding and brightening their lives with witness of his Spirit of sins forgiven and cleansing through his blood. As a seal of his approval upon every step taken in this order, the mortgage has been provided for in a most gracious manner by one who had only recently been used in aiding the Door of Hope."

A picture of the new Home at Tappan is given on this page. It is a triumph of faith and prayer, that recalls the strong trust of George Muller, Pastor Spurgeon and Dr. Cullis in the Divine support of their varied philanthropies. Like the "Door of Hope," the Home will be the means of upbuilding the kingdom, and saving many a poor sin sick soul, who may there find shelter and protection.

A PERSIAN MARTYR.

THE imprisonment in Persia of Mirza Ibrahim, a Christian convert from Mohammedanism has at last terminated. Death has released him. The persist-efforts of the missionaries to secure his liberation failed and indeed, resulted only in the application of increased severity. Rev. W. L. Whipple, writing from Tabriz to the Church at Home and Abroad, says: Ibrahim was removed from a room in the upper prison, where he was comparatively comfortable, to the dark, damp dungeon, a place reserved for the worst criminals, such as robbers and murderers. His coat and bedding also were taken from him and he was chilled through and through. The brethren from here and some from Oroomiah have called to see him often. The prisoners confined in the dungeon with him were the vilest of the vile, and no small part of his suffering was caused by their blasphemy and filthy conversation. He would reprove them and talk with them about the new religion he had recently found, and recommend it to them. But they seemed to be thoroughly depraved and hardened and would not accept his words. One night, after they had been locked up for the night, they had been talking about the two religions, that of Jesus and that of Mohammed. Finally they said that if he did not say that Jesus was false and Ali (one of their mediators) true, they would choke him to death. Each one of the twelve men tried him. Each time he would say, "Jesus is true;" and they choked him until his eyes bulged out. His throat swelled so that he could not eat hard food, and in consequence he became so weak he gradually sunk away and died. The superior officer in charge on the last day showed him kindness and attention, especially in his burial. As he died a Christian, the Moslems refused to bury him; so the brethren here attended to that. He was placed in the grave of a rich Moslem, whose body was taken up and carried to one of their sacred places. So after all even in his death, like his Master, he made his grave "with the rich." There was no disturbance about his burial, although just now there is a very delicate state of affairs.

PAUL BEFORE FELIX.

S. S. Lesson for Aug. 20. Acts 24: 10-25. Golden Text, 1 Cor. 16: 13. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

RESCUED from the murderous intention of the Jewish priests and their associates in persecution, by intervention of Claudius Lysias, the chief captain of the Roman military force stationed at Jerusalem, Paul was brought safely to Cæsarea, that his cause might be tried before the governor Felix. A letter from Lysias acquainted Felix with the circumstances of his case, and that, in his opinion, nothing worthy of death or of bonds was laid to the prisoner's charge, and that moreover, he was a Roman citizen. On reading the letter, and seeing his prisoner, Felix asked but one question, which elicited that Paul was of Cilicia; and he was then remanded until his accusers should appear.

Paul's Trial at Cæsarea.

The chief priests, feeling perhaps that their cause was a weak one, procured counsel to represent them in the person of the orator, Tertullus. The tactics of this man, who was hired to do his best to make good his case, led him, in the first place, to address the governor with the most fulsome flattery. He then preferred his indictment against Paul as, first, A mover of sedition among all the Jews throughout the world; second, A ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes; third, He hath gone about to profane the temple. Having preferred these accusations against the prisoner, Tertullus laid a charge against Lysias, for his action in taking Paul with great violence out of the hand of the persecuting party, and having cited his accusers to appear before Felix. And he spoke with great assurance of the result of any examination of the said accusers. The examination of the witnesses only drew out from them a confirmation of the allegations of Tertullus. All seemed to go against Paul. But he Understood his Life's Vocation,

"He is a chosen vessel unto me, to bear my name before the Gentiles and before kings, and the children of Israel." The circumstances in which he was placed were no exception to, but a part of, his life's vocation. The point with him was not whether he was justly or unjustly treated by man, how could such a consideration touch one who was crucified with Christ? His point was how to bear faithfully the name of Christ in his conduct and in his words before Felix, before the priests, before the court of law.

Having heard the case on the other side Felix beckoned to Paul to conduct his defence. The counsel on his side was the presence of his God. He simply related the circumstances of his visit to Jerusalem, and then stated, in regard to the prosecution: "They neither found me in the temple disputing with any man, neither raising up the people, neither in the synagogues, nor in the city, neither can they prove the things they now accuse me. But this I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and in the prophets."

This was really the point at issue. To Paul the Word of God was a living word, it had transformed his life, it lived within him, it was the motive in all he did. His reason for all things could be found "in the law and the prophets." The chief priests who accused him knew the Scriptures in the letter, but to them the Word was a dead letter, the Spirit which "giveth life" was wanting. Paul drew from the Scripture, as well as from the resurrection of Christ, his hope of the resurrection which was a dry doctrine among the Pharisees and rejected by the Sadducees. He continued: "And have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and of the unjust. And herein do I exercise myself, to have always toward God first, seeking in everything, and at all times, to walk before him, and also to fail in nothing which he had commanded in relation to his fellow men. Felix had the eye of a judge; he could see by this time the jealousy on the one side, and the perfect integrity on the other. But Paul went on to show how certain Jews who were not here present to bear witness, found him "purified in the temple, neither with multitude nor with tumult," only that he had cried standing among them: "Touching the resurrection of the dead, I am called in question."

The governor saw that disputation in this case would be endless, and thus he adjourned it until Lysias should come down. Meanwhile he would not deal with Paul as with an ordinary prisoner—he was allowed liberty and visitors were permitted to see and minister to him. What blessed gatherings of disciples may have taken place in that prison or perhaps in the houses of some of the Christians of Cæsarea! Felix well knew that he could trust the honor of a Christian. In those early days men could depend upon the followers of Christ.

The testimony which Paul had to bear before Felix was still ripening in the communing of this man of God with his Saviour, and he waited for the time when the opportunity would be given. When, after a time, a call came from Felix that Paul should speak before him and his wife Drusilla, a Jewess, "concerning the faith in Christ," he knew that the door was opened by him that openeth and no man shutteth. It was for Paul, the souls of two of earth's great ones hung in the balance; and with them the influence which they might exercise over thousands of human beings. No man, unaided could be equal to such a task. But God speaks through empty instruments. He did not let Paul mince matters; he was there for God, and he reasoned of "righteousness" before a man who knew he was unrighteous and whose acquaintance with the Scriptures through his Jewish wife was, perhaps considerable. Felix, may be, had not expected to hear that which would lay bare his own heart, and awaken his own conscience. He wanted to take the position of a critic, but he could not. Paul's testimony touched him, "Thou art the man," rang through his half awakened soul. The prisoner whom he saw at the bar before the Holy Judge of all men was his guilty self, the Holy Word of God found him out, and pronounced him the sinner against God he was. And when the man of God standing in his immediate and felt presence began to argue before this man whose fleshly life was known among men, of "temperance," and of the holy destiny of a human body to be indwelt by God on earth and raised again in the likeness of his glorious body—if the man to whom it belonged was indeed a citizen of heaven, Felix began to feel the ground he stood upon narrowing beneath him. But when the messenger of God opened before the eyes of the earthly judge, whose presence had no terror for him, the awful reality of a Judge, and a judgment from whom, and from which, there is no escape,—a judgment when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed — the crisis was reached. Felix must yield, or he must Consciously Reject God.

He trembled, as well he might; God was very near, he might have been saved, but he put it off! "Go thy way for this time. When I have a convenient season I will call for thee." It was a deliberate act of sin against his own soul. O it is an awful thing to trifle with God; to delay when God calls is to reject him. This man, consciously spoken to by God, dared to subject the God to whom he had sinned against to his own convenience! The Spirit of God does not wait for man's convenience. From trembling at his Word, which if yielded to could have made this man "poor of a contrite spirit" such as God has promised to "look to," this mistaken man fell in a moment into that snare made ready by the devil, "the love of money which is the root of all evil." And the wretched being who was consigning his soul to beggary for the great future yielded to a contemptible hope "that money should have been given him of Paul, that he might loose him." To what purpose could such communing be? How could Paul hope to influence for God a man whose object was to get money from him? How could Felix succeed in his mean object when the man on whom his hopes of gain were set, had suffered the loss of all things. Two years passed by; what happened during these years? Felix did not become converted; every added knowledge he obtained only went to his further condemnation.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

A BRIEF survey of the events which followed the seizure of the great Apostle in the temple and his rescue from the angry mob by Lysias, the chief captain is necessary to account for Paul's presence as a prisoner before the Governor at Cæsarea. When the chief captain gave Paul leave to speak from the steps of the castle of Antonia, the Apostle described his former prejudice against Christianity and told how it had been overcome by miraculous conversion. The Jews listened to him until he said he had received a commission to preach to the Gentiles. Then they would hear no more and their violence was so great that Lysias, the chief captain, fearing for Paul's safety, took him into the castle. He would have scourged him, supposing from the clamor that he must be some grievous wrongdoer, but Paul declared that he was a Roman citizen and so escaped that indignity. Lysias gave the Jews another opportunity to present their case against Paul, but again he had to rescue his prisoner from their violence. On the next day a conspiracy was formed to murder the Apostle and the chief priests were parties to the plot. But Paul's nephew heard of it and disclosed it to Lysias, who determined to relieve himself of the responsibility for the safety of his prisoner. He accordingly ordered a strong guard of soldiers to take him in the dead of night to Cæsarea, where Felix the Governor of the Province was residing. He sent a letter with the prisoner, explaining the situation and incidentally taking credit, to which he was scarcely entitled, for zeal in protecting the person of a Roman citizen. Felix was a corrupt, venal man. He had been a slave, but had been emancipated with his brother Pallas by the Emperor Claudius, and both men had been raised to almost kingly power. Tacitus the historian, mentions him as Governor of Judæa and describes him as vicious and venal. It was this corrupt man who kept Paul two years in prison, who was prepared to accept a bribe to release him, and finally left him in prison to "do the Jews a favor." A picture of the prison, as it now looks, appears on the first page of this journal this week.

There shall be a resurrection. How happy some people would be if they could be sure that death would be the end of all consciousness. Some have persuaded themselves that it is so. A century ago an infidel German countess dying, ordered that her grave be covered with a solid granite slab; that around it should be placed blocks of stone; and that the whole be fastened together by strong iron clamps, and that on the burial stone be cut these words: "This burial place, purchased to all eternity, must never be opened." Thus she defied the Almighty. But an acorn sprouted up under the covering, and the tiny shoot found its way between two of the slabs, and grew there slowly and surely until it burst the clamps asunder and lifting the immense blocks, the structure ere long became a confused mass of rock, among which grew the great oak which had caused the destruction.

A conscience void of offence. Nothing contributes so much to peace and happiness as a conscience in that condition. A conscience which has occasion to reproach and accuse is a perpetual torment, and if it is silenced it is only sleeping to awake with intensified power. An Eastern legend illustrates the office of conscience. A great magician presented his prince with a ring. The gift was of great value not for the diamonds, rubies and pearls that gemmed it, but for a mystic property in the metal. It sat easily in ordinary circumstances, but so soon as its wearer formed a bad thought or wish the ring became a monitor. Suddenly contracting it pressed painfully on the finger.

Concerning the faith in Christ. Paul had the same message for Felix as for all other audiences. He knew that for Felix as for the humblest man that subject was the most important he could present. A friend reproached Dr. Judson, the famous missionary to Burmah, for speaking only of Christ to an American audience, saying, "They have heard that before; they wanted something new from a man who has just come from the antipodes." "Then," said Judson, "I am glad to have it to say that a man from the antipodes had nothing better to tell them than the wondrous story of the dying love of Christ. When I looked upon these people to-day, and remembered where I should meet them, how could I furnish food for vain curiosity, tickle their fancy with amusing stories, however strung together on a thread of religion; and how could I hereafter meet the fearful charge: 'I gave you one opportunity to tell them of me, and you spent it in describing your adventures'?"

Judgment to come. A traveller crossed the frontier, and had to pass the Custom House. The officers said to him, "Have you any contraband goods?" He replied, "I do not think I have." "That may all be true," said the officers; "but we cannot permit you to pass without examination. Permit us to search." "If you please," said the traveller. The examination over, the traveller addressed the officers saying, "Gentlemen, will you allow me to tell you what thoughts this examination has awakened in my mind? We are all travellers to an eternal kingdom into which we cannot take any contraband goods. By these forbidden things, I mean deceitfulness, anger, pride, lying, covetousness, and similar offences; which are hateful in the sight of God. For all these, every man who passes the boundary of the grave is searched far more strictly than you have searched me. God is the great searcher of hearts: from him nothing is hid; and in that kingdom, as in this, every forbidden article subjects a man to punishment."

Felix trembled. But, as he did not seek salvation through Christ, his trembling did not help him. Indeed, the conviction he felt, not being carried to a practical issue would tend to harden his heart and he would be less susceptible to the impressions in future. Dr. Maclaren says: "I have heard that if you take a bit of phosphorus, and put it upon a slip of wood, and ignite the phosphorus, bright as the blaze is, there drops from it a white ash that coats the wood and makes it almost impossible to kindle the wood. And so when the flaming conviction, laid upon your hearts has burnt itself out, it has coated the heart and it will be very difficult to kindle the light there again."

A convenient season. Neither Felix nor Drusilla as far as we know had a season so convenient as that one. Felix was removed from office after a time and had to undergo the anxieties and worries of a trial. Drusilla the beautiful daughter of Herod and the unfaithful wife of her first husband Asiz king of Hamath died in the eruption of Vesuvius which overwhelmed Pompeii about twelve years after she had listened to Paul. If she was expecting that "a convenient season" would come on her death-bed, as many are, she was dreadfully mistaken. There is nothing so likely to be fatal as putting off a duty. An incident is related of the loss of an overladen coal barge that stood in a river. A sailor reported to the captain that the water was gaining upon the vessel. The captain drove him away with scoffs. Twice, thrice, the warning was repeated but unheeded. At last, when the captain saw that the barge was undoubtedly sinking ordered the men to the boats. They took their places. The captain said, "I told you there was plenty of time." He took out his knife to cut the cable which bound their boat to the barge. He fell back with a cry of horror. The cable was an iron rope.

SIAM AND ITS PEOPLE.

The Origin of the Trouble with France—The King and Queen and their Palace—A Half Century of Christian Labor by American Missionaries—Consecrated Men Who Have Given their Lives for Siam—A Testimony from the Siamese Government.

SIAM'S complete and unconditional acceptance of the French terms, which was communicated to the French Government on July 29, will, it may be hoped, avert all further danger of war. Siam's first answer to the demand made upon her was a dignified and courteous request for explanation. She did not understand what was required of her and reasonably wished a more precise definition of the extent of the sacrifice of territory she was asked to make. If France had been dealing with a Power able to protect itself, she would have recognized the propriety of doing what she was asked to do; but it was safe to be arrogant with the weak and friendless nation of Siam and she refused to explain. Her answer to Siam was to withdraw her representative from Bangkok and prepare for war. The Government of Siam having failed to obtain promises of assistance from England or China, and knowing that unaided she was unable to cope with her powerful foe, took the prudent course of yielding absolutely to the demand whatever it might be. As a frail woman, alone in her house at midnight, in the clutch of a brawny and unscrupulous burglar, would tell him to take whatever he wanted but spare her life, so Siam has yielded to France.

The Crown Prince of Siam.

If any evidence were needed of the character of French policy it is furnished in her submission to England, at the crisis of the negotiations. France declared a blockade of the Siamese ports, which was contrary to international usage, as a blockade should be preceded by a declaration of war. Other powers were notified that the blockade would commence on July 31, but telegrams from Bangkok and Singapore announced that it had already commenced. This was so clearly a violation of diplomatic courtesy that England informed the French government that she would decline to recognize the blockade and should treat any interference with a British ship as an act of hostility. The import of the message was not misunderstood; and the French minister promptly telegraphed instructions to the naval commander in Siamese waters to allow British vessels free passage.

There may yet be further occasion for applying checks to French greed in Siam. It is understood that Siam's reluctance to yield the territory claimed by France was due to the fact that, when she acquired certain portions of them from China and Burmah, she gave pledges to those Powers that they should never be ceded to any other Power. If, therefore, France takes possession of those territories she may find herself opposed by China on the one hand, and Burmah, represented by England, on the other.

The region claimed by France is about one-third of the entire kingdom of Siam. It is a rich and fertile valley lying between the Mekong river and the mountains which constitute the present frontier between Siam and Annam. The standard atlas in use in France, bearing the date of 1885, recognizes the mountains as the frontier and until the present dispute arose, there was no question of the valley being Siamese territory. Two years ago, however, M. Ribot, a French statesman, propounded the idea that the river Mekong would be a more natural boundary for Siam than the mountains; and incidentally the change would put about a hundred thousand square miles of territory under the control of France, as the conqueror of Annam. There was little apprehension of difficulty in annexing the valley, as the Siamese were an indolent peace-loving people. Accordingly, Annamese soldiers in French uniforms and commanded by French officers were sent to "conduct" the Siamese residents of the valley over the Mekong river. The people generally made little resistance, but occasionally there was trouble and an appeal to Siamese officials for protection. Sometimes an Annamese soldier was killed, before the obstinate farmer could be driven from his home; and about three months ago, a French officer, M. Grosgurin, lost his life in one of these raids. Then the storm broke; the French people became excited over the "murder" and the ironclads were sent to Siam to avenge the insult and restore the prestige of France. Their arrival was the beginning of the present trouble.

The population of Siam is about seven millions. Its name signifies the brown race but is not recognized by the people themselves. They call their land Muang Thai, the kingdom of the free. There seems to be little basis for the title as there is a large number of slaves. It is due however to the Siamese to say that slavery among them has none of the horrors of the institution which characterize it in other lands. The slaves are treated kindly, are never over-worked and are always provided with abundance of food. They are chiefly foreign captives taken in war, or descendants of such. The remainder have become slaves through debt. The laws of Siam permit a creditor to make a slave of any debtor who is unable to pay; and, as afterward his labor is due to his master, he can never hope to earn money to discharge his debt, but remains a slave for life. The present king has attempted to abolish slavery but has not succeeded. The slaves are indolent and contented; and many of them would regard freedom and the necessity for providing for their own wants as a misfortune.

The king, whose portrait with that of the queen appears on this page, is forty years of age. He is usually called Chulalonkorn, but in formal documents, in which his full name and title are given he bears forty-one other names. He assumed the government in succession to his father in 1873. He was then twenty years old and had been king five years, but during his minority the country had been ruled by a regency. His education has been far more advanced than any of his predecessors or of his subjects. In his youth he was a hard student and he mastered not only the chief Asiatic languages, but English and French. His library is an extensive one and contains the standard works in all the languages he can read. He has been in the habit of spending several hours a day there, keeping himself in touch with the outer world through newspapers and magazines. The queen, whose name is Sewang Wattana [Radiant Light], is also a student. She is about twenty-seven years old though looking younger. She speaks English fluently and has read many of the English classics and works of fiction. Their palace, a picture of which also appears on this page, is a magnificent edifice. It was eight years in building and cost two million dollars. The material is marble and the style of modern European buildings with a concession to Siamese taste in the three pagoda-like towers. On the front wall is a large medallion portrait of the king and bronze elephants guard the royal entrance. The interior is exquisitely beautiful. Broad stairways, fluted pillars, statuary, quaint flower stands and sparkling inlaid floors delight the eye. The furniture is of European style. It is chiefly covered with maroon leather with the king's monogram in gold.

Christian missionaries have labored in Siam since the year 1828, but before that time an effort to reach the Siamese had been made by that noble-hearted American lady, Mrs. Adoniram Judson. A large number of Siamese were living at Rangoon, Burmah, at the time of her residence there, and from them she learned their language and spoke to them of Christ. She also translated the Gospel of Matthew into Siamese, so that Siam is one of the few countries in which the written word preceded the spoken word in Christian effort. In 1828, Dr. Gutzlaff and Mr. Tomlin arrived at Bangkok, but Mr. Tomlin was unable to remain more than a few months. Dr. Gutzlaff stayed on alone, and with the help of his young wife and some native copyists, translated the whole Bible into Siamese. After a residence of three years, Dr. Gutzlaff returned to his field of labor in China, and Dr. David Abeel, the sainted American missionary, arrived, and commenced his lifelong labor for Siam. A few years later came Dr. John Taylor Jones and Dr. William Dean of the American Baptist Board, and Dr. D. B. Bradley, a medical missionary of the A. B. C. F. M. The record of Dr. Bradley's labors as physician, teacher, preacher and author, is a glorious chapter in the annals of missions. He died in 1873, having given thirty-eight years to the work of evangelization in Siam. One of his daughters is the wife of Dr. McGilvary, who is still laboring in the Laos district of Northern Siam. Other veterans in missionary labor in Siam, are Drs. Mattoon and House, S. G. MacFarland and J. W. Vandyke.

The following testimony from a public document, issued under the sanction of the king, sufficiently expresses the esteem of the Siamese for the labors of these and many other consecrated men and women: "Many years ago, when there were no white men in Siam, the American missionaries came here. They came before any Europeans, and they taught the Siamese to read and speak the English language. The American missionaries have always been just and upright men. They have never meddled in the affairs of government, nor created any difficulty with the Siamese. They have lived with us just as if they belonged to the nation. The Government of Siam has great love and respect for them, and has no fears concerning them."

Missionary work in Siam is now chiefly in the hands of the Presbyterian Board, which commenced its work there in 1840. Twenty years of labor were expended before a single convert was won from Buddhism to Christianity. Two more converts were made in 1861. Since that time the church has grown in ever-increasing numbers from year to year, and new churches have been organized in Bangkok and other cities. The largest church is that at Petchaburee, in which there are over two hundred members. The labors of the teachers in the Christian schools are bearing fruit, and a large harvest of souls is confidently anticipated. The great problem that now confronts the American missionaries is to explain to the Siamese how the conduct of France in despoiling her of money and territory is consistent with her character as a Christian nation.

SYMPATHY FOR BANKS

ON the principle long ago announced that corporations have no souls, condolence is never offered to a ruined bank. This ought not so to be. The banking institution is the great convenience of the centuries, and indispensable to commerce and the advance of nations. With one hand it blesses the lender, and with the other hand it blesses the borrower. The bank was born of the world's necessities, and is venerable with the marks of thousands of years. Two hundred years before Christ the Bank of Ilium existed and paid its depositors 10 per cent. The Bible, in more than one place, regulates the rate of interest. The Bank of Venice was established in 1171, and was of such high credit that its bills were at a premium above coins, which were frequently clipped. Bank of Genoa, founded in 1355. Bank of Barcelona in 1401. Bank of Amsterdam, 1606. Bank of Hamburg, founded 1619, its circulation based on great silver bars kept in vaults. Bank of England, started by William Patterson, in 1694, and up to this day managing the stupendous debt of England. Bank of Scotland, founded 1595. Bank of Ireland, 1783. Bank of North America, planned by Robert Morris, 1781, without whose financial help all the bravery of our forefathers would not have achieved American independence. But now we have banks in all our cities and towns, thousands on thousands. On their shoulders are the necessities of private individuals and great corporations. In them are the great arteries through which run the currents of the nation's life. They have been the rescuers of thousands of financiers in days of business exigency. They stand for accommodation, for facility, for individual, State and national relief. At their head, and in their management there is as much integrity and moral worth as in any class of men, and perhaps more. How nefarious, then, the behavior of those who bring disrepute upon this venerable, benignant and god-honored institution! And how hard-hearted those who chuckle over the misfortune of banks, instead of being distressed at the financial and moral disaster.

WOMAN'S PERIL.

THERE come letters to our office from young women in the country asking what is the probability of their getting employment in our great city, if they come. Our advice always is, seek employment near your home unless you have some positive reason for thinking you can get it here. In the expectation of finding work in town, how many young women come every year to find their own destruction. You know that there is such a thing as somnambulism, or walking in one's sleep. Well, in a fatal somnambulism, a soul started off from her father's house. It was very dark, and her feet were cut of the rocks; but on she went until she came to the verge of a chasm, and she began to descend from bowlder to bowlder down over the rattling shelving—for you know while walking in sleep people will go where they would not go when awake. Further on down, and further, where no owl of the night or hawk of the day would venture. On down until she touched the depth of the chasm. Then in walking sleep, she began to ascend the other side of the chasm, rock above rock, as the roe boundeth. Without having her head to swim with the awful steep, she scaled the height. No eye but the sleepless eye of God watched her as she went down one side of the chasm and came up the other side of the chasm.

It was an August night, and a storm was gathering, and a loud burst of thunder awoke her from her somnambulism, and she said, "Whither shall I fly?" and with an affrighted eye she looked back upon the chasm she had crossed, and she looked in front, and there was a deeper chasm in front of her. She said, "What shall I do? Must I die here?" And as she bent over the one chasm she heard the sighing of the past; and as she bent over the other chasm, she heard the portents of the future. Then she sat down on the granite crag, and cried: "Oh! for my father's house! O! for the cottage, where I might die amid embowering honeysuckle! Oh! the past! O! the future! Oh! father! O! mother! O! God!" But the storm which had been gathering, culminated, and wrote with finger of lightning on the sky just above the horizon, "The way of the transgressor is hard." And then thunder-peal after thunder-peal uttered it: "Which forsaketh the guide of her youth and forgetteth the covenant of her God. Destroyed without remedy!" And the cavern behind echoed it, "Destroyed without remedy!" And the chasm before echoed it, "Destroyed without remedy!" There she perished, her cut and bleeding feet on one chasm, her long locks washed of the storm dripping over the other chasm.

PREVENTION BETTER THAN CURE.

OF the uncounted thousands who go into an impure life few ever return. Nearly all the doors are shut against return. Suppose one of these wanderers should knock at your door, would you admit her? Suppose you knew where she came from, would you ask her to sit down at your dining-table? Would you ask her to become the governess of your children? Would you introduce her among your acquaintanceships? Would you take the responsibility of pulling on the outside gate of hell while she pushed on the inside of that gate trying to get out?

You will not, not one in a thousand of you would dare to do it. You write beautiful poetry over her sorrows and weep over her misfortunes, but give her practical help you never will. There is not one person out of a thousand that will—there is not one out of five thousand that has—come so near the heart of the Lord Jesus Christ as to dare to help one of these fallen souls. But you say, "Are these no ways by which the wanderer may escape?" Oh, yes; three or four. The one way is the sewing-girl's garret, dingy, cold, hunger-blasted. But you say, "Is there no other way for her to escape?" Oh, yes. Another way is the street that leads to the East river, at midnight, the end of the city dock, the moon shining on the dark water making it look so smooth she wonders if it is deep enough. It is. No boatman near enough to hear the plunge. No watchman near enough to pick her out before she sinks the third time. No other way? Yes. By the curve of the Hudson River Railroad at the point where the engineer of the lightning express train cannot see a hundred yards ahead to the form that lies across the track. He may whistle "down brakes," but not soon enough to disappoint the one who seeks her death. But you say, "Is not God good and will he not forgive?" Oh, yes! but man will not, woman will not, society will not. Our work then must be prevention rather than cure.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

We have received a large number of answers to the inquiry of J. P. F. Burroughs (in The Christian Herald of July 12), for the author of the verses which begin:

"Could I with ink the ocean fill."

E. A. Campbell, Corona, N. Y., writes:

I remember hearing the Rev. John Stewart, a Presiding Elder in the Ohio Conference, preaching on the great love of God to our world. I think it was in 1857, and on Gallia circuit, in Ohio. During his sermon, he quoted the lines, which differ a little from Mr. Burroughs'—but no doubt are the same. As regards the author, he said, they were found written upon the walls of a cell in which an insane man was incarcerated.

Hattie J. Aldworth, Allegan, Mich.; L. D. Sterling, Maxwell, Ont.; M. D. Lichlitie, McKeesport, Pa.; J. Cunningham, Marshall, Mich.; P. N. Bodfish, Wareham, Mass. and S. W. Moore, Little Rock, Ark., all send versions which agree with that of Mr. Campbell as to the origin of the verses, but afford no light on the authorship. A Reader, Dennysville, N.C., says that the poem may be found in Vol. 2 of a book called "Anecdotes on the Old Testament." C.C. Copeland, Springfield, Colo., writes:

You will find the answer in "Cottage Bible" (John 21:25). I copy a part of the note under the verse. "Basnage gives a very similar hyperbole, taken from the Jewish writers, in which Jochanan is said to have composed such a great number of precepts and lessons that if the heavens were paper and all the trees of the forests so many pens, and all the children of men so many scribes, they would not suffice to write all his lessons."

Henry N. Adams, Chadwick, N. Y., sends a similar answer and W. S. Forsey, Finch, Ont., Can., declares that Watts is the author. He also wrote:

Could I in stature reach the pole,
Or grasp the ocean in my span;
I must be measured by my soul,
The mind's the standard of the man.

S. L. Moore., Litt'e Rock. Ark. Is there a college or school anywhere designed to help poor young men to get an education?

There are several where they are "helped," but none we know of that are "free." Write to Rev. H. B. Hartzler, Northfield, Mass, for particulars concerning the Moody schools.

Rev. A. E. Smith, Covert, Kan. Of the two evils which is the greater and why—novel reading or cards?

It may be said that there are good and bad novels—those of such writers as Scott, Dickens, Kingsley, Boyesen, Ebers, Howells, and others of their class being literary masterpieces of a pure and elevating character, while there is also a multitude of a different sort that none can read without contamination. There are no good cards that we have ever heard of, all being irredeemably bad and leading to the development of the worst of vices in the players.

N. J., New York. In what year was the mode of baptism changed by the English Parliament from immersion to sprinkling?

We do not know to what you allude. The English Parliament could not change the mode. When baptism by immersion was preached in England, in the reigns of Henry VIII. and his daughter Elizabeth, the innovation was declared illegal by the monarchs, who claimed to be the head of the church, and those who practiced it were persecuted. Under Cromwell the Baptists were protected, but it was not until the reign of William III. that they received protection by statute, in the Toleration Act, passed in 1689.

Mrs. Beatrice, East Providence, R. I. 1. Must a man have a certain age before he can be a candidate for the U. S. Presidency? 2. Did the bodies of the saints that arose and appeared at the time of Christ's resurrection, continue to live or what became of them? 3. Why are two names given as [illegible] the story of Brave Barbara?

1. The President must be a native citizen of the United States at least 35 years of age. 2. All that is known on the subject is contained in the two verses of the Gospel according to Matthew. In the absence of any parallel or explanatory passage, any theory on the subject must be mere inference or conjecture. The theory generally accepted is that they were persons who believed on Christ, looking forward to his day or waiting for him, as aged Simeon did. That they were rewarded with the special privilege of rising with him, thus fulfilling the prediction (John 5:25), that the dead should hear the voice of the Son of God and live; and that they ascended to heaven as Christ did. All this however, it should be remembered, is conjectural, in the absence of any explicit record. 3. Because the two writers collaborated (i. e., worked together) in producing the story.

Reader, Spring Brook, N. Y. 1. At the time Christ said, "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle," etc., was there any such kind of sewing-needles as is used now? Of course I know he alluded to the gate or opening in the walls of Jerusalem, but some people of my acquaintance think a cambric needle was meant. 2. Was not the Samaritan of those who believed in and followed Christ, and were not the priest and that other one that passed by opposed to Christ?

1. Needles are very ancient. The Egyptians made them of bronze from three to four inches long, and although no traces of a finer grade now exist, they undoubtedly had finer needles for delicate work. The ladies of Assyria, Babylon, and Tyre excelled in embroidery, and must have used very fine needles. Steel was then unknown. 2. The story was a parable intended to illustrate the contrast between the Christian spirit of charity and neighborly helpfulness and the exclusiveness and selfishness of those whose hearts were untouched by that spirit and who were indifferent to the sufferings of others.

Wm. P. Roberts, Stateford, Pa. In Christ's parable (Matt. 13:25), where the enemy came and sowed tares among the wheat, is there seed to tares or does the wheat become tares?

The tares in the parable refer to the seed called "darnel," a rank and widely distributed grass and the only species that has deleterious properties. It is poisonous and its grains, if eaten, produce vomiting, purging, convulsions and sometimes even death. Before it comes into the ear it resembles the wheat so closely that it can hardly be distinguished from the latter, hence the command to leave it to the harvest. Grain-growers in Palestine believe the tares or zuwan to be a diseased or degenerate wheat. The seed resembles wheat in form, but is smaller and nearly black.

Hubert Foote, Fish Lake, Ont. Can. 1. Is it right to raise barley, etc., or hire to work in them when we know they are made up into intoxicating drinks? 2. What advice would you give to a young person who wanted to lead a good useful Christian life and was unsettled as to what course or line of business he should pursue?

1. It would certainly not be right to do so, knowing that the very crop you were cultivating was destined for the liquor vat. If you do not know this and if you have no share or responsibility in turning the cereals into liquor and thus diverting God's gifts to base purposes, you may raise your crops with a clear conscience. 2. Lay the matter before the Lord and take counsel with people of experience and godly character. The choice of a calling may depend upon a thousand things; but there are many excellent occupations that can be followed without hampering or restricting spiritual growth.

Reader, Centre Point, Tex. "I remember reading some time ago an account of some soldiers approaching a walled city; the captain or leading officer, not knowing an entrance into the same, addressed a girl near, and asked that she would show him the way, or give him admittance within the city, to which she replied, 'I will, if you will give me the bracelet encircling your arm.' He pulled off the bracelet and threw it to her, and as each soldier passed, he did the same, until she was crushed to death with their weight. Can you tell me who were the parties, and what city? I only read it once and can't recall it, but the impression never left me how oft we yield our desires for that which satisfieth and profiteth not. Please answer in Mail-Bag." THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

The Panic in Wall Street.

In the twenty years that have elapsed since the great financial panic of 1873 Wall street has not experienced such a tremendous shaking-up as it has received during the past month. The wave of financial and commercial depression which has swept over the entire country, carrying down banks and corporations West and South, shutting down the mines and closing up factories and industries that gave employment to many thousands of workers, seemed however to have somewhat spent its force before reaching the New York Stock Exchange. The balance of trade with Europe was against us and the steady draft of gold sent abroad, added to commercial stagnation at home aggravated the situation. Early in the present troubles (which were precipitated by the unexpected course of the government of British India in suddenly stopping the coinage of silver), the great banking concerns of New York agreed to stand firmly by each other in order to avoid a repetition in the East of the general failures in the West. Their course has inspired confidence and prevented widespread disaster both to the banks and in general. On the other hand, the West and more particularly the mining States, felt the full force of the blow that broke down the price of silver in the markets of the world. The present indications are that the worst is over and general confidence gradually returning. Many of the banking institutions which closed temporarily will doubtless resume. On the Stock Exchange in New York, during the height of the excitement, when the whole list of securities had dropped to a point seldom reached even in panicky times, there were none of the old time scenes of disorder and frantic turbulence. "Bulls" and "bears" stormed and raved, but they are no longer the financial potentates they were in the days when there were formidable leaders in Wall street and when the money gamblers ruled the world of business. Never was the decay of the "street" so significantly emphasized as now. Its power is curtailed and legitimate business methods appear to be more generally adopted. In no place in the whole world is there so much need of Solomon's warning against the effort to get rich by any other method than honest work. (Prov. 13 : 11.)

Evidence from Ashes.

An officer of the Mint at New Orleans has been arrested and committed for trial on remarkable scientific evidence. It was his duty to burn the bills which were returned to the mint and were not to be reissued. A box containing a large amount of money in currency was given to him to destroy and a record was kept of the number of bills of each denomination which were in the box. The ashes of the bills were carefully collected and turned in by the clerk, as proof that he had destroyed the bills, as his duty required. They were weighed by the chief inspector and were about the weight that the ashes of the bills should be. On close examination, however, it was found that among the ashes were the heads of several burned matches, which would, of course, count in the weight. It was evident that certain bills, the ashes of which, if burned, would correspond in weight to the match-heads, could not have been burned. Suspecting that the clerk had stolen the bills, instead of burning them, the next step was to ascertain the value of the bills abstracted. The ashes were submitted to a Government expert, who analyzed them and reported that currency of the value of $25,000 had not been burned On being asked how he had discovered the amount, he stated a fact not generally known. It appears that the coloring matter used in the bills varies with each denomination and that in all cases it has a metallic basis, which is uninjured by fire or water, The tests showed that in the ashes there was none of the indestructible basis peculiar to the one thousand, five hundred, or one hundred dollar bills, although there were several bills of those denominations among those given to the officer to burn. As there was a possibility of his having used them, instead of burning them, he was arrested. Doubtless, the officer was not aware that the Government possessed so ingenious a means of testing his probity, otherwise he would not have reserved the bills from destruction. A similar mistake was made by Ananias and Sapphira in reserving part of the price of their property. It is made, too, by every man who professes to give himself to Christ, if he is cherishing some secret sin or worldly desire. (Ps. 139: 20-24)

A Fatal Bite.

The death of a young lady a few days ago at Asbury Park, N. J., has caused deep sorrow to a large circle of friends. The circumstances were unusually pathetic. Three months ago she was in robust health and was engaged to be married. She had a little black and tan terrier dog of which she was very fond. One day while playing with it, the animal snarled and bit her right hand. Jumping from her lap, the dog ran through the streets growling and snapping at other dogs; and was finally shot in a town three miles away. The wound in the lady's hand quickly healed and she thought no more of it. The incident had almost passed from her memory when she was seized with severe pains in the back of the head, which grew worse until they were almost unbearable. A physician was called in, who prescribed for her. But she became excessively feverish and nervous, and after a few days symptoms of hydrophobia developed. She was attacked by violent convulsions, during which she tried to bite those about her. In spite of the efforts of the most skilful physicians to give her relief, her suffering continued and grew worse, until she died in extreme agony. The singular feature of the case was that nearly three months elapsed between the dog's bite and the first symptoms of her own affliction, and during that time she was in her usual health. Had she realized her danger at the time she received the wound, and had the proper remedies been applied, her life might not have been sacrificed, but it was so slight that no attention was paid to it. A similar mistake is often made as to the nature of spiritual maladies. The deadly nature of sin is not realized and pardon and cleansing through Jesus is not sought for until too late. It was God's complaint against the teachers and preachers of an earlier day that they "healed the hurt of the daughter of his people slightly." (Jer. 6: 14.)

A Lost Memory.

The conductors and railroad officials at Oakland, Cal., are puzzled over a mysterious passenger who arrived there on a Central overland train a few days ago. She was found sitting among her baggage in one of the cars when the train arrived, and appeared disposed to remain. Being informed that she was at the end of the route she looked up in a bewildered way and tried to speak, but could not. After a time she recovered her voice, but was unable to give any account of herself. She could not remember where she had come from, nor whither she was going. She made a brave mental struggle to answer the questions put to her, but gave it up in despair. "Oh, why can't I remember?" she cried in distress. She uttered the name of Doyle several times, but there was no means of knowing whether that was her name or the name of the person to whom she was going. Her baggage was examined, but without finding any clue, nor could the conductor remember where she boarded the train or which of the cancelled tickets she had given him. She was neatly attired and seemed to be about sixty years of age. She had apparently full possession of all her faculties except that of memory, and that was a complete blank. She was finally sent to the city hospital, to see if the doctors could give her any help, while the police sought her family or friends. It was a pitiable condition, doubtless the result of some form of disease of the brain. So utter a lapse of memory is uncommon, but the earnest Christian is often tempted to wonder if some of his professing brethren may be similarly afflicted. When he sees them in worldly society, or in places of sinful amusement, or hoarding their money contrary to Christ's commands, it would seem that they must have forgotten their identity as followers of the pure and lowly Jesus. BRIEF NOTES.

An International Conference has been called by the Evangelical Alliance to meet in Chicago Oct. 8–15.

The Rev. Dr. Ellis, who is laboring among the Jews of Warsaw, Poland, has baptized, within a few months, fourteen Jews and Jewesses of good position.

The new coadjutor Bishop of Tennessee is the Rev. Thomas Frank Gailor, S. T. D. He was consecrated at Nashville on July 25 Dr. Gailor was Chancellor of the University of the South. His future home will be at Memphis.

A good example was set recently by a Western church, which placed in the corner stone of its new house of worship the names of the men employed in building it. The workingman is not often remembered in such circumstances.

The following contributions have been received for the furnishing and support of the Bethesda Home in Brooklyn, N. Y., a sketch of which appeared in this journal on July 26: E. A. M. Ramsey, Mich. $5; J. Lucas, Manistee, Mich., $5; A Friend, N. J., $3; D. Thomas, Oak Hill, O., $1; S. Hinman, North Platte, Neb., $1.50.

Another Christian missionary has been subjected to ill-treatment in Turkey. Miss Anna Melton of the Presbyterian Board, whose station is at a small village among the Nestorian mountains was attacked in the night recently and severely beaten. Complaint was made to the local authorities, but nothing has been done to punish her assailants.

The successor to the late Dr. R. W. McAll in the charge of the Paris Mission is Rev. Charles Greig, who has been one of Dr. McAll's most trusted and efficient helpers during the past fourteen years. Dr. Bonar and Mr. Dods were his sponsors when he entered on the work and since then he has won the respect of all his associates.

When the Roman Catholic Church at Long Island City was destroyed by fire recently, the First Baptist Church invited its congregation to hold services in its building. The offer was accepted, and on July 30 the priest said mass in the Baptist Church. Later in the morning, the Baptists and Methodists met there for worship, as the two churches are holding joint services during the summer. There was, consequently, the novel spectacle of the same building serving as a temporary home for people of three different creeds.

During the week, the following contributions have been received in aid of the proposed Permanent Lodging-House for Homeless Girls: A Vermont Sister, $1; Mr. and Mrs. W. D. Williams, Milwaukee, Wis., $5; In His Name, East Orange, N. J., $1; Mrs. Wm. Hill, Paterson, N. J., $5; Subscriber, Mechanicsburg, Pa., $2; Victoria E. Osborn, Phillips, Neb., $1; Mrs. H. O. Draper, Ware, Mass, $1; J. C. Core, Pleasantville, Iowa, $5; Willing Helper, Columbus, Ill., $10; M. I. D., Milton on the Hudson, $1; Violetta M. Fisk, Sutton, Vt., $2; Reader of the C.H. in Va., $1; Friend, Centreville, N. J., $1; L.A.E., St. Joseph, Mo., 75 cents; Nellie M. C., $1; Evan Griffiths, Vera Cruz, Mo., $1. Total $49.75; previously acknowledged, $220.20; grand total $269.95.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

THE WELLS OF ELIM.

Sermon preached before the Tremont Temple Church, now meeting in Music Hall, Boston, last Sunday evening, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D. Text: Exodus 15: 27. "And they came to Elim, where were twelve wells of water, and three score and ten palm trees: and they encamped there by the waters."

AST Sunday evening we saw the children of Israel encamped at the wells of Marah. We heard again their ungrateful murmurs, and again also the old and blessed story of the tranforming of the waters of bitterness into waters of marvelous sweetness. We also saw that while they were encamped at Marah the Lord made a new statute, ratified it by an oath of obedience, and revealed himself to the people by a new name, "Jehovah, the healer." The children of Israel when in Egypt wished to go three days' journey into the wilderness to worship God. When they reached Marah it was fitting that at the end of that journey and the expiration of that time this new statute and its corresponding obligation should be made. We thus see that obedience to God always brings a blessing and disobedience always a curse.

Attention has been called to the fact that the disobedient Egyptians saw the delicious water of the Nile turned into blood, but the obedient Israelites saw the waters of Marah turned into Waters of Sweetness.

Blessings become curses when men abuse or even disuse them; and severe disadvantages become glorious opportunities when men receive them in the fear and love of God. The first miracle performed in Egypt, as we have seen, was the changing of the water into blood; but the first miracle performed in the wilderness, was the changing of bitter water into sweet. Here we see the two-sided character of God; his relations to us depend largely upon our relations to him. The pillar of cloud was darkness to the Egyptians, but brightness to the Israelites; so God's providences to-day are darkness to the disobedient, but brightness, beauty and glory to the obedient. The first miracle of Moses was the changing of water into blood; but the first miracle of Christ was the changing of water into wine. Christ came to transform all the water of earth into the wine of heaven; to exalt the low into the noble; and to tranform earth into heaven.

To-night let us, in the first place, remark that for the children of Israel, and for us, there is always an Elim. At Elim, the next station after Marah, there were twelve wells of water and seventy palm trees, one well for each tribe and one tree for each elder. The word Elim means trees. The place is supposed to be the Wady-Ghurundel of our day. This is the largest of all the torrent beds on the west side of the peninsula. It is said to be no less than a mile wide, and that here palms, tamarisks, and acacias abound. The twelve wells cannot now be found; but it is well known that sand often fills these wells, and wells are easily dug anywhere in

The Fertile Valley.

The distance is about two or three hours' journey from Marah, and it is a delightful halting place. Fringed with trees and shrubs it was a charming oasis. Palms with hairy trunks and feathery tamarisks, and acacias with [illegible] ous. Beautiful as is Elim to-day, it is sup[illegible] around these wells. On every side the waters [illegible] tiful which these words suggest. "They encamped there by the waters." It is almost possible as we read these words to see the [illegible] of the waters. You can almost see the assembled hosts as they rejoiced in their new location. This oasis must have been beautiful after the trying experiences through which they had passed. We may well suppose that Moses and the chieftains would gather about the central wells, while the great host would be scattered along the plain where the grass was green and where the fountains gave abundant water, clear and cool. Such is the picture which this verse brings before us to-night.

The Elims of Life.

Thank God that we, as well as they, find an Elim in life's journey. The world has for us many Marahs. Every rank and station in life has its well of bitterness. The whole physical universe bears the marks of sin; the trail of the serpent is over every part of God's world. Those splintered mountain peaks which the children of Israel had seen tell most plainly of the terrible tumults which agitated the world's heart; they are standing illustrations of the sorrows and trials which have agitated the heart of the moral universe. We are reminded that in some great musical compositions the fine effects are due in part to the presence of minor notes. It is certain that this law holds true in our daily lives. In poetry and in art the undertone of sorrow gives a certain charm to the completed work. The drama would lose much of its power did it lose its tragical elements. The Antigone would never be reproduced in our day but for the movement of tragedy which lies at its heart, and which reveals itself at every stage in the progress of the drama. The power of fate, or as we would describe it, the sovereignty of God, in connecting in inseparable relations sorrow and sin, marks every stage in the progress of this drama. Sorrow lies deep at the world's heart. It is still true that truth is often on the cross while wrong is on the throne. But let us not take too gloomy a view of life. While it has its Marah it also has its Elim. There is many a home which is an Elim to all who dwell therein. There are lives along whose pathway palms wave, fountains gleam and birds sing. Thank God for the Elims—if we may use a double plural in life's pathway. This world is marred and scarred by sin; but still the world does not belong to the devil. It is Christ's world. His pierced hand is on the helm of this universe. He himself is on its throne, and he will never be dethroned. The gates of hell shall never prevail against the Church of Christ. Nevertheless we are obliged to recognize that this life is often a vale of tears, that it is often a valley of the shadow of death, but we think with especial pleasure to-night of our Elims. Some of you have rest and your lives have been exalted and inspired. Some of you have found of Christ. Its meetings of prayer and praise have been Elims and Bethels. What would you do without the church of God? There you have left your heart's sore and heavy burdens; there you have often drank fully from the sparkling fountains of Christ's promises, and with refreshed heart and uplifted countenance you have gone on in the path of duty. You have found Elims sometimes in the study of God's Word. It has opened your understanding; it has illumined your life. You have sent the buckets of faith down into the deep well of God's truth, and you have partaken of the refreshing water as your lips touched the bucket's rim. You have found an Elim in sacred prayer. There are times when the soul holds unspeakably intimate communion with God. There are times when alone with God one may hear the gentle whispers of his love; times when one almost feels that if he opened his eyes he might see Jesus standing at his side; times when one may almost, like John, pillow his head upon the bosom of his Lord. Oh, how precious have been these times of tender fellowship with Jesus Christ; times when the bride, the Church, has felt the embracement of her divine Husband, when the kiss of his love was on her cheek, and when leaning on his arm she triumphantly marched through the world. It may be Elim for us to-night if we come close to the divine Master. Yearly, monthly, daily, hourly and constantly the soul that reposes on the Lord Jesus Christ, and that drinks of the water of life will have an Elim.

It is also instructive, in the second place, to notice the location of Elim relative to Marah. Being but a few miles distant, it would be reached by an easy march of two or three hours. If the children of Israel, instead of murmuring at Marah, had marched for a few hours they would have reached Elim with its wells and palms. There is deep spiritual significance in this thought. It is ever true in the Christian life that Elim lies near to Marah.

If we but march bravely on God will soon change bitterness into sweetness. We too often sink down at Marah moaning and groaning, sighing and crying. We ought rather to gird ourselves and march with rapid steps to joyous Elim. No, we cannot fully appreciate our Elims except as they are contrasted with the Marahs. Many a young Christian wonders that his sky is ever clouded and his faith ever weakened. I remember such experienees in my own early Christian life, and I remember how much I owe to older sisters, who assured me that the sun was ever shining although sometimes obscured by clouds, and that God never withdrew his love, even though unbelief occasionally robbed us of this assurance. Similar experiences come to us farther on in the Christian course. Did God always give us Elim irrespective of our faith and love, irrespective of our devotion to his service, we would fail to appreciate Elim or to reverence God. Our spiritual experiences alternate between Marah and Elim, because our faith is not constant and our devotion not complete. Deep shadows tell us that there are bright lights. An electric light makes the shadow of a telegraph wire somewhat like a great cable as you step over it on the sidewalk. The bitter and the sweet lie near to each other in almost every life. Dr. Baldwin Brown reminds us that the most beautiful scenery in the world, the world's gardens lie near the most blighted mountain peaks. Sicily blooms and blossoms as the rose, and yet it often quivers and quakes with the mighty throes of internal fires. Naples with its natural which brushes the sky with its smoky column, or which bursts forth in its eruptions of burning lava. In Mrs. Brassey's charming book, "The Voyage of the Sunbeam," we are told of her visit to the Sandwich Islands, parts of which are beautiful as paradise, but close to these gardens of paradise is a lake of lava which rolls and dashes itself to fury against its shores. Contrasts seem necessary to heighten beauties. The jeweller places his diamonds in his windows on a rich maroon, blue, or black background to display their great brilliancy. The dark background is necessary to reveal the gleam and glory of the diamond. The alabaster column in St. Mark's in Venice, the careful architect places before a dark and not a bright wall. Thus placed the sun shows to a better advantage their transparent qualities and beautiful outlines. One charm in Gothic architecture is its quality to mingle lights and shadows. It seems to be God's way in human experience to give light and shadow upon our path, to alternate the Marahs with the Elims and the Elims with the Marahs. I know that some of you have been obliged to drink of the bitter water, some of you have prayed with Jesus in the garden, "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me," but a moment afterward you bowed in sweet submission saying, "Nevertheless, not my will but thine be done." And to you as to Jesus, God's angel came with strengthening presence and upholding grace. The angel has said to you often, "You have had enough of the cup of Marah," and he dashed it from your lips, and then he gave to you as husbands and fathers, as wives and mothers, as sons and daughters, sparkling water from some divine Elim. Perhaps to-night he permits me to place to your lips a cup of this heavenly beverage

A Longer Stay.

Notice, in the third place, that the stay of the people at Elim was much longer than at Marah; although even at Elim it was only temporary. We know exactly how long they rested at the former place. We can trace their journey all the way from Egypt. Three days brought them to the Red Sea. On the third day they crossed the Red Sea, on the morning of the fourth they stood in triumph on the Arabian shore, that day and two more brought them to Marah. We have, therefore, thus far six days. On the seventh day they came from Marah to Elim, making now one week. Turning to the first verse of the next chapter we read: "And they took their journey from Elim, and all the congregation of the children of Israel, came unto the wilderness of Sin, which is between Elim and Sinai, on the fifteenth day of the second month after their departing out of the land of Egypt." They remained three weeks at Elim. God gave them but a few minutes, or perhaps at most an hour or so, at Marah, but he gave them three solid weeks of Elim. That is just like God that is his way of dealing with his people. Delightful weeks, indeed, they must have been. They were permitted to wander all about the vicinity, enjoying its charms and rejoicing in God's love.

It is not to be supposed that two millions or more of people could be gathered about a well or two, or even twelve, rather must we suppose that two million men would march to the place in central position, and then the flocks and herds and the great hosts of people would be scattered about. They were now being schooled; they were learning self-reliance; they were experiencing self-discipline; they had become a nation in a night. These three weeks would give them a very great degree of discipline, and development of those characteristics of manhood and womanhood which they required for their subsequent life. After these three weeks were gone they again took up their line of march and went into the wilderness of Sin.

Must not Linger.

Dear friends, it is true of us that God does not tell us to linger long about the choicest Elim to which he may bring us; he has work for us to do. Beautifully is this idea brought out in the twenty-third psalm: "The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures;" a beautiful picture! What is the result of God's leadership? "He restoreth my soul,"—then what? Do I sit down and take my ease when my soul is restored? Not at all: "He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake."

Have you received some great blessing? Impart it to some one else. Are you walking on the mountain tops of God's favor? Go down and heal some poor sick boy, as did Christ and his disciples when they came down from the mount of transfiguration. Have you been quaffing from some joyous Elim until your soul overflows with the blessedness of God's presence? Go and take a cup of that water to some thirsty lip. That is God's method in dealing with his children, and in carrying forward the enterprises of his church.

There is nothing selfish in religion; the more you give away the more you have. If you can keep all your religion to yourselves you may be sure you have a religion that is not worth anything. If the love of God is in the soul you must speak it, you cannot conceal it. Christ is the Rose of Sharon, and if the Rose of Sharon be in your heart, all about you will receive its beautiful perfume. God blesses us that We may Bless Others.

So we are pushed on. We have no continuing city here. The home of these Israelites was not Elim; their home was Canaan. Jordan rolled between; but they were bound for Canaan. This world is not our home, we are citizens of heaven; our conversation, our citizenship is in heaven. Christ's place was vacant by his Father's throne, while Christ was here below. And by Christ's side there are vacant places for you and for me, if we belong to him. No, no, this is not our home, we are pilgrims and strangers in this world; not always are we to abide below; we are seeking a city, a fatherland; a city whose builder and maker is God. Oh, how sad that men forget this. And when God gives them wealth, and home, and family, they say, "Here is an Elim, here is our home—this is our rest, we shall never be disturbed," and they sit down. Then God comes and he stirs up the nest. He comes in the crash of a railway train; he comes in business disaster; he comes in sickness. This is not your Elim.

God came and took a man out of that pew, who sat there two weeks ago. He lay on his bed of sickness, and his broken-hearted wife wept and prayed with him, while his little boy and his little girl besought God to save their papa. But to-day we stood beside him dead. And I send out over this congregation to-night this question,

"Whither are you Bound?"

We are all travelers Zionward or earthward. Where are you going young man, young woman? Are you a candidate for God's right hand, or are you a candidate for everlasting banishment from God and from the glory of his power?

Among the last words our departed friend said to me were these, "Oh, I wish God would spare my life, that next Sunday night, a week from to-night, I might be baptized. I wish he would spare me, so that I might tell every one to come out from the world and stand with Jesus Christ." This is my message from his silent lips to this congregation.

Come out from Egypt! Come out from the world! Come under Christ's banner! Some of you ought to be there, some of you love Christ. You do love him and yet you stand with his enemies. Come out under his banner; march with his people; sing the songs of Zion; press forward. We have been at Marah; we have come to Elim; we plunge into the wilderness. God shall open the windows of heaven and God shall open his own right hand and give us food to eat. And at the last he will make the waters of Jordan skip and leap and stand, and we shall go through in triumph dryshod into the Canaan of everlasting bliss. I say to every man and woman in this audidence, "Come thou with us, and we will do thee good."

A STUNDIST'S FAITH.

A CORRESPONDENT of a European journal writes that the following facts have been communicated to him from a trustworthy authority. Quite lately, a large number of Russian criminals were standing in the courtyard of their prison, chained together, and about starting for their long sad journey into Siberian wilds. Amongst them was one Christian man, a Stundist, sharing their banishment and punishment, simply because he had spoken to his fellow-workmen about the faith which made him count all things as dross for Christ's sake. His fellow-prisoners were jeering him about it, saying, "But you're no better off than we are. You are wearing the bracelets (handcuffs) as we do; if your God is of any use to you, why doesn't he knock off your chains, and set you free?"

The man replied reverently, "If the Lord will, he can set me free even now, and though my hands are chained, my heart is free!" At that very moment a voice was heard calling him by name, and telling him that a paper had just been received granting him a full pardon. He was then told to stand aside, and his chains were struck off. At the same time the prison gates were thrown open, and all the rest of the convicts filed out, the Stundist alone remaining behind, with permission to return to his family and friends.

It is said that the prisoners were perfectly awe-stricken and solemnised with the impression of what they had witnessed. It came out afterwards that a Christian lady in a high position, who took interest in this poor laboring man, had asked and obtained his pardon.

THE OLD CASTE SPIRIT.

THE following touching story of struggle is from the Indian Witness: A missionary gives this narrative from his experience. "A Brahmin boy came to me one day and said: 'Sir, I want you to tell me something which has been troubling me lately. We heard at prayers, not long ago, about it being no use to hear the truth without doing it, and that idea fastened itself in my mind. I was going home a day or two afterward, and I saw a little pariah (outcast) boy in the road trying to get a bundle of sticks on to his shoulder. When I got near, he called out to me and asked me to help him. I knew at once that I ought to, because I believe that we are all brothers, and must do to others as we would they should do unto us. So I looked up and down the road, and as I did not see anybody coming, I was just going to help him when the old caste spirit rose in my mind, and I said to myself, "Why should I defile myself by touching this pariah? I shall only have to purify myself when I get home, and what is he to me?" So I turned away and left him, and I have felt so ashamed of myself ever since. Will you pray for me that I may have strength to do what I know to be right.'" And so it is that the Holy Spirit works righteousness.

SERVILE LABOR.

In the course of an address at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, Dr. A. T. Pierson said: "I knew a good woman once, who had to do all her own work, and who especially disliked washing dishes, and most of all the smudged pots and kettles. That always made her chafe and complain at her lot. One Lord's day I had preached on that text about abiding in our calling with God; and as she cleared away the dinner that day she began to say to herself, 'Oh, it's the same old drudgery.' Just then the Spirit of the Lord brought to her mind the text of the morning: 'Let every man in that calling wherein he is found, therein abide with God.' And, standing right there by that kitchen table she lifted her heart to Jesus, and asked him to come into her humble kitchen and abide with her and help her to do those menial duties, And from that day she ceased fretting and grew fast in grace and knowledge."

THE RESURRECTION PLANT.

Among the Pyramids of Egypt, Lord Lindsay, the English traveller, came across a mummy, the inscription upon which proved to be two thousand years old. In examining the mummy after it was unwrapped, he found in one of its enclosed hands a small root. He took the little bulb from that closed hand and planted it in a sunny soil, allowed the dew and rains of heaven to descend upon it, and in a few weeks, to his astonishment, the root burst forth and bloomed into a beautiful flower.

TWO thousand years ago a flower
Bloomed lightly, in a far-off land;
Two thousand years ago its seed
Was placed within a dead man's hand.

Before the Saviour came to earth,
The man had lived and loved and died.
And even in that far-off time,
The flower had spread its perfume wide.

Suns rose and set, years came and went,
The dead hand kept its treasure well;
Nations were born and turned to dust,
While life was hidden in that shell.

The shriveled hand is robbed at last,
The seed is buried in the earth;
When, lo! the life long hidden there
Into a glorious flower burst forth.

And will not he who watched the seed
And kept the life within the shell,
When those he loves are laid to rest,
Watch o'er their buried dust as well?

Just such a face as greets you now,
Just such a form as here we bear,
Only more glorious far, will rise
To meet the Saviour in the air.

Then will I lay me down in peace
When called to leave this vale of tears,
For, "In my flesh shall I see God," E'en though I sleep two thousand years.

—MRS. S. H. BRADLEY.

"NO DEATH."

THERE is no death! The leaves may fall,
The flowers may fade and pass away;
They only wait through wintry hours
The coming of the May.

There is no death! An angel form
Walks o'er the earth with silent tread;
He bears our best-loved things away,
And then we call them "dead."

He leaves our hearts all desolate;
He plucks the fairest, sweetest flowers;
Transplanted into bliss, they now
Adorn immortal bowers.

The Man of Sin.

Signs in Character and Conduct which will Identify Antichrist.

BY REV. JOHN STORIE, F.R.S.T.

IT is essential, in the study of the predicted future, to secure distinct apprehension of what is revealed as to the Man of Sin, the Antichrist. His nature, character, and pretensions; his power, his career, and his end. Next only to the predictions in respect to the Lord Christ himself, those who bear on the Antichrist are the most full and definite that God has given in his Word. The Apostle John, writing to his spiritual children in every Gentile Church, says to them, "Little children, ye have heard that the Antichrist is coming;" as if this were a fact with which they were all acquainted; a part of the common instruction given to God's people. It is a distinct and prominent topic in the ancient prophets, in the teachings of Christ, and of those sent out to preach and inspired to teach in his name. If in these later times it has not been so, the loss is great, and the danger may, in the case of some, prove fatal. If a false messiah is to rise on this earth before the end, as the Lord himself foretold, "Showing signs and wonders, insomuch as to lead astray, if it were possible, even the elect," if it be perdition to acknowledge this false messiah, as it is salvation to hold to the true, it is impossible to overestimate the importance of so understanding these revelations as to be prepared for the coming temptation and the coming danger.

The chief passages to read and examine are these—of St. Paul, II. Thess. 2: 1-12; of Daniel, 8: 9-14, 23-25; 9: 30-39, 44, 45; 12: 1; of Revelation, 13; 17: 7-14; of Isaiah, 14: 3-27; of Ezekiel, 28: 1-19.

The following facts about him are clear from the first of the passages I have mentioned: He is to be a man; not a succession of men; not the successive heads of an apostate or apostatising church; but one, individual man, whose pretensions live and die with him. He is to sit; to exalt himself; to show himself as God; a man, who is to rise here in flesh and blood; to head, in its latest form, the apostacy and the revolt of man from God.

He is to be "the Man of Sin," or rather, "the Man of the Sin." Of what sin? The sin fully developed of this closing age; its final representative, impersonation and embodiment; its false, but accepted Messiah.

He is to be "the wicked one," more exactly "the lawless one," ver. 8; that is, the one man who, breaking loose from God, and claiming to be irresponsible and supreme, treats with a proud defiance the law of heaven, and with sceptical contempt its doctrine of sin and guilt and condemnation, of responsibility to a Divine Judge and a coming judgment. He is to reign here as the one king, the one prophet, the one lawgiver, the one conscience.

He is to be "revealed" out of "the mystery of lawlessness." The mystery was already working in Paul's day; and it is to work on, deepening, darkening, widening, till the Antichrist rise in full growth from its womb. When the apostacy is complete; when knowledge and education have spread; when Christianity, become feeble and effete, has lost its hold on the convictions and the life of intellectual men; when the nobler and freer manhood of the coming day has risen beyond the tenets of a religion and a God. When the tendencies, intellectual, moral, religious, social, have reached their full development, then, as all the great movements in history for good or ill have been gathered to a head in one impersonating, representative agent. Then is "that wicked one revealed."

He is a man; but in mission, power, and finally in nature, he is to be more than man. He is to be the immediate agent and minister of him who is the God of this fallen world. His rise, his power, his immense authority is by "the immediate energy" of Satan; the working of Satan in him and for him; and he is to be sustained, through his whole career, by "power, signs, and wonders," proceeding direct from Satan in support of "the lie" he seeks to establish. And what is this "lie?" That Jesus, the crucified, was a deceiver, an impostor; not the Son of God, and not the true Messiah. "Who is the liar, but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? This is the Antichrist."

While rising into power he is in league with the unbelieving Jews; granting them protection, if not aid, while gathering back to their old land, and building their city and a temple for sacrifice and oblation. He joins them in their rejection of Jesus as the promised Messiah. He denies with them and denounces "the Father and the Son" as impious blasphemy, and the worship of the Triune God, as a God unknown to the prophets.

PAUL AND FELIX.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Aug 20. Acts 24: 22-27; I. John 2: 15-17

We have no need to go back to the first century to find such contrasts as existed between the characters of the Roman Governor and his illustrious prisoner. If we have few men of the type of Paul who live for the Spirit and have put away the world, we have many like Felix. The possibility of sinking into a state like his ought to put every man on his guard. He had simply allowed love of pleasure, of sin, and of money to attain the mastery in his nature, and he became a weak slave to those propensities. As he listened to Paul he trembled, but procrastination, the refuge of the weak, was open to him and he availed himself of it. He was too much alarmed and too sensitive to positively reject Paul's appeals. Sin had not yet obtained so complete a control over him as to render him callous or defiant, but he was too much under the power of his lower nature to yield to the appeals. To do the latter would have involved a struggle for which he had not the courage. It would have necessitated his putting away Drusilla and his rejecting bribes and of a revolution in all his habits of life. There are some men of strong character who with God's help have done as much, but Felix was not of that calibre. It was easier to postpone the decision than to yield or to reject. Most men who are living in sin have at times done the same thing. When conviction has come circumstances have not been propitious for a change of life. There is the hope that they will change and the moral strength and courage required for reformation will be less. The man shrinks from the conflict, but he means to enter upon it at some future time when the difficulties in the way will not be so great.

Moral weakness and cowardice are the natural and inevitable result of sin. Sin saps the moral strength of a man. It brings him into a state when he is unable to resist his lower nature. Knowing what is right and what he ought to do, he does what is wrong against the protest of his conscience. He becomes a servant and finally a slave to the propensities which ought to be kept in subjection. The steps to that degraded condition are often taken almost unconsciously. At the beginning it seems easy to retrace the steps, to sever a sinful connection, or to abandon a sinful habit. But it should never be forgotten that every day of indulgence, every violation of conscience weakens the resisting power. The man becomes weaker with every vicious act. The animal propensities in his nature are strengthened, every time they are indulged and the spiritual nature, which ought to rule and direct the life, acquires the habit of yielding until even the preaching of an Apostle could produce only a vague and fleeting intention to reform at some future time. Thus, constant vigilance is the duty of every one. A sin which we foolishly call trivial may be the beginning of a series, the end of which is moral and spiritual impotence.

STUDY FOR EPWORTHIANS.

A most important decision affecting the Epworth League has been made by the General Cabinet. It relates to the subjects of study for the year. The decision is announced as follows by the Epworth Herald: It has been felt that up till now the reading course had not been as successful as it should have been. The causes for the widespread indifference were talked about. Have the books not been sufficiently attractive? Has the price been beyond the reach of the average of our young people? Or, may the cause of failure be in the half-hearted way in which the leaders of the literary departments in local chapters have taken hold of the matter? Perhaps, all of these obstacles have been somewhat in the way heretofore.

These three things were aimed at in the selection of this years's course: 1. The cost must be low. 2. One book should be selected, if possible, with reference to league work in each of the departments. 3. The books must not be too simple for thoughtful and studious young persons, and not too heavy for those who have had limited opportunities for obtaining an education. Here is the list:

1. "Some Aspects of the Blessed Life," by Mark Guy Pearse.
2. Selections from the "Educational Essays" of Bishop Edward Thomson.
3. "The Ephesian Letter," by Bishop Vincent.
4. "Four Wonderful years," by Dr. J. F. Berry.
5. "The Bishop's Conversion," by Mrs. Maxwell.
6. Required readings in The Epworth Herald.

The exact figures on some of the books have not yet been furnished by the publishers, but we believe the expense will be about $2 per set. An excellent supplementary course was also recommended to those who desire to read more extensively. Work begins in October. Plans should soon be under way. The Cabinet also appointed a Committee to prepare a list of books suitable for League Libraries.

THE Y. W. C. A. SUMMER SCHOOL.

The Young Women's Christian Association Summer School, has held a successful and most delightful two weeks session at Lake Geneva, Wis. One hundred and fifty-five young women were in attendance from Associations in fifteen States. Iowa and Illinois sent the largest delegations, twenty-four each. Besides the members of the school there were many friends of the movement present, who enjoyed the programme with them.

Some of the most impressive meetings were those held in the open-air, which comprised a sunrise prayer meeting, a Rouud Top missionary address, a Sabbath afternoon meeting beside the lake. When twenty young women told of their call to foreign missionary seervice and as a result seven others deelared their purpose of entering this work. Pres. Augill of Ann Arbor also spoke one evening to an audience assembled beneath the trees on the lake front

Mr. T. H. Jacobs as musical director and soloist added much to the school. The Bible study and the classes in association methods were in charge of experienced leaders.

Among the evening platform speakers, but one can be mentioned, Rev. R. A. Torrey of the Moody Bible Institute, addressed the young women on the theme, "The Holy Spirit—What is it? Its necessity; How obtain it?" and many of his hearers received the power of the Spirit of God.

The delightful rambles and excursions; the rowing and swimming filled happily all the hours not given to study and classes. Those present were from far distant states—Texas, California and Colorado being included, and have carried back with them the memory of a season of perfect restfulness and refreshment. Two pictures of the lovely country in which the School was held appear on this page.

B. Y. P. U. NOTES.

The Baptist Young People's Union of Indianapolis, Ind., has organized a Young People's Alliance. About fifty young people's societies are enlisted, representing the Epworth League, the Society of Christian Endeavor, the Baptist Union, the Young Women's Christian Temperance Union, the Young Men's Christian Association, and the Brotherhood of St. Andrew (Episcopalian.)—Many delegates from the Indianapolis Convention attended a rally of the Unions at Chicago on the Tuesday after the Convention closed. It was held in the Englewood Church under the presidency of Mr. Niles Olsen, the president of the local Union. The church was filled to overflowing.—The Union at Parkersburg, W. Va. is receiving valuable support from the pastor of the church, Rev. R. B. Smith. On the third Sunday evening of every month he delivers a lecture specially for the Union on some practical subject or some fundamental Christian doctrine. The example is commended to the notice of other Baptist ministers.—The Union of Genesee, N.Y., held an enthusiastic convention in the La Grange Church recently. Among the speakers were: Rev. D. L. Martin, of Le Roy, on "Some of the objects of our Union;" Rev. H. Hyde, of Wyoming, on "Early Baptist History;" and Rev. O. A. Dike, of Warsaw, on "Self Surrender."—The First Baptist Church of Oregon City, Ore. has a Junior Union with a list of 257 active members. It is but little more than a year old and commenced with only twenty-two members.—The badge of the Baptist Young People's Union was designed by Rev. R. F. Y. Pierce the Secretary of the National Association. He says he spent a long time in the preparation of a design without a satisfactory result. He then made the matter a subject of prayer. He believes the present design was a direct answer to his prayer. Canada uses the same design substituting, however, the Union Jack for the Stars and Stripes.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The Epworth League of Lima, Ohio, has now in the District thirty-six Chapters, with a membership of 2,050.

The English Young Men's Christian Associations raised a considerable sum of money to make a wedding present to the Queen's grandson, the Duke of York and his bride, Princess May. The royal couple have sent a letter to the treasurer of the fund expressing the wish that their wedding present should be used as a fund to assist young men who, through misfortune or from other causes, need a helping hand. This proposal is much appreciated, and negotiations are pending for the inauguration and naming of the fund.

Sixty-five thousand dollars have been bequeathed to the Galveston Y.M.C. A. by the late Mr. Rosenberg, for a new building. The money will be received this fall, and work will be commenced at once.

The report of the corresponding secretary of the Quincy, Ill., District Epworth League gives thirty-two active and seven inactive Chapters in the district, with a membership of 1,050. Number of Junior Leagues, eleven, with about 600 members.

The Vancouver Y.M.C.A. has just opened a splendidly-equipped new building. The ceremony was most influentially attended, and the Mayor proclaimed a general half-holiday, in order that the young men engaged in stores might be well represented on the occasion.

An association of Christian Young Men has been formed at South Easton, Pa., to promote the observance of the Lord's Day. The members are pledged to avoid Sunday traveling and Sunday desecration of all kinds, and to discourage Sunday labor, the opening of stores and places of amusement.

The growth of the Christian Endeavor Society during the past year was phenomenal. Although every Society which had transferred its allegiance either to the Baptist Union or the Epworth League was dropped from the list, the number of societies reported to the Montreal Convention was larger by 5,276 than the number reported last year to the New York Convention.

A Summer School for the Young Men's Christian Associations of the Maritime Provinces will be held at Charlottetown, P. E. I. The conference opens on Monday, Aug. 14, and will continue in session for six days. Evangelist Meikel will have charge of the Bible study department, giving an hour or more of the morning session of each day to that subject. Mr. George H. Close, physical director of the Halifax association, will have charge of the physical department, giving three hours a day to this. Mr. A. W. McLeod will conduct a conference each day in live topics regarding the workings of an association.

Princess May and Her Maids.

The Duke of York's Bride a Most Accomplished Woman—The Youth of Princesses.

TO the uninitiated, there is a halo about royalty, that removes it wholly from the lot of common mortals. Nothing can be further from the truth, for the nearer we approach it, the less ideal and romantic does it become, until at last we realize that, after all, kings, queens and princes are human like ourselves. They have the same feelings and desires, and their recreations and relaxations are like our own.

For the most part, however, royalty is at a real disadvantage, for the princeling or monarch must needs feel the limitations of conventionalism far more than the humble citizen. There are many things a commoner may do which would be sadly out of place if done by a prince or princess, although harmless enough in themselves. Thus it happens that the training of royalty in youth is more severe and exacting than in any other state of life. It is expected that a young princess, for example, will be not only graceful and well behaved, but amiable, accomplished and clever; that she will excel sufficiently in certain acquirements to enable her naturally to take the first rank on important occasions, and that she will combine the sweet simplicity of girlhood with the urbanity and polish of the Court. She must be exceedingly well read, something of a linguist, musical and conversant with contemporaneous science, art and letters, as well as with history, if she would hope to secure the deference and appreciation due to her high rank. The age has past when a dull monarch or stupid prince could be tolerated, or when education was confined to a few priests and scholars. In China, our missionaries say, it is the ambition of every family, however poor, to have one thorough scholar among its members; but in Europe and America, where education is now universal, ignorance is inexcusable. Among those who have all the advantages of higher station and wealth, to remain ignorant by choice would be a crime.

In the royal households of England, Germany, Italy, Austria and Russia, the education of the children is arduous and thorough. Princess May, who was lately married to the Duke of York, like all her sister princesses, has been under tutors from childhood until womanhood and is a most accomplished and charming girl.

Her disposition has not been spoiled by being pampered. She has been taught the use of those faithful servants, the ten fingers, and she can even make her own dresses and trim her own hats! In the illustration, she is seen in her wedding dress, surrounded by her bridesmaids and they make a pretty and attractive group. The Duchess sits in the centre and on her extreme right is Princess Alexandra of Edinburgh; next to her, Princess Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein, and the tall girl whose hand rests on the Duchess' chair is Princess Victoria of Edinburgh. On the right of the bride are the Princesses Victoria and Maud. Little blonde Princess Victoria of Battenberg, (it seems to be a popular name) sits at the bride's knee, vis-a-vis with the black-haired Princess Victoria Patricia of Connaught.

Princess Beatrice of Edinburgh rests on the rug to the right of the Duchess, while behind her, the bright-eyed, flaxen-haired Princess Alice of Battenberg chats with the somewhat statelier Princess Margaret of Connaught. The whole party, in cream-white satin dresses, whose folds are prettily hidden by flowers, makes a charming picture. There is a notable absence of any gaudy display of jewelry; indeed, with the exception of necklaces, very little is visible. The photograph from which the drawing is taken was made at Buckingham Palace by the express command of Queen Victoria.

Siamese Girls.

WHEN a young girl in Siam approaches womanhood—which in that country is about 12 years of age—she begins to think of costume. Among the poorer classes, the dress consists of a sarong, or piece of cloth wound several times around the waist, and to this is usually added a piece of Turkish toweling about the shoulders, so that the dress, as a whole, is not so shocking to a European or American as that of many other Eastern countries. Among the upper classes, however, the sarong becomes a superb garment, and is frequently of the richest material and dazzling with jewels. There are few more startling pictures of Oriental magnificence than to see, on some national fete day at the Court in Bangkok, the three hundred wives of the king in gayly colored sarongs, resplendent with gems, although it must be confessed that on most occasions they prefer the European dress. Most Siamese women of rank have short hair, and teeth that have become blackened by the persistent use of the betel-nut. It will require many more years of missionary effort to produce any marked influence on the training of young girls in Siam, which at present is sadly neglected, as far as their mental and spiritual natures are concerned.

CREEPING UP THE STAIRS

IN the softly falling twilight
Of a weary, weary day,
With a quiet step I entered
Where the children were at play;
I was brooding o'er some trouble
Which had me unawares,
When a little voice came ringing:
"Me is creepin' up the stairs."

Step by step she bravely clambered
On her little hands and knees,
Keeping up a constant chattering
Like a magpie in the trees,
Till at last she reached the topmost
When o'er all her world's affairs
She delighted stood a victor,
After creeping up the stairs.

Fainting heart! beho'd an image
Of man's brief and struggling life,
Whose best prizes must be captured
With a noble, earnest strife.
Far above there is the glory
Which no sinfulness impairs,
With its rest and joy forever,
After creeping up life's stairs.

Don't Exaggerate.

MANY persons are given to the habit of unconscious exaggeration, in language and writing. They are apparently unconscious of the fact that every syllable and expression helps to make the record of their lives. Apropos of this point a story is told of the Czar, who studies carefully all documents put before him, and is in the habit of making marginal notes of his decisions and views. These annotations are carefully treasured in the imperial archives, where they are accessible to the functionaries whom they may concern. Recently, in the margin of the report of a prominent official, the Czar wrote, "What an ass!" The individual thus characterized by his august master was in despair, and begged the Secretary of State, Polovtseff, to bring the matter before his Majesty. "May it please your Majesty," began Polovtseff, "to strike out these words here, 'What an ass!' so that they may not forever be on record in the archives." "Oh!" Alexander interrupted, laughingly, "I quite forgot the archives." And he took up a pen, ran through the words "What an ass!" and wrote instead, "What a philosopher!" The one exaggeration was as bad as the other.

A Girl's Opportunity.

OPPORTUNITIES for helpful service come to every Christian girl. She finds them first in her own home, writes Rev. Dr. J. J. Miller. There is constant danger that the duties which lie closest shall be overlooked while the eye is watching farther off for services conspicuous and large. One writes: "It is the greatest pity that so many who are constantly active outside are quite useless in the family. Sweetness of temper and unselfishness at home, a readiness to put one's self out and lend a helping hand in all the little details of daily life, would not interfere with Sunday School teaching and Christian work." The place which should first of all be sweetened with the perfume of your ointment is one's own home. Let the blessing of your cheerful love and your thoughtful, unselfish ministry fall first upon your weary mother, your burdened father, your tempted brother, upon the children in your houshold, on the guests who drop in, on servants who help in domestic duties. "The house was filled with the odor of the ointment." Every house in which dwells a good young woman should indeed be filled continually with the odor of the ointment of her sweet life of love.

CHILDREN AT THE WORLD'S FAIR.

THERE is no prettier picture than that to be seen almost daily in The Childrens' Building at the World's Fair. Ida Hinman thus describes an afternoon in the kindergarten:

"There were about thirty little girls, with long, white aprons and white caps, seated in little chairs around tables just high enough for them. Each little girl had a set of toy dishes—knives, forks, sugar-bowl, and cream pitcher, all complete. With these little dishes the children were taught how to set a table and clear it away, by the kind ladies, while another played a bright tune on the piano. While washing the dishes the little girls sometimes sing:

Washing dishes. Suds are hot,
Work away briskly. Do not stop.
First the glasses,
Wash them well,
If you do them nicely,
All can tell.

"After the dishes were put away in order, then came the play-work of scrubbing the table, and, with their tiny scrubbing brushes, four inches in length, the young housekeepers polished the table with vigor. The scrubbing song is very spirited. The chorus is:

Then scrub away, in your very best way,
With face so bright and cheerful;
For a cheery face meets much more grace
Than one that's always tearful.

Then there is play-sweeping, with little brooms decorated with ribbons, which is one of the prettiest exercises they learn. The children, singing a lively song, skip around the room, sweep, form in line again, and skip through an arch formed by part of the class, with their raised brooms. The lesson teaches the uses of the broom; how to sweep, dust, and wipe woodwork, and to put a room in order. But it is when washing is played in the kitchen-garden that the schoolroom presents the merriest appearance of all. The little tubs and shining wash-tubs are brought out, and the clothes-line is stretched from the posts set into the four corners of the table. While the little bare arms are rubbing the clothes up and down, happy voices sing the tune of 'Barberry Bush.' It is funny to see queer little garments, of dolls' size, hanging from the clothes-line, fastened with clothes-pins not two inches long. When supposed to be dry they are ready for sprinkling, and the young washerwomen sing:

This is the way we sprinkle our clothes.

Then comes ironing, while they sing:

This is the way we iron our clothes.

"Baking day is also an interesting occasion, for then the children make real mud pies. How they enjoy moulding the clay, so soft and nice, and cut it into baby biscuits, as they sing a song of the salt, so as not to forget it when big enough to knead dough instead of clay. Little girls who used to be ashamed of housework now love it. The kitchen garden was originally designed for poor children to elevate their ideas of housework, but has become so popular that the children of the wealthy are also attracted and long for it."

CHAPTER II.

A DISCOVERY.

TWO years after the old man's death, Mrs. Dangerfield and her family removed from the old mansion in which she had lived so long as her father-in-law's housekeeper and settled in the metropolis, that the boys might get the advantage of a first rate school. On the evening of the third day of their attendance, Monk came home with a surprising piece of news.

"Mamma, mamma," he cried, "isn't it funny? There is another fellow at school with exactly the same name as mine—Guy Monkswold Dangerfield: and he is so like the picture of the little boy on the pony that hangs up in the hall at home."

"The intelligence fell upon the ears of Mrs. Dangerfield in a manner little guessed by her children, though she merely looked up with a smile to say, "What a strange thing. Are you sure you are right?"

"O yes," replied Monk, after which Fulk added, "He wasn't there till to-day, though they told us there was another Dangerfield in the school, and asked us if we were relations. But it was only to-day he came back, and then we found that he had got the same name as Monk. Mamma, can't he be a relation? All the fellows say he must be—and he is so like the picture."

"The picture of your uncle, Guy?"

"Yes, mamma—I thought it directly I saw him. All the boys say he must be our cousin or something, though he doesn't seem to know anything about it."

"He said he hadn't any relations except his mother," added Monk, "and I fancy they are rather poor—his clothes were shabby, and he doesn't have nice books or anything, only shabby old second-hand things, and I don't think he's ever had much fun in his life by what he said: but I like him awfully, mamma, and I think he likes me. I wanted him to come home with us, but he said his mother would be expecting him home. I think he is very fond of her."

"Well, if he is a very nice boy, you may certainly bring him home with you one of these days. I think there may be a relationship perhaps. The name is a curious coincidence. We must inquire into things. He might turn out to be your cousin."

"That would be jolly," said Monk. "I think he would like it, too. He hasn't any brothers or sisters, and his father is dead. He and his mother are all alone. I should think they would like to find some relations of their own."

"How old is this boy?" asked Mrs. Dangerfield, steadying her voice so that neither of her sons guessed how fast her heart was beating.

"O a little bit of a chap," said Monk. "He's not nearly as big as me."

"But he's one form higher up in school," added Fulk, "I don't suppose he is any younger. You are such a big fellow, Monk."

This was true enough as the mother well knew. Monk was often found to be a head taller than many companions of his own, or nearly his own, age. If this namesake of his was higher in the school, it was quite possible that he might be the elder of the pair: and, in that case, if he should prove to be the son of the missing Guy—who was really the [illegible]

No one, however, who looked at the mother's calm face would guess at the tempest of anxiety which was stirring within her. She did not even appear preoccupied as she talked to her boys, and presently dismissed them to their own quarters. It was only when she was left [illegible]

"Can it be possible, can it be possible," she murmured to herself, "and that after these two years of fruitless search, just as I was beginning to settle down comfortably with the conviction that nothing could now arise to trouble us? O it will be terribly hard if he should prove to be the elder of the two. And yet if his grandfather never knew of his existence (as it is plain he did not), he can have no moral right to my boy's inheritance, whatever his legal claim might be. O why did I bring them here to be confronted with such a problem? Who could have guessed at such an encounter? What ought I to do? How far must I investigate matters? I suppose I shall know no peace until I have got to the root of this matter. But at least it seems as if they had no suspicions—this boy or his mother. If she heard that her son is entitled to a fortune of ten thousand pounds, surely that will content her. And it is certain the old man could have meant nothing more, even had he been aware of this child's existence — certainly nothing more."

Mrs. Dangerfield rose and paced the room in some agitation of mind. If this thing had happened two years ago it would have been hard enough to bear, though for a time after her father-in-law's death she had tried to prepare herself for disappointment of some kind, and had steeled herself to meet it should it come upon her. But time had passed by bringing to light no news of the lost son. Mr. Lumly's efforts to trace him had proved quite unavailing, and he had told her not many months ago, when he lay on his own death bed, that he believed the lost Guy to be dead without heirs, and that she might now feel practical confidence that no claim upon the property would ever be made. And in this pleasant state of security she had been living ever since. On the death of the good lawyer all the power had passed into her hands. She felt her position and that of her children absolutely unassailable.

For the first time in her life Mrs. Dangerfield felt uncertain and distrustful of herself—uncertain how she would, or ought to act in case the dreaded crisis should come upon her. If this boy should prove to be the son of the missing Guy, and if he should be the elder of the two Guy Monkswolds, what would be her course of action? She did not know and did not choose to ask herself the question too pointedly. She believed that her own son was entitled by every law of true justice and equity to retain possession of the estates which his grandfather must have intended to bequeath to him, yet the law might rule different were there any appeal made to it, and in these people ever became aware of the terms of that last will and testament, doubtless they would prosecute their claim with the utmost vigor. But could the terms be hidden from them? In one sense of the word certainly not, for many people were aware of the conditions of it, and a visit to the office where the will was probated would put any inquirer in possession of the facts of the case. And yet Mrs. Dangerfield knew enough of the world to be aware how few women know enough of business to awake easily to any sort of suspicion on such a point.

The bulk of the property had been bequeathed to the heirs of the son who had played the true son's part. Friends and acquaintances were not likely to trouble their heads about matters with which they had no connection. For one moment this woman was conscious of a feeling of intense relief in the thought that the old lawyer was dead. From him no concealment would have been possible: but as for the rest of the world might not indifference and forgetfulness be reckoned upon? And at least, whatever might happen in the long run, no one could say that it was her duty to take the first steps towards disinheriting her own son. If the other parties concerned ever made discoveries on their own account that was another matter. She could then judge what her course should be: but was it to be expected that she should put the weapons into their hands? She said and thought not. At any rate, come what might later, she did not intend to do it.

"But at least I will make friends with them. I will show them every kindness," she said to herself. "They shall have no reason to think themselves neglected or ignored. They shall have everything to which they are entitled—only not my boy's inheritance. I will befriend them in their loneliness and need. They shall have every comfort Guy's wife and child ought to have. O yes, I will be a true and kind friend—and more could not be expected."

Mrs. Dangerfield was not one to let the grass grow under her feet. The very next day she sallied forth with Yolante at her side to go and meet her boys as they came out of school, and as the big gates opened to admit of the laughing and shouting crowd, her own eyes and those of her daughter quickly espied the pair belonging to them, and with them another little lad, poorly dressed, yet of such bright aspect and graceful figure that the shabbiness of his clothing was lost sight of in the charm and beauty of the face.

"O mamma," cried Yolante, "I do think that must be the boy they were talking about yesterday—the one who had Monk's name. Look, he is so like the picture—only I think he has a much nicer face."

There was no time for an answer. The boys had caught sight of their mother and sister and were running towards them, pushing their new companion along with them.

"Here he is, mamma, and he is our cousin. His father and ours were brothers—isn't it funny? He asked his mother about it last night, and she told him that his father once lived at Dangerfield Park, and that his father was our grandfather, though she did not know he was dead. Isn't it queer to have a cousin you've never heard of—and Guy has five. Guy, this is Yolante—she's the eldest of them except me. And at home there are Humphrey and Cissy. Mamma, don't you think he ought to come home and see them?"

"Yes, Monk, some day soon when he has got his mother's leave. We are very pleased to find a new relation. We have searched many years for your father, Guy, but could find no traces of him. Do you think your mother would let me come and see her? I should so like her to know that she has found friends in her husband's relations."

The boy looked up with a bright fearless gratitude shining in his liquid hazel eyes. There was no shyness about him, and his answer was eagerly spoken.

"O I should be so pleased if you would. I am afraid mother is very ill, though she will never say so to me. She looks worse every month and she grows weaker, and I am sure it would do her good to see a kind relation. She used not to mind being alone with me: but several times lately she has said so much about wishing there was somebody belonging to us. I think she will be very pleased. Will you come now?"

"Yes, if you do not think it will be intruding upon her."

"O no, and I think it is better to take her by surprise. If she sits thinking about things she often gets excited—and that is so bad for her. It makes her cough, and tires her out."

"Does she cough much?"

"At nights she does. Sometimes she hardly sleeps at all. I hoped she would get better in the warm weather, but she did not, and now the winter is coming again I am afraid she will be worse," and the boy's bright face clouded over a little.

"And has she nobody but you to take care of her?"

"No, but I am a very good nurse she says when she is ill."

"I have no doubt you are, but not a very experienced one. How old are you, my dear?"

"Twelve," he answered promptly, and Monk added,

"Just the same as me. When is your birthday, Guy?"

"In April, near the beginning, when is yours?"

"On the twenty-eighth of February—so I am a month and a little bit the oldest."

Mrs. Dangerfield felt as though a mountain weight had just rolled from off her shoulders. The danger was passed—the peril was at an end. She could show kindness to these people without the least fear. Her boy's estate was safe—nothing could disturb him in possession, and this certainty with regard to the lost son was a thousand times better than anything that had gone before. Hitherto she had always felt that some day there might be heavy claims to settle with the family of her husband's brother, claims which it might be far less easy to meet in the future than it would in the present. Now she knew the worst and the worst was not bad at all—only one child, and a widow, who had no legal claim, and who appeared to be in some advanced stage of consumption. The whole world was welcome to remember the wording of the will. Its ambiguous phrases could hurt no one now.

Meantime Guy had led the way into a narrow, dull, but respectable back street, which lay not far from their own comfortable home. He paused at a door of one of the houses, and produced a latch-key in a business-like way.

"They don't have a servant here, so I have my own key. Mother cannot go up and down stairs often, and the landlady has not time to answer too many bells."

"Boys," said Mrs. Dangerfield, turning to her own sons, "you had better take your sister home. If your aunt is not strong she will not want to see so many visitors at once."

Guy looked up gratefully.

"How kind of you to think of that. Perhaps it would tire mother to see so many people at once. But I am sure she would like to see my cousins another day. It sounds so funny for you to call her 'your aunt.'"

And then the boy led the way up a narrow staircase, not by any means brilliantly lighted, till he came to a room on the second floor the door of which he opened, and stood by to let the visitor pass.

"Mother," he said, "this is Mrs. Dangerfield who has come to see you—and she is really my aunt. I thought you would like to to see her, and she wanted to come."

The visitor stepped across the threshold, and found herself in one of those poor little apartments of the "shabby genteel" order, so abundant in the second-rate lodging houses of all great cities. In this particular apartment there were a few traces of taste, a few relics which spoke of better days, a touch here and there which raised it above the dead level of other rooms of its class. Possibly the very delicate and refined face of the one inmate had something to do with the impression produced on the beholder's mind, for there was something in the aspect of the very lovely and fragile invalid lying on the sofa beside the fire that could not but convey the idea of an immense superiority to her surroundings: and when the bright flush of surprise mounted in the wax-like face, there was something almost unearthly in the radiance of its beauty.

Mrs. Dangerfield, the guest, made a step forward, carried out of herself by the rush of compassionate tenderness which came over her at that moment. She was not as a rule a demonstrative woman: but at this moment she could not help herself. She bent down over the invalid, folded her strong arms about her, kissed the brow and hot lips, and said:

"I do not know your name, my dear, but we are sisters, in the right of our husbands, and we are sisters in our widowhood. You must let me love you and take care of you, for the sake of that Guy whom my Charles so tenderly loved to the last."

And Helen Dangerfield, in her weakness and loneliness clung to this strong woman as to a tower of strength, and laying her weary head against the kind supporting shoulder, she murmured,

"O how can I thank you? How can I make you understand my gratitude? If you had only known how I have been longing of late for one true friend—one friend for my boy."

Mrs. Dangerfield understood only too well. One glance into the wasted face told its own tale. The days of this frail woman were obviously numbered, and how could it be otherwise than that she should be in sore trouble for her boy?

"I will be more than a friend," whispered Mrs. Dangerfield. "So long as I am spared your boy shall lack neither a home nor a parent's protecting love. If you have to leave him yourself, at least you shall leave him with his own kindred, who will love him as one of themselves."

All this passed in the softest of whispers, and under that strange stress of feeling that sometimes makes strangers as friends even in the first moment of introduction: and when the invalid had pressed her sister's hand in token of deep gratitude, and had signed to Guy to leave them alone together, she lay back on her pillows as if exhausted, whilst Mrs. Dangerfield talked softly and gently to her, explaining much of the family history of which she had been hitherto ignorant, relating what had passed at Dangerfield Park in recent years, and showing her how her boy had been remembered by his grandfather, and how he was entitled to what seemed to the poorer woman an ample and liberal fortune.

She for her part had but little to tell, and small strength with which to tell it. Her married life had lasted but a brief year, and she knew but little of her husband's family. She seemed reluctant to enter upon that topic at all, and confined her story to the life she had led with her little son. She knew that her life could only now be a question of weeks or months: and the thought of what was to become of her boy had weighed upon her like a nightmare. Small wonder was it then when Mrs. Dangerfield had entered her room that day that she came in the guise of a veritable angel of light.

Amanda Smith's Travels.*

The Famous Colored Evangelist tells the Story of Her Life-Work of Faith.

ONE of the most interesting and instructive books of the season is issued from the press of Meyer & Brother, Publishers, Chicago, and is entitled: "An Autobiography; The Story of the Lord's Dealings with Mrs. Amanda Smith, the Colored Evangelist." It contains an account of her life-work of faith and her travels in England, Ireland, Scotland, India and Africa as an independent missionary. The volume of 506 pages is copiously illustrated and is full of absorbing interest from beginning to end. In an introduction to the work, Bishop Thoburn thus speaks of the author:

"Her homely illustrations, her quaint expressions, her warm-hearted appeals, all possess the supreme merit of being so many vehicles for conveying the living truths of the Gospel of Jesus Christ to the hearts of those who are fortunate enough to hear her.

"A few years after my return to India, in 1876, I was delighted to hear that this chosen and approved worker of the Master had decided to visit this country. She arrived in 1879, and after a short stay in Bombay, came over to the eastern side of the empire, and assisted us for some time in Calcutta. She also returned two years later, and again rendered us valuable assistance.

"The novelty of a colored woman from America, who had in her childhood been a slave, appearing before an audience in Calcutta, was sufficient to attract attention, but this alone would not account for the popularity which she enjoyed throughout her whole stay in our city.

"She was fiercely attacked by narrow-minded persons in the daily papers, and elsewhere, but opposition only seemed to add to her power.

"During the seventeen years that I have lived in Calcutta, I have known many famous strangers to visit the city, some of whom attracted large audiences, but I have never known anyone who could draw and hold so large an audience as Mrs. Smith.

"As she left the country, she could look back upon a hundred homes which were brighter and better because of her coming, upon hundreds of hearts whose burdens had been lightened and whose sorrows had been sweetened by reason of her public and private ministry. She is gratefully remembered to this day by thousands in the land."

How She Went to India.

In her own way, Mrs. Smith tells how she went to India: My going to India came about in this way: I was at Eastbourne, England. Miss Mason has a very pretty home at Eastbourne, by the sea, where tired Christian workers may go for a little change and rest, just as she has in London. To this she invited me for a little rest, as I was weary and needed the change.

While at Eastbourne I had a letter from my friend, Mrs. Dr. Boardman, in London. She said, "Who do you think is in London, and at my house? Lucy Drake. She is on her way back to India."

I had known Miss Drake well years before; and I was so glad to see her again. I called, and we had a good old-fashioned chat, and a season of prayer. She said she had a conviction that the Lord wanted me to go to India. I told her I didn't see it in that light at all. She told me of all her plans, and told me to pray earnestly for light on my own path; "For," she said, "I'm quite sure the Lord wants you to go."

"I have so much work to do here in England," I said, "and calls are coming in constantly from all directions, so that I could not go."

"If the Lord wants you he will make it clear."

"All right."

So we parted. I went on to Perth, Scotland. A few days after, I had a letter from Miss Drake, saying, "The Lord has made it clear to me for you to go to India, and I have told some friends, and they have handed me some money for you for your expenses."

"Well," I said, as I read the letter, "Miss Drake needn't do that, for I am not going to India at all."

I had never prayed a bit about it, although she had told me to do so. A few days later a letter came, saying, "It is wonderful how the Lord is answering prayer about your going to India. Dr. Mahan has just come in and handed me twenty pounds from Lord Mount Temple toward your expenses."

And I said, as I stood by the mantel shelf, reading the letter, "I know the reason Miss Drake thinks the Lord wants me to go with her to India; she is alone, and she doesn't like to travel alone, and it is easy to see the Lord in it; and I don't care, I have work enough to do now, without going off to India; and I'm not going."

Just then a voice seemed to say to me, clear and distinct, "You have been saying you would not go to India all the time, and you have never asked the Lord what his will is."

"That is true," I said, "Oh, Lord, forgive me."

There was no one in the dining room, and just in the corner by the mantel, stood an old-fashioned Scotch arm-chair; I turned and knelt down by it, and burying my face in the cushion, and weeping, I prayed the Lord to forgive me for my impertinence, and if he wanted me to go to India, to make it very clear and plain to me, and I would obey him, and leave all and go. Only I wanted to be sure that it was himself speaking.

I cannot tell how, but as I waited before him, he made it as plain as day to me that I was to go. I praised him, and rose from my knees, without the least shadow of a doubt in my mind.

A Thrilling Experience.

She thus describes a fatal landslide at Naini Tal: Government House was a large house where the Governor lived. It stood on a beautiful hill; and, though it was quite a ways up to Government House, it was beautiful to look from; the sight, when you got up, was charming, every way you would look. So, standing on the veranda, we could look eastward and see Government House quite distinctly, though it was about two and a half or three miles away. And, as Mr. Buck stood looking, he said to me, "Why, Sister Smith, just look at those trees."

And just as I turned to look, the trees were swaying first one way, then another, then all at once there was a crash, and they went down so gracefully, and the earth plowed like a great avalanche.

Well, there was a panic! Everybody left the house, and got out as quickly as he could; the news spread rapidly, and in a little while there were a hundred and fifty or two hundred men, many of them English soldiers, digging, trying to get out a child and nurse; and while they were digging away as hard as they could, and we were lamenting, and feeling the sadness that had come upon this family, the earth gave way again, and buried them.

They didn't see the danger, and we couldn't alarm them; their heads were down as they were digging, and it struck the other part of the hotel and swept on, then it passed on like a great moving mountain; I never saw such a sight; it moved on, carrying great boulders on its face! The next was the large reading-room and post-office that stood on the lake, the Hindoo Temple, and Bell's large store. I had just seen from the veranda some ladies and gentlemen go into the reading-room, and they had not come out; and there were persons in Bell's store whom I knew; one, a lady who was a very earnest Christian. I said to Mr. Buck, "Oh, Bell's store," and I had hardly got the words out of my mouth when it was swept away! Then "The Reading Room" and I had no more than said it till it was taken! "And there goes the Temple next," and there it was in the lake!

The lake was about a half-mile wide, and, perhaps, three miles in length; but the whole thing swept into the lake, and the noise was like the blast of a cannon, and the smoke ascended upwards; it swept everything clear; and there was not a brick of the chimney, or a piece of wood left. The horror of that hour I never want to see again!

Indian Superstitions.

Her observations on morals and religion in India are interesting: Superstition and idolatry, and infidelity, are so rampant it seems the very air one breathes is impregnated with them. Oh, how the dear workers all over, need constantly the fresh anointing of the Holy Ghost, which can and does reveal the almightiness of Jesus to save from all unrighteousness!

I held meetings in a little chapel every night. Our morning prayer was similar to a service; at the ringing of the bell the boys and girls would file in and take their seats, and we would have prayers before they went to work. The Lord gave us great blessing during the week's services. At night the church would be crowded; large numbers of the heathen from the outside came in; many of them seemed to be deeply interested. The Lord wonderfully helped me to speak to them every night; and several of the children professed to be converted.

How often the missionary in different foreign fields comes up against heart-rending scenes, before which they often stand helpless All they can do is to weep with them that weep, and pray with them that don't know how to pray for themselves.

At Madras I saw the great juggernaut car, so well-known in the history of sacrifices in India, whose wheels have crushed so many infants at the hands of their poor mothers. How my heart ached as I listened to the story, told by the Chief of Police. How dreadful is heathen blindness. Thank God that the car of the juggernaut for such sacrifice has come to belong to the things of the past; has been superseded by the glorious light of Christian civilization, and judicious Christian legislation.

The Great Temple at Rangoon.

One of the first things I was struck with at Rangoon, she writes, was the pagoda, or Burmese temple. You can see its dome for two miles away, as you look off, before you get into harbor. The streets of Rangoon are wide and rectangular, like those of Philadelphia, and the shade trees over the city are very graceful.

After being in Burmah a few days I wanted to visit this great temple. So I started, in company with some friends, and after walking some distance from Brother Robinson's house, we came to what I suppose would be called the park. There was an ascent of about seventy-five feet up a series of steps into the pagoda; a gentle ascent, not tiresome. On either side of the way were devotees at prayers, or beggars waiting for their rice; or booths where you could buy false pearls, imitation diamonds, beads, packages of gold leaf, flowers and cakes. The trinkets and flowers are given as offerings to Buddha; the gold leaf was sold for acts of piety.

Oh, how horrid this all seemed to me. I looked at the sad expression on the faces of the poor women devotees, and then I thought that they would go on, and live and die, and never know that Jesus died that they might live and have life and happiness in him.

Inside of this park where the pagoda stands, are thousands of gods, of all sizes. I thought I would count them, and when I got up to a hundred of those that were not broken, I quit. And then to think of the many, many years that the religion of Buddha and Brahma has gone on, and holds such sway yet. To me this is among the incomprehensibles.

I was given a sketch of the Burmese religion. One of the strong points in their religion is the transmigration of the soul. Guadama was the last great man born. He was born six hundred and twenty-five years before Christ, and lived in this world about eighty years. He was the son of Thokedaucareh, king of Burmah. He had previously lived in four hundred million worlds, and had passed through innumerable conditions in each. He had been almost every sort of worm, fly, fowl, fish or animal, and almost every grade of human life. At length he was born, son of the above-named king.

The moment he was born, he jumped upon his feet, and spreading out his arms, exclaimed, "Now I am the noblest of men. This is the last time I shall ever be born."

His ears were so beautifully long they hung on his shoulders. His height was nine cubits. When grown up, his hands reached to his knees; his fingers were of equal length, and with his tongue he could touch the end of his nose!

Suffered Every Minute

Since I came out of the war, with catarrh in my head, chronic diarrhœa and rheumatism," says Mr. J. G. Anderson, a well known blacksmith in the employ of the Pennsylvania Railroad at Scottdale, Pa. Women's Work in Egypt.

The Great Hope is the Education of the Girls—A Year of Progress

MISS ANNA Y. THOMPSON, writing from Egypt to the Women's General Missionary Society, describes the progress made during 1892, and adds: "The great hope for Mohammedan women is in the education of the girls, and there are many in our city schools. There is an effort often made by their friends to keep these girls from learning the Bible, and some are taken out of the school when this request is refused, one man remarking, 'These children are young, and what they learn now, they will never forget.' Do we not realize that the verses and psalms learned orally, when they first enter school, may be like good seed in good soil?

"There are under our mission one hundred and seven schools for children in Egypt, thirteen of which are for girls only. In the villages there are 848 names enrolled, but some are taught in schools for boys. In the other girls' schools there are 1,343 enrolled. These central schools are generally a centre for gatherings in their neighborhoods for prayer-meetings, missionary societies, etc., and also for Bible women. The two boarding-schools are especially good for training the girls in religion and housekeeping, as well as the ordinary branches of education, and it is a pleasure to see how many of these pupils have, for a longer or shorter time, helped in teaching others, or who now exert an influence for good as wives of pastors and teachers. Girls' schools open up many houses for the visits of missionary ladies or Bible women, and it is seldom the children do not have a warm affection for those who taught them, whether native or foreign, and prejudices are removed.

"It has sometimes been said to missionary ladies while conducting the cottage prayer-meetings, by nominal Christians present, 'Why that is in our Bible,' they having been led to think our ideas are so erroneous, we must have a Bible of our own. During the five months that the Coptic patriarch was banished, the women could offer an excuse for not attending their church services, as they feared the curse the patriarch had pronounced against the vicar and all who followed him. The women hear and understand so little, when they do attend, it is not surprising that they are careless about going. Some of the missionary ladies have opportunities to speak to priests about the need of their teaching the women the doctrines of religion when they visit the houses, a thing they are not in the habit of doing. One priest remarked, 'As long as the women are ignorant, their responsibility is less.' There are many earnest pastors in our evangelical church who have meetings for women, however, and also evangelists and teachers who do much in giving line upon line, or verse after verse, to those who are willing to take lessons. These teachers are in some cases young girls who go out to teach, or women who are employing their whole time for it, or it may be that those who give the lessons are blind men, or others who will be acceptable among the women. In the villages there is greater freedom for the women, and there the majority of learners are Protestants, or those who have relatives in our church. In other places the larger number are Copts, and in the cities there are some other religions, including Mohammedans and Jews. In Alexandria there is the largest number of Jewesses taking lessons in their houses, and many children are in the schools. In Cairo, it has so happened that the four Jewish women who take lessons are in the districts where the teachers are young girls, and in both cases the teachers said, 'We are afraid to go to the Jews.' The cause of the fear is not well defined. I have often felt anxious about our young teachers going into all sorts of houses and streets, but God has answered prayers for their safety.

"In making up the statistics for 1892, the following items may be of interest. There are seventy-four different prayer-meetings in a week, held for women, with an average attendance of 1236, of whom 854 are women and 382 girls. Women reported who can lead in prayer in these meetings, 435. The whole number of communicants at the end of the year was 3871, of whom 1575 are women. There are twenty-seven teachers for women, with an enrollment of 988, who are learning to read, or who take regular lessons from a teacher; of these 210 are Protestants, 611 Copts, and 167 of other religions.

"There are seven missionary societies reported: three in Cairo, one in Assiout, one in Monsoura, one in Koos, one in Assouan, and one in Alexandria. The total membership is 290, with subscriptions amounting to $202.35. The money thus collected is partly used for paying the salaries of zenana teachers, there being now three thus employed by presbytery's zenana fund. The work thus done is well spoken of by those who have the superintendence of them, and we hope the sum collected will increase the present year, and more extensive work be done. We have tried to teach the people the duty of giving for the Lord's work, and many of them do nobly. One young teacher lately gave her first month's salary, half to the building of the church in Fisher, and the other half for the church in Nimich.

"The missionary ladies have much to be thankful for in regard to health during the past year, and for opportunities for teaching, either in the various schools and Sunday Schools, or in the houses of the people, and in going from village to village. All are most kindly received everywhere."

MEDICINE IN AN EGG-SHELL.

During a recent tour through Persia Mrs. Bishop spent much time to visiting the sick and prescribing for them Owing to the many cures she was able to accomplish, Mrs. Bishop's fame as a Hekim spread to such an extent that no matter in how secluded a situation she pitched her tent, the crowd of poor creatures found her out. In many of the Bakhtiari villages the people did not possess either bottles or jars, and brought huge copper vessels for half an ounce of eye-lotion. One very poor old woman, afflicted with ophthalmia, came to her crying bitterly, saying that she had nothing in the world but one copper cooking-pot, and so nothing to hold the eye-lotion. Mrs. Bishop had nothing to give her, so she went away, returning in a little while with an egg-shell, having chopped the top neatly off. Mrs. Bishop says: "It is the custom to raise the hands to heaven and invoke blessings on the Hekim's head, but I never have received so many as from this poor creature." So much gratitude for a few spoonsful of lotion seemed out of proportion, but to the poor woman it meant all the difference between light and darkness. People often forget that when they wonder why Christians are so joyous after being illuminated by the Light of the World.

MUTUAL SERVICE.

A switchman in giving an account of his conversion said: "I was signalman at the A—— Junction. One day, just as I had signalled 'clear,' and the express was coming up at full speed, I was horror-struck at seeing a gentleman about to cross the line. I rushed to the door, and shouted with all my might, without attracting his attention. In a frenzy I blew my whistle; this he heard, saw his danger, gave a spring, and just cleared the rails as the express thundered past. He then came up to the signal-box to thank me for having saved his life. 'You have had a very narrow escape,' I said, 'another moment, and what then?' A smile lit up the gentleman's face as he replied, 'I should have been in glory now,' and then putting his hand on my shoulder, he inquired, 'Suppose you were suddenly cut down, would it be glory for you.' 'No, sir,' I said, 'I'm afraid not.' He staved and talked with me, and he seemed so happy and so sure that it would have been all right with him if he had been killed that I envied him and I told him I wished I was like that. In my business we generally go off sudden, and I knew there would be no time to do anything when the end came. He explained to me what I ought to do and the first minute I had to spare I threw myself on my knees, confessed my sins, and cried to God for salvation. He heard my prayer. I rose from my knees a saved man, and since then my life has been a new thing. I am trusting in Christ, and when my time comes I shall go to be with him. The gentleman always drop into my box when he is anywhere near and thanks me for saving his life that day, but I won't admit it. What was that service compared with what he did for me in setting me seeking eternal life?"

THE COST OF A SLACK WIRE.

In the course of recent discussion on the propriety of spending public money for repairs, a certain vote was opposed. One of the advocates of the expenditure related the following incident: A few years ago there was a serious accident on the Lachine Canal at Montreal. The wire from the deck to the engine room of a certain steamer that was passing through the canal had become slack. The officer in charge on deck pulled the wire to ring the bell in the engine room and stop the steamer as she entered one of the locks. The wire being out of order, the bell did not ring, the steamer kept on at full speed, the lock gates were smashed by the collision, the waters were suddenly let out, and many vessels inside were greatly damaged. There was also an obstruction to business for several days at a crowded season of the year, and a great fleet of upward and downward bound craft were detained with very great detriment to their cargoes.

Indeed, the whole loss was estimated roughly at scarcely less than one million and a quarter dollars. The speaker asked his hearers to consider how much would have been saved by spending a quarter of a dollar in having that wire tightened before the catastrophe occurred. Carelessness in such matters sometimes leads to spiritual catastrophe. When in the closet the Christian finds that some fault or secret sin interrupts communion with his God he should never disregard it, but examine himself to see where he is in fault. The way of access by which he speaks with God and receives direction from him can never remain slack without serious danger to the believer.

THE GENTLEMAN'S PSALM.

Very few people would agree exactly in giving a definition of a gentleman. Some have the idea that he is a man who lives on the income of his property and does no work, others have other ideas on the subject. Here is one that was once given by a Christian lady: She was the widow of an officer in the army and was at a review with her young son when several officers who had known her late husband came to talk to her and the conversation ran on former common friends. At last she asked about a certain Captain, who had risen from the ranks by distinguished service. "Oh," said one of the officers, "I don't know anything about him; he's a snob." "A snob!" answered the lady, fired with indignation; "I tell you he was the truest gentleman in the regiment." "Indeed!" said her companion with a sneer; "then, as you seem to be so conversant with the matter, perhaps you will kindly tell us what is a gentleman." Quietly, and without a moment's hesitation, the lady, looking straight in his face, repeated the 15th Psalm. "That is my definition of a gentleman," said she. Her little boy, a mere child of eight or ten, was by. A day or two afterwards she happened to find in his pocket a piece of paper, on which was written out, in his childish hand, the whole of this Psalm, and at the beginning it was headed, "The Gentleman's Psalm."

TEACH ME TO LIVE.

TEACH me to live; 'tis easier far to die,
Sadly and silently to pass away
On earth; to close the heavy, dark'ning eye,
And waken in the realms of endless day.

Teach me that harder lesson—how to live—
To serve thee in the darkest paths of life;
Arm me for conflict now, fresh vigor give,
And make me more than conqueror in the strife.

Teach me to live, thy purpose to fulfil,
Bright for thy glory let my taper shine.
Renew, remould, each day this stubborn will Closer! round thee my heart's affections twine.

Teach me to live, my daily cross to bear,
Nor murmur though I bend beneath its load,
Only be with me, let me feel thee near—
Thy smile sheds gladness on the darkest road.

Teach me to live; no idler let me be,
But in thy service, heart and hand employ;
Prepared to do thy bidding cheerfully,
Be this my highest and my holiest joy.

Teach me to live, with kindly words for all,
Wearing no cold repulsive brow of gloom;
Waiting, with cheerful patience, for the call
That summons me unto my heavenly home.

A YOUNG HERO'S DEATH.

THERE were many instances of personal bravery among the officers and crew of the ill-fated British warship, Victoria, when she was sunk by the Camperdown, but none was more striking or affecting than that related of one of the midshipmen. Herbert Marsden Lanyon was a "middy" on the Victoria, one of the youngest and brightest of the group of merry youths on the great warship. He was seventeen and he had already served on smaller naval vessels so acceptably that he secured promotion. No lad was more loyal or more promising, and his boyish features were the index of a heart at one gentle and fearless. On the day of the fatal collision, midshipman Lanyon was at his post as a petty officer on deck. After the Camperdown had rammed the Victoria, the latter quickly began to settle, and it soon became apparent that she was doomed. Vain efforts were made to keep her afloat, and at last an attempt was made to get out the boats. There was no panic, but when the men realized that they were face to face with death, the word was passed that each must try to save himself quickly. Hundreds sprang overboard into the sea; others clung to the rigging in the vain hope that even yet the threatened disaster might be averted. In that dread moment, when Admiral Tryon saw that his order had caused a terrible calamity, he was passing from the chart-room to the bridge when he saw Midshipman Lanyon at his post of duty. All the others were striving to escape, fearing that the next moment must witness the overturning of the Victoria, when all would be engulfed in the vortex.

The Admiral turned toward the little "middy," who had touched his cap in respectful salute: "Save yourself," he said huskily. "Be quick, my man! Don't you see, she's going down?"

The little "middy" smiled, but did not move. The Victoria was already capsizing, and lay at a fearful angle, her bulwarks gradually sinking to the surface of the waters.

"Quick!" repeated Admiral Tryon, as he pointed to the sea, now alive with swimming sailors.

Again the little "middy" smiled and a halo seemed to hover about the brave young face. "If you please, sir," he said, once more saluting, "I stick to the ship and if I go down, I go down with the Admiral."

Brave young heart! A moment later, with a great lurch and a throb as of a giant in agony, the mighty warship heeled and capsized, and both Admiral and "middy" sunk to rise no more. But whenever the story of the loss of the Victoria is told, when men falter and women weep as they speak of the gallant Tryon who went down with his ship, they recall the heroism of the little midshipman who perished with his Commander rather than desert his post.

AMONG AFRICAN REDS.

In a letter to the London Christian from South Africa is this account of a novel experience in missionary labor: From Lovedale there go out every Sunday small parties of native students, belonging to the theological, evangelists' and teachers' classes, to hold religious services among the heathen natives in their own kraals, distant from two to eight miles. These "reds," as the heathen natives are called on account of their wearing blankets dyed with red clay, and smearing their bodies also with the same substance, will not attend church so the Gospel is carried by the Lovedale men right to their very doors.

Last Sunday I had the privilege of taking part in one of these services. The young man who was to act as my guide and interpreter came around for me at 8.30 A. M., and we started on foot. At the end of a two hours' march we reached the kraal we were bound for. The native hut was shaped like a huge beehive. It would probably measure about 20 feet in diameter, by 15 feet high to the dome, and one low narrow door had to serve also for window, chimney and ventilator. The framework of the hut was of branches of trees, the thick ends of which were stuck into the ground, the tips meeting at the crown of the dome. After the framework is completed, the sides are plastered with mud, and the dome thatched, so that a fairly warm and dry dwelling is the result. Ant-heaps are used for a floor, and when well trodden it becomes almost as hard as a sun-dried brick.

We entered to find a few "reds" inside, and others came straggling in until the congregation numbered forty. They ranged from babies with innocent faces, to old men, sad, haggard, and degraded-looking. Some more of the Lovedale men, who had already been to another kraal, joined us, and I was greatly struck with the contrast between the faces of the "reds" and theirs. A Kaffir hymn was given out, and sung to a tune familiar to my ears, and one could venture to join in, for the hymn was printed in Roman characters, and phonetically spelt. During the singing one woman, was not dressed as a "red," broke down, and sobbed as though her heart were breaking. Prayer followed the hymn, then a short address, spoken in English, and interpreted sentence by sentence into Kaffir.

The service lasted about two hours, several short addresses being given, and all listened to with the greatest attention and respect — at least outwardly. At the close I noticed tears in the eyes of one old man, and was told that he had recently thrown off heathenism, and had accepted Christ.

THE SEED AND THE FRUIT

WHEN the Gospel seed is sown the harvest is sure, but it may be long in coming and may appear in unexpected places. A lady in Melbourne, Australia, had proof of this recently. She says: "I was visiting in the hospital one day in connection with the Flower Mission, when I noticed a new case, a woman with a dark skin and very dark hair. Thinking she was asleep I passed on, but on coming down the ward again she opened her eyes and stretched out her hands for some of my flowers. I gave her some, and found she was one of the Syrian women who carry about small things for sole in the streets. When I asked her if she knew my Saviour her face lit up so brightly, and she said, "Oh, yes!" Then she told me that she had heard about him first, and learned to love him as a little girl in a school at Damascus, and she was now teaching her children about him, too.

"I left her one of my favorite texts, 'Thine eyes shall see the King in his beauty;' and the following Wednesday, directly she saw me, she said so eagerly, 'I remember the text you taught me, and I have been saying it over to myself, "Mine eyes shall see the King in his beauty!" She soon got better and left the hospital, and I have not seen her since, but I have her name (Babea Ceamy) in my Bible; she wrote it herself, that I might remember to pray for her."

Congress and Silver.

Legislators Discussing Measures to Relieve the Financial Stringency — An Impartial History of the Present Trouble.

A MIDSUMMER session of Congress is a most unusual event and is only warranted by the gravest necessity. The condition of national finances and trade has lately been so unsettled that the President, yielding to the very general demand for relief legislation, summoned the national legislature to convene in special session, and both Houses are now busily engaged in discussing the necessary measures to be adopted to relieve the prevalent business distress.

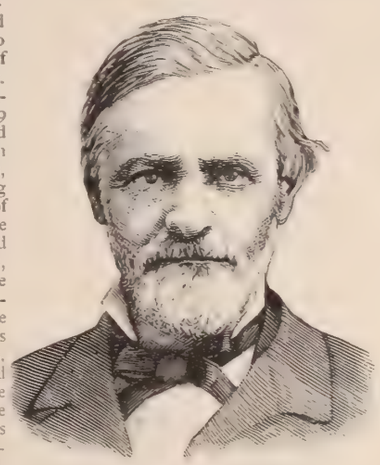
HON. JOHN G. CARLISLE.
Secretary of the Treasury.

At the beginning of 1893, the outlook was fairly encouraging for a prosperous season, the only cloud upon the business horizon being the depreciated condition of our foreign trade. Imports had increased while exports steadily decreased; and the difference between the value of the two, together with the dividends due to foreign investors in American shares and the large sums sent to bankers abroad to be spent by Americans in foreign travel took a great deal of gold out of the country. The return flow of gold was insignificant.

In the last three months of 1892, $25,000,000 in gold were exported, chiefly to Great Britain, and the drafts for 1893 were on an equally heavy scale, the total shipments of gold from January to June, reaching an aggregate of nearly $60,000,000. This stupendous sum came from the National Treasury, being taken out of the reserve fund of $100,000,000 held there for the redemption of legal tender notes, those who were to send it abroad depositing treasury notes in exchange. It soon became evident that, if the rate of withdrawal continued, the government would ultimately be unable to maintain the gold standard, and its credit among the other commercial nations of the world would be greatly impaired in consequence.

This condition of affairs becoming generally known, caused uneasiness in commercial circles, especially among those who held that the gold standard should be rigidly maintained. Meanwhile, the outflow of gold had almost ceased, and the prospects became more favorable; but Wall Street had already begun to feel the effects of the previous depression, and stocks had generally declined. At this juncture it was announced, without the slightest forewarning, that the mints of India (the heaviest consumer of silver abroad) had stopped coining silver. This was followed by an immediate decline in the price of silver bullion to the lowest point ever known, and the demand for silver for export almost simultaneously ceased. The uneasiness previously felt was now succeeded by gloomy apprehensions of disaster. Silver mines shut down, and many Western banks and business houses were obliged to suspend. Mass-meetings in favor of silver were held in the West and a national convention of silver men met in Chicago at which strong speeches were delivered and resolutions were adopted pronouncing for free silver. Meanwhile the entire country awaited hopefully the assembling of Congress on August 7, in the expectation of relief coming through wise legislation.

The history of the events which preceded the present condition of affairs may be stated briefly: In 1878 a bill providing for the coinage of silver was passed by the House of Representatives, amended in the Senate, concurred in by the House and ultimately passed and made a law, despite a Presidential veto. It directed the government to purchase and coin from $2,000,000 to $4,000,000 worth of silver bullion monthly. Under this act, an aggregate of 291,202,019 ounces were purchased and issued either in coin or by paper certificates, the whole representing a currency value of $378,166,795. In June 1890, the Senate passed by a vote of 42 to 25, an Act, permitting the free coinage of silver into legal dollars at the ratio of 16 to 1. This "Free Silver Bill" was, however, set aside, and on July 19, 1890, the "Sherman Act," the present silver law, was substituted as a compromise and passed. Under it the United States Treasury was required to buy 4,500,000 ounces of silver monthly and to coin each month, until July 1, 1891, 2,000,000 ounces. Since the passage of this law, and between Aug. 13, 1890 and June 1, 1893, the government purchased 152,413,792 ounces of silver, which at the present price of the metal, represents $126,503,447—a depreciation of over seventeen million dollars. This enormous quantity of silver, either in coin, or in notes representing silver bars in the Treasury, is now in circulation. For a time the gold reserve in the Treasury was materially decreased, but it afterward again rose to the $100,000,000 mark, when the return tide of gold set in from Europe lately.



U. S. SENATOR, JOHN SHERMAN.
Author of the present Silver Law.

Throughout the West there is a very strong feeling in favor of fixing the ratio between gold and silver at 1 to 16. In the East the sentiment in business circles favors the repeal of the Sherman Act and the stoppage of all purchases and coinage of silver bullion till the depreciated silver dollar regains its former value. Various measures of relief have been suggested and the President, Secretary of the Treasury Carlisle, and other officials have been deluged with advice from all quarters. The Senate, where the silver men are probably in a majority, is the battle-ground of the contest, which has just opened. A strong effort will be made to repeal the Sherman Act and there will be an equally resolute attempt on the part of Western and Southern members to prevent its repeal or to adopt a Free Silver Bill as a substitute. Fortunately the country has sufficient confidence in the wisdom of Congress to warrant the expectation that the interests of the whole and not of any one section, will govern its action in the present crisis, which is one that calls for patriotism rather than partisanship.

Carlisle, Secretary of the Treasury and Hon. John Sherman, the author of the present Silver Law.

The Tabernacle Pulpit

A BOLD CHALLENGE.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., Founded on the Text: Romans viii. 34, "Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea, rather that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us."

THIS is the last sermon I shall ever preach," said Christmas Evans on the 13th of June, 1838. Three days afterward he expired. I do not know what his text was, but I know that no man could choose a better theme—though he knew it was the last time he should ever preach—than the subject found in this text.

Paul flung this challenge of the text to the feet of all ecclesiastical and civil authority. He fearned neither swords nor lions, earth nor hell. Diocletian slew uncounted thousands under his administration, and the world has been full of persecution; but all the persecutors of the world could not affright Paul. Was it because he was physically strong? Oh, no. I suppose he was very much weakened by exposure and maltreatment. Was it because he was lacking in sensitiveness? No; you find the most delicate shades of feeling playing in and out his letters and sermons. Some of his communications burst into tears. What was it that lifted Paul into this triumphant mood? The thought of a Saviour dead, a Saviour risen, a Saviour exalted, a Saviour interceding.

All the world has sung the praise of Princess Alice. One child having died of a contagious disease—she was in the room where another was dying, and the court physician said to her, "You must not breathe the breath of this child, or you yourself will die." But seeing the child mourning because of the death of her brother, the mother stooped down, and in sympathy kissed the little one, caught the disease, and perished. All the world sang the heroism and the self-sacrifice of Princess Alice, but I have to tell you that when our race was dying the Lord Jesus stooped down and gave us the kiss of his everlasting love, and perished that we might live. "It is Christ that died."

Can you tell me how tender hearted Paul could find anything to rejoice at in the horrible death scene of Calvary? We weep at funerals, we are sympathetic when we see a stranger die, when a murderer steps upon the scaffold we pray for his departing spirit; and how could Paul—the great-hearted Paul—find anything to be pleased with at the funeral of a God? Beside that, Christ had only recently died, and the sorrow was fresh in the memory of the world, and how in the fresh memory of a Saviour's death could Paul be exultant?

It was because Paul saw in that death his own deliverance, and the deliverance of a race from still worse disaster; he saw the gap into which the race must plunge, and he saw the bleeding hands of Christ close it. The glittering steel on the top of the executioner's spear in his sight kindled into a torch to light men heavenward. The persecutors saw over the cross five words written in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin; but Paul saw over the cross of Christ only one word—"expiation!" He heard in the dying groan of Christ his own groan of eternal torture taken by another. Paul said to himself, "Had it not been that Christ volunteered in my behalf, those would have been my mauled hands and feet, my gashed side, my crimson temples."

Men of great physical endurance have sometimes carried very heavy burdens—three hundred pounds, four hundred pounds—and they have still said, "My strength is not yet tested; put on more weight." But after awhile they were compelled to cry out, "Stop! I can carry no more." But the burden of Christ was illimitable. First, there was his own burden of hunger, and thirst, and bereavement, and a thousand outrages that have been heaped upon him, and on top of that burden were the sorrows of his poor old mother, and on the top of those burdens the crimes of the ruffians who were executing him. "Stop!" you cry, "it is enough; Christ can bear no more." And Christ says, "Roll on more burdens; roll on me the sins of this entire nation, and after that, roll on me the sins of the inhabited earth, and then roll on me the sins of the four thousand years past, so far as those sins have been forgiven." And the angels of God, seeing the awful pressure, cry, "Stop! He can bear no more." And the blood rushing to the nostril and lip seems to cry out, "Enough! He can endure no more." But Christ says, "Roll on a greater burden—roll on the sins of the next nineteen hundred years, roll on me the sins of all the succeeding ages, roll on me the agonies of hell, ages on ages, the furnaces and the prison-houses and the tortures." That is what the Bible means when it says, "He bore our sins, and carried our sorrows."

"Now," says Paul, "I am free; that suffering purchased my deliverance; God never collects a debt twice: I have a receipt in full; if God is satisfied with me, then what do all the threats of earth and hell amount to? Bring on all your witnesses," says Paul; "show all your force; do your worst against my soul; I defy you; I dare you; I challenge you. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died." Oh, what a strong argument that puts in the hand of every Christian man! Some day all the past sins of his life come down on him in a fiery troop, and they pound away at the gate of his soul, and they say, "We have come for your arrest. Any one of us could overcome you; we are ten thousand strong; surrender!" And you open the door, and single-handed and alone you contend against that troop; you fling this divine weapon into their midst, you scatter those sins as quick as you can think it. "It is Christ that died." Why then bring up to us the sins of our past life? What have we to do with those obsolete things? You know how hard it is for a wrecker to bring up anything that is lost near the shore of the sea; but suppose something be lost half way between Liverpool and New York; it cannot be found, it cannot be fetched up. "Now," says God, "your sins I have cast into the depths of the sea." Mid-Atlantic! All the machinery ever fashioned in foundries of darkness, and launched from the doors of eternal death, working for ten thousand years, cannot bring up one of our sins forgiven and forgotten and sunken into the depths of the sea. When a sin is pardoned, it is gone—it is gone out of the books, it is gone out of the memory, it is gone out of existence. "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more."

From other tragedies men have come away exhausted and nervous and sleepless; but there is one tragedy that soothes and calms and saves. Calvary was the stage on which it was enacted, the curtain of the night falling at midnoon was the drop scene, the thunder of falling rocks the orchestra, angels in the galleries, and devils in the pit the spectators, the tragedy a crucifixion. "It is Christ that died." Oh, triumphant thought!

If you go through the picture galleries of Versailles you will find a great change there. I said to a friend who had been through those galleries, "Are they as they were before the French war?" and I was told there was a great change there; that all that multitude of pictures which represented Napoleonic triumphs had been taken away, and in the frames were other pictures representative of Germanic success and victory. Oh, that all the scenes of Satanic triumph in our world might be blotted out, and that the whole world might be a picture gallery representing the triumphant Jesus! Down with the monarchy of transgression! Up with the monarchy of our King! Hail! Jesus, Hail!

But I must give you the second cause of Paul's exhilaration. If Christ had stayed in that grave we never would have gotten out of it. The grave would have been dark and dismal as the Conciergerie during the Reign of Terror, where the carts came up only to take the victims out to the scaffold. I do not wonder that the ancients tried by embalment of the body to resist the dissolution of death.

The grave is the darkest, deepest, ghastliest chasm that was ever opened if there be no light from the resurrection throne streaming into it; but Christ stayed in the tomb all Friday night and all Saturday, all Saturday night and a part of Sunday morning. He stayed so long in the tomb that he might fit it for us when we go there. He tarried two whole nights in the grave, so that he saw how important it was to have plenty of light, and he has flooded it with his own glory.

It is early Sunday morning, and we start up to find the grave of Christ. We find the morning sun gilding the dew, and the shrubs are sweet as the foot crushes them. What a beautiful place to be buried in! Wonder they did not treat Christ as well when he was alive as they do now that he is dead. Give the military salute to the soldiers who stand guarding the dead. But hark to the crash! an earthquake! The soldiers fall back as though they were dead, and the stone at the door of Christ's tomb spins down the hill, flung by the arm of an angel. Come forth, O Jesus! from the darkness into the sunlight. Come forth, and breathe the perfume of Joseph's garden.

Christ comes forth radiant, and as he steps out of the excavation of the rock I look down into the excavation, and in the distance I see others coming hand-in-hand, and troop after troop, and I find it is a long procession of the precious dead. Among them are our own loved ones—father, mother, brother, sister, companion, children, coming up out of the excavation of the rock until the last one has stepped out into the light, and I am bewildered, and I cannot understand the scene until I see Christ wave his hand over the advancing procession from the rock, and hear him cry, "I am the resurrection and the life; he who believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." And then I notice that the long dirge of the world's woe suddenly stops at the archangelic shout of "Come forth!"

Oh! my friends, if Christ had not broken out of the grave you and I would never come out of it. It would have been another case of Charlotte Corday attempting to slay a tyrant, herself slain. It would have been another case of John Brown attempting to free the slaves, himself hung. It would have been Death and Christ in a grapple, and Death the victor. The black flag would have floated on all the graves and mausoleums of the dead, and hell would have conquered the forces of Heaven, and captured the ramparts of God, and Satan would have come to coronation in the palaces of Heaven, and it would have been devils on the throne and sons of God in the dungeon.

No! no! no! When that stone was rolled from the door of Christ's grave, it was hurled with such a force that it crashed in all the grave-doors of Christendom, and now the tomb is only a bower where God's children take a siesta, an afternoon nap, to wake up in mighty invigoration. "Christ is risen." Hang that lamp among all the tombs of my dead. Hang it over my own resting-place. Christ's suffering is ended; his work is done. The darkest Friday afternoon of the world's history becomes the brightest Sunday morning of its resurrection joy. The Good Friday of bitter memories becomes the Easter of glorious transformation and resurrection.

> Ye mourning saints, dry every tear
> For your departed Lord.
> Behold the place: He is not here;
> The tomb is all unbarred.
> The gates of death were closed in vain,
> The Lord is risen, he lives again.

I give you the third cause of Paul's exhilaration. We honor the right hand more than we do the left. If in accident or battle we must lose one hand, let it be the left. The left hand being nearer the heart, we may not do much of the violent work of life with that hand without physical danger; but he who has the right arm in full play has the mightiest of all earthly weapons. In all ages and in all languages the right hand is the symbol of strength and power and honor. Hiram sat at the right hand of Solomon, Then we have the term, "He is a right-hand man." Lafayette was Washington's right-hand man; Marshal Ney was Napoleon's right-hand man; and now you have the meaning of Paul when he speaks of Christ who is at the right hand of God.

That means he is the first guest of Heaven. He has a right to sit there. The Hero of the universe! Count his wounds; two in the feet, two in the hands, one in the side—five wounds. O you have counted wrong. These are not half the wounds. Look at the severer wounds in the temples; each thorn an excruciation.

If a hero comes back from battle, and he takes off his hat, or rolls up his sleeve, and shows you the scar of a wound gotten at Ball's Bluff, or at South Mountain, you stand in admiration at his heroism and patriotism; but if Christ should make conspicuous the five wounds gotten on Calvary—that Waterloo of all the ages—he would display only a small part of his wounds. Wounded all over, let him sit at the right hand of God. He has a right to sit there. By the request of God, the Father, and the unanimous suffrage of all Heaven, let him sit there. In the grand review, when the redeemed pass by in cohorts of splendor, they will look at him and shout "Victory!"

The oldest inhabitant of Heaven never saw a grander day than the one when Christ took his place on the right hand of God. Hosanna! With lips of clay I may not appropriately utter it, but let the martyrs under the altar throw the cry to the elders before the throne, and they can toss it to the choir on the sea of glass until all Heaven shall lift it—some on point of sceptre, and some on string of harp and some on the tip of the green branches. Hosanna! Hosanna!

A fourth cause of Paul's exhilaration: After a clergyman had preached a sermon in regard to the glories of Heaven and the splendors of the scene, an aged woman said: "If all that is to go on in Heaven, I don't know what will become of my poor head." Oh! my friends, there will be so many things going on in Heaven, I have sometimes wondered if the Lord would not forget you and me!

Perhaps Paul said sometimes: "I wonder God does not forget me down here in Antioch, and in the prison, and in the shipwreck. There are so many sailors, so many wayfarers, so many prisoners, so many heartbroken men," says Paul, "perhaps God may forget me. And then I am so vile a sinner. How I whipped those Christians! with what vengeance I mounted that cavalry horse and dashed up to Damascus! Oh! it will take a mighty attorney to plead my cause and get me free." But just at that moment there came in upon Paul's soul something mightier than the surges that dashed his ship into Melita, swifter than the horse he rode to Damascus. It was the swift and overwhelming thought of Christ's intercession.

My friends, we must have an advocate. A poor lawyer is worse than no lawyer at all. We must have one who is able successfully to present our cause before God. Where is he? Who is he? There is only one advocate in all the universe that can plead our cause in the last judgment—that can plead our cause before God in the great tribunal.

Sometimes in earthly courts attorneys have specialties, and one man succeeds better in patent cases, another in insurance cases, another in criminal cases, another in land cases, another in will cases, and his success generally depends upon his sticking to that specialty. I have to tell you that Christ can do many things; but it seems to me that his specialty is to take the bad case of the sinner and plead it before God until he gets eternal acquittal. Oh! we must have him for our advocate.

But what plea can he make? Sometimes an attorney in court will plead the innocence of the prisoner. That would be inappropriate for us; we are all guilty! guilty! Unclean! unclean! Christ, our advocate, will not plead our innocence. Sometimes the attorney in court tries to prove an alibi. He says: "This prisoner was not at the scene; he was in some other place at the time." Such a plea will not do in our case. The Lord found us in all our sins, and in the very place of our iniquity. It is impossible to prove an alibi. Sometimes an attorney will plead the insanity of the prisoner, and say he is irresponsible on that account. That plea will never do in our case. We sinned against light, against knowledge, against the dictates of our own consciences; we knew what we were doing. What then shall the plea be?

The plea for our eternal deliverance will be Christ's own martyrdom. He will say: "Look at all these wounds. By all these sufferings I demand the rescue of this man from sin and death and hell. Constable, knock off the shackles—let the prisoner go free." "Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea, rather that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us."

But why all this gladness on the faces of these sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty? I know what you are thinking of. A Saviour dead, a Saviour risen, a Saviour exalted, a Saviour interceding. "What," say you, "is all that for me?" All! all! Never let me hear you complaining about anything again. With your pardoned sin behind you, and a successful Christ pleading above you, and a glorious heaven before you, how can you be despondent about anything?

"But," says some man in the audience, "all that is very good and very true for those who are inside the kingdom; but how about those of us who are outside?" Then I say, Come into the kingdom, come out of the prison-house into the glorious sunlight of God's mercy and pardon, and come now.

It was in the last days of the reign of terror, the year 1793. Hundreds and thousands had perished under the French guillotine. France groaned with the tyrannies of Robespierre and the Jacobin Club. The last group of sufferers had had their locks shorn by Monchotte, the prison barber, so that the neck might be bare to the keen knife of the guillotine. The carts came up to the prison, the poor wretches were placed in the carts and driven off toward the scaffold; but while they were going toward the scaffold there was an outcry in the street, and then the shock of fire-arms, and then the cry, "Robespierre has fallen! Down with the Jacobins! Let France be free!" But the armed soldiers rode in upon these rescuers, so that the poor wretches in the carts were taken on to the scaffold, and horribly died. But that very night these monsters of persecution were seized, and Robespierre perished under the very guillotine that he had reared for others, all France clapping their hands with joy as his head rolled into the executioner's basket. Then the axes of the excited populace were heard pounding against the gates of the prison, and the poor prisoners walked out free.

My friends, sin is the worst of all Robespierres; it is the tyrant of tyrants; it has built a prison-house for our soul; it plots our death; it has shorn us for the sacrifice, but, blessed be God, this morning we hear the axes of God's gracious deliverance pounding against the door of our prison. Deliverance has come. Light breaks through all the wards of the prison. Revolution! Revolution! "Where sin abounded, grace does much more abound, that whereas sin reigned unto death, even so grace may reign unto eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." Glorious truth! A Saviour dead, a Saviour risen, a Saviour exalted, a Saviour interceding!

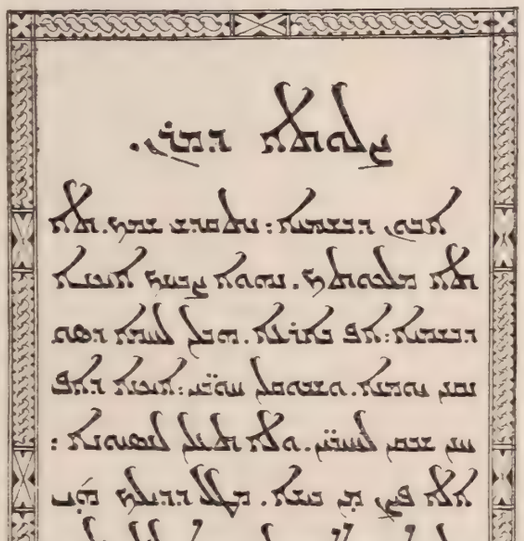
CHRIST IN THE VILLAGE.

A SINGULAR incident reported by a catechist in India appears in the Missionary Herald. The evangelist while on a tour came to a village and began to talk with some boys about Jesus Christ. The boys said to him: "Jesus Christ lives here in our village." It seems that the man so called had once heard about Jesus Christ, and as a result had abandoned idolatry. His frequent reference to Jesus Christ made the villagers call him by that name. He knew little of Christianity but was anxious to learn more.

A Scribe From the East.

Moses of Oroomiah and his Beautiful Art—Writing for Royalty in Europe and Asia.

AMONG the Orientals who have recently come to the United States, there are not a few who belong to very ancient and distinguished families. One such visitor, who is now stopping in New York, is "Deacon" Moses, of the city of Oroomiah, in Persia. Moses, who is the son of Abdee-Eshooh (the Servant of Christ), was born at Oroomiah about sixty-five years ago. His father combined the pursuits of merchandise and farming. In his childhood Moses received some training at the Mission schools. He afterward became a teacher in the schools of the American Mission in Persia, and later in life was appointed Inspector of Mission schools and evangelical colporteur. For a time he held the position of teacher at Salmas, and conducted evangelical services in the villages of that district. On account of his skill in languages he was chosen as private tutor by Rev. Dr. Wright an American missionary in Persia to Malik Casim Mirza, a native prince. Kasim was a fata-li-shah, or petty monarch, and it was his wish to be instructed in both English and Syriac, which Moses did satisfactorily.



THE LORD'S PRAYER IN SYRIAC.

Written for "The Christian Herald" by Deacon Moses, the Scribe.

Early in life, Moses gave evidence of wonderful talent as a scribe, and his services as teacher of writing were in great demand. In ornamental writing, which is held in high esteem in the East, he also excelled and occasionally has been summoned by kings and princes who desired to use his art. In 1877, while in St. Petersburg, he wrote for the Emperor, the Lord's Prayer in nine languages, and for Prince Peter of Wurtemberg in fourteen languages. Alexander II. (the father of the present Czar), prized the writing highly and sent Moses 150 roubles, Prince Peter also making him a substantial present. He also executed similar writings for Queen Victoria, and the English Archbishops of Canterbury and York. He is master of a number of languages, being specially proficient in Syriac, English, Turkish, Persian and Russian.

The family from which "Deacon" Moses is descended, is probably one of the oldest in existence, and traces its origin back almost to the first century of the Christian era. His ancestors, he says, have always been Christians, and have suffered persecution and exile on account of their religion, yet have always remained steadfast in the faith. His parents on both sides were Christian Syrians, and claim direct descent from the disciples. "Deacon" Moses (he is popularly known by that title in Oroomiah), is now very poor. Before coming to America he had encountered a series of misfortunes, including failure in crops, oppression and robbery by brigands. He earns a somewhat precarious livelihood here by his beautiful penmanship, and his illuminated Scripture texts are still so gracefully designed and executed, that it is quite apparent that age has not robbed him of his art. Along with his photograph (on this page), we give an excellent specimen of his writing in Syriac, the characters, he declares, being the same as those used in the time of our Lord. This writing he has executed expressly for the benefit of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A DREARY NIGHT IN THE TRANSVAAL.

IN describing a journey of a thousand miles in Southeastern Africa from which he has recently returned, Mr. F. Turner, a colporteur of the Bible Society, says:

"The Dutch farmers are very fond of their Bibles, and have family prayers morning and evening. I remember one place I called at, the old 'vrouw,' pulled down an old Bible all in pieces and quite worn out, and with tears trickling down her cheeks, said she had 'niet geldt' (no money), and the print was too small and that she could not read it any more; so I supplied her with a Bible with large print, for which she was very grateful. They are also very hospitable; one is always welcome to take his meals with them, and they would never think of charging you anything, except for forage, which is very dear. The greatest difficulty I had was getting forage for the horses, on account of the locusts, which had destroyed nearly everything. When I left Johannesburg and started for Pretoria, I had a load of books weighing nearly eight hundred pounds. I called at the different farms on the way, where I was well received. Before I reached Pretoria, I was overtaken with a terrific thunderstorm, which soiled a great number of books. The storm increased, the 'veld' was one great swamp, so I was obliged to outspan. Having no food for myself or forage for the horses, I tied the horses to the cart; but the noise of the thunder was so terrific that it caused the horses to break their halters and bolt, and you may imagine I was in a dreadful plight. For four hours in that dark night I sought those horses in the swamp, drenched to the skin, with no other light than a flash of lightning, which lit up the country now and again. I was obliged to return to the cart, and feeling the intense loneliness of my situation, I turned my thoughts to the ever-present God, and prayed most earnestly for the return of my horses, after which I felt comforted, though I could not sleep. At the break of day I looked out, and to my great joy I saw the horses standing near the cart. You may imagine how grateful I was for this deliverance."

PAUL BEFORE AGRIPPA.

S S. Lesson for Aug. 27. Acts 26: 19-32. Golden Text, 1 Cor. 1: 24. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

TWO years of imprisonment at Cæsarea had not changed Paul. Still to him to live was Christ, in prison or out of prison. The work of God in conforming him to the image of his Son was not to be stopped by any outward circumstances, and, as an instrument of the Holy Ghost in the ministry of prayer, Paul was exercising an unspeakable influence upon the churches. Man may seek to rule, but God can overrule all which happens; all men, all circumstances are only so many tools in the hands of God by which he works out his will. Paul knew this, and therefore he could not have fretted at the apparent loss of time in his detention in Cæsarea.

At the end of this time there was a change in the government. Festus succeeded Felix as governor of Judea. The first visit which this new governor paid to Jerusalem, the chief city of his province, was utilized by the chief priests and the principal men of the Jews to lodge a complaint against Paul. Two years had not cured them of their murderous intentions, and they requested that Paul might be brought to Jerusalem only that their plans of lying in wait to kill him might be carried out. But in than any to which they could carry their appeal it had been decided and made known to Paul: "As thou hast testified of me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also in Rome." Neither priests nor governors had power to alter this purpose made in the court of heaven. It was of God's ordering that Festus did not yield to them, but commanded them to accompany him to Cæsarea, where, on the morrow after his arrival, Paul was brought up. The charges lodged against him were but a repetition of those which Felix had heard, and his defence was similar. In those days, as in these, corruption crept into courts of law, and Festus, not because it was just, but because he wanted to curry favor with the Jews, asked Paul: "Wilt thou go up to Jerusalem, and there be judged of these tnings before me?". "I stand before Cæsar's judgment seat, where I ought to be judged," was the Apostle's reply: "to the Jews have I done no wrong as thou very well knowest. For if I be an offender, or committed anything worthy of death, I refuse not to die: but if there be none of these things whereof they accuse me, no man may deliver me unto them. I appeal unto Cæsar." "Hast thou appealed unto Cæsar? Unto Cæsar shalt thou go."

Such was the defence of Paul and such was its effect. He saw the purpose of his God behind the vindictiveness and injustice of the Jews and behind the weakness and insincerity of Festus. And while apparently subject to caprice of men in authority on earth, Paul saw God's way made for him to bear witness in Rome. What was it to him that instead of traveling thither with letters of commendation from all the churches, he should arrive as a prisoner waiting for his trial? His reputation was the property of him who had bought him

Remanded by Festus as he had been by Felix, the trial of Paul's patience was not at an end. But a man who does not deal with men and things, who has been translated "out of the kingdom of darkness," out of things seen and temporal, into "the kingdom of the Son of his love," things unseen and eternal, does not count time as other men count it. Paul was not in a hurry; he could Wait God's Time.

King Agrippa or Herod Agrippa who also governed Judea, came down to Cæsarea, and Festus mentioned Paul's case to him and his own perplexity regarding it. So deeply interested was Agrippa, that he desired to judge the case himself. Festus and Agrippa made this trial of Paul an opportunity for pomp and display, perhaps to indulge their own vanity, perhaps partly with the idea of impressing Paul with their authority and power. Vain attempt! Festus opened the case by an explanation that he had already heard all the urgent charges of the Jews from Jerusalem and also from Cæsarea, but that finding in him nothing worthy of death, and that Paul himself had appealed unto Cæsar, he was determined to send him, but found himself in the embarrassing position of sending a prisoner to the supreme court of Rome without any power "to signify the crimes laid to his charge;" and he requested Agrippa to examine him that he might have something to write. What a testimony to a man of God! How like Daniel of old! But how much more like the Lord himself, who, when brought before these different tribunals, was hurried away to the cross Completely Uncondemned.

This is the calling of all his followers: to "be blameless and harmless, the sons of God without rebuke in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, among whom ye shine as lights in the world, holding forth (i.e., witnesses and illustrations of) the Word of life." The examination of the prisoner was all they had to go upon. Thus the king, addressing Paul, said: "Thou art permitted to speak for thyself." Twenty-three years before, God had said of Paul to Ananias: "Here is a chosen vessel unto me to bear my name before the Gentiles and kings and the children of Israel." Before the children of Israel and the Gentiles Paul had long had his place of testimony, but it was only now that he had his first opportunity to testify before a king: he could not but say, "I think myself happy, king Agrippa." This was an unusual commencement of the defence of an accused party; the circumstances the personality, all was unusual: this man was a representative of the crucified, risen, ascended Son of God. Speaking first of his well known strictly religious life, he continued: "And now I stand, and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers: unto which promise our twelve tribes instantly serving God day and night, hope to come. For which hope's sake king Agrippa I am accused of the Jews."

That is, the only difference between us is that what they hold as a doctrine is a living, practical reality to me, I live in the power of it, and shape my life accordingly. "Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?" From speaking of the resurrection Paul went on to speak of the risen One whose resurrection condemned the Jews as the murderers of Jesus the Son of God: "I understand these accusing Jews: I also vainly thought I ought to do many things contrary to Jesus of Nazareth, and he told the plain unvarnished story of his cruel but conscientious persecution of the disciples of Jesus of Nazareth, and then the revelation from heaven which arrested him on the way to Damascus cutting short his career as a persecutor and changing him into a broken, humble witness for his Lord.

Paul's simple narrative was: "Whereupon, O, King Agrippa, I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision." Oh, if God reveals himself, if he draws near to a soul, it is worth everything to that soul to keep open the already opened heaven, and to let nothing come in to hinder communion with God. Paul added, "But showed first unto them of Damascus, and at Jerusalem, and throughout all the coasts of Judea, and then unto the Gentiles, that they should repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance. For these causes the Jews caught me in the temple and went about to kill me." Unreal professors hate nothing so much as reality. Those who have a name to live and are dead, who have a form of Godliness, but deny the power thereof, cannot forgive God's true children for possessing a power to which they are strangers, but the effect of which they see and feel.

But Paul in all his defence had not so much an eye to prove himself innocent as to show the King Agrippa the reality of faith in Christ: "Having therefore obtained help of God, I continue unto this day, witnessing both to small and great, saying none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come that Christ should suffer, and should be the first to rise from the dead, and should show light unto the people and to the Gentiles." God was speaking through his servant: to the material mind of Festus, it was the raving of a madman, the governor had no spiritual sense, the king, however, had studied the Jewish scripture, he knew the history of Jesus, he was acquainted with the Christians! "The king knoweth of these things, before whom I speak freely; for I am persuaded that none of these things were hidden from him." And then, under the guiding of the Spirit, the God-filled prisoner turned upon his royal judge and said, "King Agrippa, believest than the prophets? I know that thou believest," and the king replied, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." Almost! but only almost. Paul had borne his testimony the blood of Agrippa would not be required at the hand of Paul. But the king's soul? Oh, if he had bowed as the king of Nineveh in Jonah's time and repented in dust and ashes, he might have been saved.

A Roman Judgment Seat.

THE charges against Paul remained in abeyance until Felix was removed from office. As neither the prisoner nor his friends would bribe the Governor, he left the case unsettled. Porcius Festus was the successor of Felix and he arrived at Cæsarea, according to Roman records in June of the year 60. Paul at that time was about fifty-eight years old. On Festus visiting Jerusalem, the Jews renewed their appeal to have Paul put to death, but Festus, who was a typical Roman official insisted on the forms of law being observed. From the remarks Festus afterward made to Agrippa, it appeared that he was disgusted with the trial which ensued. The Jews had no such charges to make as Festus expected from their acrimony and their clamor for Paul's blood. The difference between Paul and the Jews appeared to the sceptical Roman only the difference between one superstition and another. It was not a question for a Governor to decide and Festus proposed that Paul go to Jerusalem where such matters could be handled by experts. But Paul was too wary; he had already narrowly escaped assassination under such a scheme. He appealed to the highest tribunal of all, to the Emperor himself. This appeal, which was Paul's right as a Roman citizen, embarrassed the Governor. He could not draw an indictment against a man whose offense appeared to be harmless fanaticism. The one point which his mind had grasped was that the Jews said that Jesus was dead and Paul said that he was alive. To the Roman Governor it must have seemed a matter of small importance whether Jesus was dead or alive. Nevertheless, questions of Jewish law might be involved, although he could not understand them, and as it was important at the beginning of his term he should gain the confidence of the Jews, he did not dismiss the case as he was inclined to do. While the matter was still in suspense, Herod Agrippa who governed the north eastern district of Palestine came with his sister Bernice to pay their respects to the new Governor. Agrippa, if he was not actually a Jew, was familiar with Jewish law and might understand the questions which so puzzled Festus. The case was accordingly submitted to Agrippa, who expressed a wish to hear Paul himself. Accordingly a court was held; Festus presided, Agrippa and Bernice were in the place of honor, the townspeople came to listen and Paul was invited to speak. It was an imposing audience, but Paul did not make any oratorical display. In simple, dignified language he explained his former attitude on religious questions and described the circumstances of his conversion, which had led him, not to abandon his faith, but to hold it more intelligently and then occurred the conversation between the prisoner and his august hearers which forms the subject of the lesson.

That they should repent and turn to God. Paul never failed in urging this duty, and he did so on occasions when it might seem likely that he would injure his own case, as when he preached before Felix. It is often the kindest thing one friend can do for another to urge him to repent and turn to God. A dying nobleman once sent for the clergyman whose ministry he attended and said to him: "Did you not know that my life was licentious and that I was living in violation of God's commandment?" The clergyman was confused, but finally answered, "Yes, my lord." The nobleman then asked, "Why, oh, why did you not warn me of my danger?" "Your kindness to me and my family," said the clergyman deterred me from reproving you." The nobleman looked at him reproachfully and said, "My kindness? Why my kindness to you ought to have been a claim on you for faithfulness to my best interests. You saw me on the edge of a precipice and because I had been kind to you, you did not warn me! Now my soul will be lost."

Having obtained help of God I continue. Paul was perfectly aware of the source of his strength. He knew, as every true Christian knows, that his continuing in the faith is the result of the help God gives. With that help, the weakest become strong. About two centuries ago, one Margaret Wilson, a girl of eighteen, along with an aged widow of sixty-three, was doomed to die for insisting that Christ alone was the head of the Church. They were to be fastened to stakes driven into the oozy sand that covered the beach, and left to perish in the rising tide. The stake to which the aged woman was fastened, was farther down the beach than that of the young woman, in order that, being sooner destroyed, her expiring sufferings might shake the firmness of Margaret Wilson. The tide began to flow, the waters swelled and mounted to the chin of the old woman, and when almost stifled by the rising tide, they put to the girl the question, "What think you of your friend now?" "What do I see," she answered, "but Christ in one of his members, wrestling there? Think you that we are the sufferers? No, it is Christ in us, he who sendeth us not a warfare on our own charges."

Witnessing both to small and great. That is the duty of every one who loves Christ. There is no way in which one can serve him better than by telling others how good and kind we have found him to be. It is related that a sceptical lawyer once went into a testimony meeting and took notes of the testimonies given. He did so to ridicule religion and have sport; but the testimony so overpowered his heart that at the close of the service he arose and said: "My friends, I hold in my hand the testimony of no less than sixty persons who have spoken here this morning, who all testify with one consent that there is a divine reality in religion, and that they have experienced it in their own hearts. Many of these persons I know. Their testimony would be received in any court of justice. Lie they would not, I know; and mistaken they cannot all be. I have been sceptical as to these things, but now I am convinced as to their truth, and must lead a new life. Will you pray for me?"

That Christ should suffer. It was necessary for the salvation of men. The grandeur of his character is seen in his being willing to give himself as a sacrifice that the world might have life. Near a little town in Switzerland an army of Austrians was observed approaching to take possession. A small band of the brave Swiss determined to resist them, but were compelled to give way to superior force. Seeing this, the brave Arnold Von Winkelried exclaimed to his countrymen: "I will open a path to freedom! Protect, dear comrades, my wife and children!" He pressed forward, and gathering in his arms as many spears as he could grasp, buried them in his bosom. The Swiss rushed forward and gained the victory. Arnold Von Winkelried fell, but saved his country.

Believest thou the prophets? It was an important question because if Agrippa believed them Paul had a basis for argument with him which he did not have in arguing with Festus. Bishop Watson relates that in a public disputation between a Jew and a Christian at Venice, the Jew, who was a rabbi of eminence assailed the character of Christ. The Christian replied by an appeal to the prophets, laying special stress on Daniel's prophecy of the weeks (Dan. 9: 25). The rabbi refused to argue on those lines and finally repudiated the whole book of Daniel. "If we admit the truth and authenticity of Daniel," he said, "we shall all become Christians."

A Peep into China. • • •

Missionary Gilbert Reid Tells of its Tombs, its Temples, and its Peculiar People—An Interesting Book.

IN these days of widespread missionary activity, books of travel, exploration and evangelistic enterprise are multiplied, but amid the multitude of such publications, there are probably few that will be read with keener interest than the volume entitled: Glances at China, by the Rev. Gilbert Reid, M. A., of the American Presbyterian Board at Chi-nan-fu, issued from the presses of the Religious Tract Society of London, and published in this country by Fleming H. Revell Co., of New York.* Through the courtesy of the publishers we are enabled to reproduce several of the illustrations, with accompanying extracts. Mr. Reid's book is aptly named, for he has certainly given his subject an amount of study and familiar consideration which enables him to present in a nutshell a series of features of Chinese life and character that are extremely attractive as well as instructive. His first "peep" is at the chief port of the empire, Shanghai, with its 400,000 population, native and foreign, its brazen-vices, its home life and its missions. He rapidly and entertainingly sketches the social life of the people, their festivals and amusements, their schools, their weddings, etc. Concerning one of the latter he writes as follows:

A Native Chinese Cart.

A CHINESE WEDDING.

Bride and groom were both Christians. The wedding-day has arrived. The bride, who had not yet spoken to her intended, shed in the morning a few tears, looked miserable, and feigned meekness. This also was a Chinese custom, and, under the circumstances, was also quite Christian. At last the hour has come. The guests, Chinese and foreign, are gathered together in a foreign house, silent as before a funeral. The bridegroom is led in by one door, and the bride by another. He is arrayed in silks and satins, hired for the occasion; and she, her face hid by a veil, is dressed in red raiment, not hired, but partly borrowed, with here and there a garment given by wealthy missionaries, myself attempting to be of that number.

Now comes the real Christian part. The minister reads the service. The questions are put. The man promises to take this woman—whom he does not hold by the hand—and this, too, whether she is "ugly or beautiful," the last being a Chinese modification of the service. The woman promises to take this man,—whom she does not hold by the hand,—and this whether he is "rich or poor." Then instead of looking at each other square in the face, and kissing each other just as squarely, they kneel on the floor and knock their heads, first to the officiating clergyman, and then before a few of the better guests. After the religious ceremony the married couple take their seats in two finely-covered sedan chairs, and start for a Chinese house, where they are to remain for a few days, trying to make each other's acquaintance. We all accompanied the procession. Rumor says that after every one had left, the married folks spoke to each other—for the first time.

A NATIVE INN.

An inn on a main road in a large village on a market-day is reached. You leave your animals to feed in the court, and you enter the best guest-room. Soon voices are heard outside. The miniature menagerie, the living orang-outang, is inside. The door is pushed open, and the gazers gaze. One man, braver than the rest, enters. The man is a Chinaman, trained according to a code of etiquette which, if practised, would be nowhere displeasing. You remember the fact, and so, in due politeness, arise, and with hands clasped in front, bow profoundly. The man bows, but says nothing. Your food and tea are on the table, and no gentleman would intrude himself at such a time. You adopt the Chinese expedient, and ask him to drink tea. Instead of taking the hint, and excusing himself and politely retiring, he remains steadfastly gazing. You inquire his "honorable name," and continue to bow. He replies to your question, but does not leave. You then pause, look at the man straight in the eye without wavering; and soon the man wavers, looks around, up at the ceiling, back at your glaring eye, out at his companions, and then decides, by a law of necessity rather than politeness, to leave. Your foreign device has succeeded.

You now sit down, and take your meal in peace—for a moment. Another man enters, and another, and another, until, alas! your room is filled. You decide to forbear. You will show yourself friendly. Now the show begins. One man—the tiger-trainer—feels your shoes, and makes a suggestion. Another man—the snake-charmer—lifts up your coat and investigates the close-fitting under apparel—a strange phenomenon to a Chinaman. A third takes off your hat and looks for a tail. The exhibition is now interesting. Conversation is brisk. The specimen—ah! strange to say—it too can talk. They now praise your language. They ply you with questions. They seem about as ignorant of Europe as some Europeans seem of China. "Does your country have any sun?" "Is Jesus your King there?" "Is England as large as this province?" "Did opium come from there?" "Do you till the soil?" "Do you have rice?" The circus now begins to close. The spectators move. All leave; and you now finish your meal.

RELIGIONS.

First in time of origin comes Taoism, founded by the philosophical treatises of the reformer, Lao-tse, in the seventh century before Christ. The divinities of to-day are chosen according to none of the directions of their illustrious teacher, but, with the old speculation and contemplation cherished in asceticism, have mingled during the succeeding centuries magic, astrology, and other ideas, that are meant to satisfy uneasy hearts and ever-present superstition. The teachings two thousand four hundred years ago may be compared to the Essenism of Palestine, or the Gnosticism of Alexandria, or the Mysticism of later days; but modern Taoism is only a "motley chaos," disgusting to the philosophic mind.

Next comes Confucianism—the system of moral and political well-doing that came forth from the earnest soul of Confucius, the practical reformer of the sixth century before Christ. He visited the founder of Taoism, and heard his lamentations of the depraved age and his proposals for purification; but on returning to his home, in sincere veneration of the generations before him, he combined the best teachings of the past, and then added to them others of his own. Confucianism remains to-day much the same as when fashioned by Confucius and his disciples, except more astray as to God and the future, and more contaminated by idolatries and superstitions that other religions.

Chinese Temple and Pagoda.

"THE LIGHT OF ASIA."

In the year 67 of the Christian era, an embassy which had been sent forth by an emperor to find some "holy one" in the West, returned from India, bringing the apostles of Buddhism. If this religion ever deserved the title, "The Light of Asia," it was certainly long before it possessed Asia. The Buddhism of to-day, like the Taoism of to-day, has rolled mounds of rubbish on the many seeds of truth dropped by this self-denying reformer among the Brahmins of India; and while seeking to adapt foreign teachings to the Chinese mind, it has so far lost its own distinct character that to be a worshipper in Buddhist temples does not exclude worship before Taoist altars or Confucian tablets.

Taoism, Buddhism, and Confucianism—the three recognized religions of long standing—now hide their differences and incompatibilities, and seek to be one. In the first part of the sixth century came Nestorian missionaries. Next, in the eighth or ninth centuries, came Mohammedanism by the way of the sea; and to-day there are over ten millions of converts in different parts of China, but especially in the western province.

TWO FAMOUS TEMPLES.

As to the native sights at Peking, the palace, the Temple of Heaven, and the Lama Temple—the most attractive of all—are for the most part closed to foreigners, unless money, force, or favor overcome the gatekeepers. The Temple of Heaven may, however, be seen from the south wall of the southern city—the magnificent altar, with its white marble, rising forth distinctly amid the shade of the surrounding trees, and representing the highest forms of worship that China has to-day—that of the ruler of the nation to the higher Power of

WALL STREET.

THE great business disasters of this country have come from the work of godless speculators and infamous stock-gamblers. The great foe to business in New York and Brooklyn is crime. When the right shall have hurled back the wrong, and shall have purified the commercial code, and shall have thundered down fraudulent establishments, and shall have put into the hands of honest men the keys of business, blessed time for the bargain-makers. I am not talking an abstraction, I am not making a guess. I am telling you God's eternal truth.

Across the island of New York, in 1685, a wall made of stone and earth, and cannon-mounted, was built to keep off the savages. Along by that wall a street was laid out, and as the street followed the line of the wall, it was appropriately called Wall Street. It is narrow, it is short, it is unarchitectural, and yet its history is unique. Excepting Lombard Street, London, it is the mightiest street on this planet. There the Government of the United States was born. There Washington held his levees. There Mrs. Adams and other brilliant women of the Revolution displayed their charms. There Witherspoon and Jonathan Edwards and George Whitefield sometimes preached. There Dr. Mason chided Alexander Hamilton for writing the Constitution of the United States without any God in it.

The history of Wall Street is to a certain extent the financial, commercial, agricultural, mining, literary, artistic, moral, and religious history of this country. Only a few blocks long, it has reached from the Canadas to the Gulf of Mexico, from San Francisco to Bangor. There are the best men in this country, and there are the worst. Everything, from unswerving integrity to tip-top scoundrelism—everything, from heaven-born charity to bloodless Shylockism.

I want to put the plough in at the curb-stone of Trinity and drive it clear through to Wall Street Ferry; and so it shall go, if the horses are strong enough to draw the plough.

Wall Street stands as a type of tried integrity and the most outrageous villainy. Farmers who have only a few hundred dollars' worth of produce to put on the market have but little to test their character; but put a man into the seven-times-heated furnace of Wall Street excitement, and he either comes out a Shadrach, with hair unsinged, or he is burned into a black moral cinder. No half-way work about it.

A stock-dealer is only a commission-merchant under another name. He gets his commission on one style of goods. You, the grocer, get your commission on another style of goods. The dollar that he makes is just as bright and fair and honest a dollar as the dollar earned by the day laborer. If I wanted to find integrity bomb-proof, I would go among the bankers and merchants of Wall Street; yet, because there have been such villainies enacted there at different times, some men have supposed that it is a great financial debauchery, and they hardly dare go near the street, or walk up and down it, unless they have buttoned up their pockets, and had their lives insured, or religiously crossed themselves.

Yet, if you start at either end of the street, and read the business signs, you will find the names of more men of integrity and Christian benevolence than you can find in the same space in any street of any of our cities.

But while that street is a type of tried integrity on the one hand, it is also a type of unbounded swindle on the other. There are the spiders that wait for innocent flies. There are the crocodiles that crawl up through the slime to crench the calf. There are the anacondas, with lifted loop, ready to crush the unwary. There are financial wreckers, who stand on the beach praying for a Caribbean whirlwind to sweep over our commercial interests.

SWEET AND SOUR.

IN some lives the saccharine seems to predominate. Life in sunshine on a bank of flowers. A thousand hands to clap approval. In December or in January, looking across their table, they see all their family present. Health rubicund. Skies flamboyant. Days resilient. But in a great many cases there are not so many sugars as acids. The annoyances, and the vexations, and the disappointments of life overpower the successes. There is a gravel in almost every shoe. An Arabian legend says that there was a worm in Solomon's staff, gnawing its strength away; and there is a weak spot in every earthly support that a man leans on. King George of England forgot all the grandeurs of his throne because, one day in an interview, Beau Brummell called him by his first name, and addressed him as a servant, crying: "George, ring the bell!" Miss Langdon, honored all the world over for her poetic genius, is so worried with the evil reports set afloat regarding her, that she is found dead, with an empty bottle of prussic acid in her hand. Goldsmith said that his life was a wretched being, and that all that want and contempt could bring to it had been brought, and cries out: "What, then, is there formidable in a jail?" Correggio's fine painting is hung up for a tavern sign. Hogarth cannot sell his best paintings except through a raffle. Andrew Delsart makes the great fresco in the Church of the Annunciata, at Florence, and gets for pay a sack of corn; and there are annoyances and vexations in high places as well as in low places, showing that in great many lives the sours are greater than the sweets.

It is absurd to suppose that a man who has always been well can sympathize with those who are sick; or that one who has always been honored can appreciate the sorrow of those who are despised; or that one who has been born to a great fortune can understand the distress and the straits of those who are destitute. The fact that Christ himself took the vinegar makes him able to sympathize to-day and forever with all those whose cup is filled with sharp acids of this life.

There are some of you who have not seen a well day for many years. By keeping out of draughts, and by carefully studying dietetics, you continue to this time; but oh, the headaches, and the sideaches, and the backaches, and the heartaches which have been your accompaniment all the way through! You have struggled under a heavy mortgage of physical disabilities; and instead of the placidity that once characterized you, it is now only with great effort that you keep away from irritability and sharp retort. Difficulties of respiration, of digestion, of locomotion, make up the great obstacle in your life, and you tug and sweat along the pathway, and wonder when the exhaustion will end. The brightest crowns in heaven will not be given to those who, in stirrups, dashed to the cavalry charge, while the general applauded, and the sound of clashing sabres rang through the land; but the brightest crowns in heaven, I believe, will be given to those who trudged on amid chronic ailments which unnerved their strength, yet all the time maintaining their faith in God.

Mr. J. Lewis, Milwaukee, in the course of a long letter, describing a visit to the World's Fair, says: "There are many sights to be seen, too many to name; and he who misses them, who can afford to go and see them, will, I fear, regret it in the future."

Subscriber, Richfield Springs, N. Y. Why did David collect such an enormous quantity of gold and silver for the building of the Temple?

He was anxious that the edifice should be the most magnificent in the kingdom. He reproached himself for living in a house of cedar, while God's house was a tent. He wanted to build the temple but God forbade him. As he could not build it, he prepared the materials on a lavish scale. Much of the precious metal was used in overlaying the walls and in the utensils, but probably more was used in payment of the workmen and for other materials.

James Tulley, Reading, Pa. When was the first census ever taken in any land?

The earliest census is believed to have been taken in China, in the year 2042 B.C. Moses (about 1491 B.C.) laid down the law regulating the Israelitish census, which was probably taken after the Egyptian model. It is doubtful whether the most ancient censuses included the whole population or had reference only to the taxpaying portion.

R. O. Bush, Georgetown, S. C. Was not the man without the wedding garment mentioned in the parable (Matt 22: 11-13) harshly and unjustly dealt with?

No; he was treated as he deserved. At a wedding feast in an Oriental land such as Christ was describing, the king would provide garments for his guests, suitable to the occasion. A guest who declined to wear the wedding garment and went in wearing his ordinary attire, would be conspicuous and his conduct would be an affront to the king. He would naturally be considered as despising the dress which the king had provided and preferring his own. Christ was warning his hearers against trusting in their own righteousness and rejecting God's way of salvation.

Lizzie A. Kerr, Maple Green, N.B. "I noticed your editorial in The Christian Herald of June 21, on 'Disciples of Fashion,' and quite agree with you that 'it is high time that we unlimbered our batteries against this idolatry.' Christian people are every year giving many dollars towards this goddess of fashion, and we do not love her, but we are compelled by circumstances to waste our money upon her; yet it would be so much more pleasing to the Lord if we used it for the extending of his cause and the promoting of his glory. Now the question is: What is to be done? What can we do in the way of putting down this evil? We think it would be well pleasing to the Lord if you could now invent some way to give us freedom from this bondage to fashion. Could you not organize a Society for the suppression of this evil, or some such thing?"

Marcus M. Chapin, Halstead, Kans. Can unfermented wine be used justifiably at the Lord's Supper when we know that the wine should represent the blood of Christ which quickens man's spirit into new life as fermented wine quickens the action of the heart of his natural body?

Unfermented wine may properly be used if your church prefers. It would be a good thing to use if, as is often the case, there are reformed drunkards among you partaking of the elements. The taste of fermented wine may revive the desire for liquor and so a stone of stumbling may be put in a brother's way. It does not signify what is used if it is in the right spirit. Probably the reason why Christ took bread and wine as the emblems was that they were in that land and time to be found on every table. He wished his little band of followers to have some social bond to cement their union with one another, in him, after he was dead, and so he established this meal at which those who loved him might meet in memory of him to commemorate his death. Eating and drinking together signifies equality, fellowship and brotherly regard and when it is done avowedly in Christ's name, the bond of brotherhood is recognized and the true purpose of the institutions is attained.

A Reader, Lineville, Iowa. What is the difference between Romanism and Catholicism?

Both words are commonly applied to the teachings of the Roman Catholic Church. Etymologically, however, their meaning is opposite. Catholic means general or universal. It was originally applied to the Christian Church to mark the difference between it and the Jewish Church, which was limited to the Jewish people. The Christian Church embraced men of all races, nationalities and conditions. The Roman Catholic Church has that claim, but so has the Methodist and other churches. Therefore it has no right to arrogate the title of catholic to itself, to the exclusion of other churches. Protestants naturally refuse to concede the title, and as the church is controlled by the Pope and Cardinals at Rome, they speak of it as the Romish Church and its doctrines as Romanism.

J. M. L. Hennessey, Oklahoma. 1. To what denomination does President Cleveland belong? 2. What is the meaning of the last eight verses of the thirteenth chapter of Revelation?

1. President Cleveland is a Presbyterian. 2. The passage describes Antichrist and his career. The theory now generally accepted among expositors of prophecy is that a king will arise about seven years before Christ's second coming who will be energized by Satan, and will, eventually, by scheming and plotting, attain supreme power. He will deceive the Jews by inviting them to re-establish a Jewish nation in Palestine, and will deceive the world and the church generally by his professions. Having become powerful, he will turn persecutor, as described in the passage you refer to. The number mentioned in the last verse refers to the practice of giving each letter of the alphabet a numerical value, as on the dial of your watch. The sum of the values of the letters of Antichrist's name will be 666.

James H. Russell (an exhibitor at the World's Fair) "How God answered prayer and made a weak source the most powerful factor in its influence toward closing the gates of the World's Fair on Sunday! Most of the directors, in their love for the almighty dollar said, "Use the Lord's day for gain," but the exhibitors, after the first month, began to realize that the pace was too rapid. Seven days of excitement is too much for the time to come, and as some would never open their exhibits, one after another closed them, until it became universal and there was so little to be seen, they would decline to pay full price for one half a show, and the result was such a decreased attendance that it would not pay to employ so large a number of police, watchmen and others; and each week, although every influence was sought to bear upon the people to come, those who feared God and called upon his name, went to church and Sunday School as usual; and the directors (24 to 4) decided to close on Sunday. Verily, God hears prayer."

W. T. Anderson, Richmond Centre, O. If you do not receive any benefit from being baptized, what is the use of being baptized at all?

If you make it a rule in life to do only those things from which you expect to receive a benefit, baptism is one that you will omit. It is, however, a bad rule. Christ's commands should be obeyed by his followers, even if in obeying them they suffer loss rather than derive benefit. There are other things not commanded, which we delight to do from love of Christ and the desire to serve him, yet from which no benefit can come to us. A great deal of Christian work, especially foreign mission work, is done without prospect of direct personal benefit. If you asked the workers "what is the use?" they would probably tell you in the words of Paul "the love of Christ constraineth us." You may be quite sure there is no benefit in baptism, but as Christ commanded it, the duty of obedience is clear.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

TO LEGISLATE FOR FRANCE.

FRANCE is on the eve of a political struggle of a momentous character. On Sunday next, following the godless custom of the country, a new Chamber of Deputies will be elected, which, if it is not dissolved before the end of its term, will legislate for France for the ensuing four years. The election is one of unusual importance because of the power the Chamber exerts on the Government of the Republic. This power is much greater than that vested in our House of Representatives. In addition to its legislative functions, it, to a large extent, controls the executive, inasmuch as, conjointly with the Senate, it elects the President of the Republic, and its confidence and approval are necessary to the existence of the Administration. Although the Chamber does not select the men who shall be Secretaries of State, of the Treasury and of other departments, no Cabinet can continue in office after the Chamber has condemned it. The French people, therefore, are practically deciding, in electing a new Chamber, how France shall be governed and what her foreign policy shall be. The present Cabinet and their friends have strained every nerve in the campaign to secure a new lease of power. Portraits of three of these leaders appear on this page. In the centre of the group, is the portrait of the Premier, M. Dupuy; on the right is that of his friend and predecessor, ex-Premier Ribot, and on the left the Secretary of State, M. Develle. They hope for the election of a Chamber of a similar character to that now sitting. There is more probability of their being gratified than there would have been had the election taken place a few months ago. Then the memory of the Panama scandal was fresh in the minds of the people and there would have been a demand for men of character and probity as representatives in the Chamber, rather than for professional politicians who are concerned more for their own interests than for the honor and welfare of their country. Public attention has now however been adroitly diverted from the home scandal to foreign affairs and the people have been urged to support an administration which has added to French territory the large region wrested from Siam. It is to be hoped that the device will not be successful and that the French people will insist on being represented by real statesmen, who believe that only righteousness can truly exalt a nation while sin is a reproach to any people. (Prov. 14: 34.)

Electricity on the River.

A SCHEME for utilizing the power of a current of water is described in a press dispatch from San Bernardino, Cal. A party of Eastern capitalists are engaged in laying an electric cable through the Grand Canon of the Colorado river. If the experiments now being tried prove successful, a copper wire five hundred miles long will be suspended over the river, and power will be obtained from it to drive boats up the stream. The principle is similar to that of electric railroads. It is expected that there will be no need of engines to charge the wire, as water-wheels can be fixed in the most rapid parts of the river, which will revolve with sufficient speed to generate an electric current. By this means it is believed that boats can be hauled through Black Canon and other points of scenic interest without any expense, beyond the first outlay for apparatus. The novel feature of the scheme is that the resisting power of the river should be utilized to furnish the force for overcoming the resistance. A phenomenon analogous to this has sometimes been observed in human nature. As was the case in the life of the Apostle Paul, the characteristics which make a man a formidable enemy to the cause of Christ, make him, after his conversion, a more earnest and energetic worker for the cause he formerly opposed. (1.Cor.15: 9-10.)

A Lover's Dilemma.

THE danger attending fickleness in marriage engagements is being realized by a man now under arrest in a jail in Brooklyn, N. Y. He has been paying attentions for some time past to a young lady to whom about a year ago he made a proposal of marriage. The day for the ceremony was fixed and the young lady resigned a lucrative position to make arrangements for her wedding. A few weeks before the date fixed for the marriage the lover asked to have the engagement cancelled. Circumstances, he said, had arisen which rendered it impossible for him to fulfil his promise. Some time afterward, the disappointed lady heard that he was courting a lady in Connecticut, and was soon to be married to her. She then commenced suit against him and had him arrested for breach of promise. After spending a day or two in prison the young man sent for the lady and offered to marry her if she would withdraw her suit. She consentsd, and he notified the Connecticut lady that he must relinquish his claim to her hand. She was as much annoyed as the Brooklyn lady had been and followed her example in entering suit for damages. As the prisoner cannot fulfil both engagements, and as his failure in either case involves imprisonment, his situation is embarrassing. His trouble may serve as a warning to others who are so lacking in principle as to become engaged to two women. Incidentally it should also teach a lesson to that numerous class who are trying to serve the two masters, God and Mammon, which as Christ declared, is impossible. (Matt.6: 24.)

Wants to be Imprisoned.

A STRANGE application was made to a New York official last week. It came from a young man, who a few months ago was released from the Reformatory at Elmira, N. Y. He asked to be sent back to prison to keep him from committing crime. His story is that when he was released, he obtained work with a manufacturing company in Buffalo, but after he had worked some days the men found out that he was a discharged convict and refused to work with him. He was obliged to leave and was without work for some time. Hoping to escape the taint of prison he made his way to Cincinnati where he obtained employment, but again he was compelled to leave. He had not had work since. After tramping about Ohio, vainly endeavoring to get an engagement he had returned to New York. For several weeks he had been answering advertisements and making personal applications for employment. No one, however, would give him work and there seemed no resource for him but to relapse into his criminal ways. Fearing that under the pressure of hunger he would yield to temptation, he asked to be sent back to prison. The official to whom he applied investigated his case and, finding that the story was true, gave him temporary relief and is endeavoring to find some employer who will give him work. He has learned by bitter experience that "the way of the transgressor is hard," and it may be hoped that he will also prove by exprience that although men will not overlook his wrongdoing, there is One who casts out none who come to him. (John 6: 37.)

To Protect Masonry.

A NOVEL expedient has been adopted with considerable success to protect stone from the action of air and water. It was at first regarded with incredulity, but experience has proved that it really fulfills all that its inventor claimed for it. It consists in applying a solution of coal tar to the exposed surface of the stone. Three coats of solution, says a scientific journal which describes the process, will, if spread carefully over the stone and the mortar of the setting, preserve the stone from decay even though it may be under fifty feet of water. Without that or a similar covering, water eventually penetrates the stone and, becoming impregnated with lime salts from the mortar, operates still more powerfully on the stone, causing it to decay. The coal tar is impervious to the water, or to air laden with moisture and protects the surface of the stone from the wasting process. Builders will appreciate the value of this discovery especially when they are erecting some building the foundations of which will be in contact with water or damp soil. Foreseeing the danger of decay they will gladly adopt any means of preventing it. It is much to be wished that Christians, who have to come in contact with the world, were similarly careful to secure means that will make them impervious to its influences; and such means are provided (John 17: 15.)

A Land Baron in a Poor-House.

THE San Francisco journals report the commission to the poor-house of a once noted land baron. He is one of the two sons of a widow who settled in California fifty-five years ago. The two young men received enormous grants of land from Gov. Michel Tornea, besides inheriting vast estates from their mother. They were enormously rich and one of them presented to the city of Santa Rosa a valuable site, on which the city built its court-house. Both of the brothers were men of easy, careless ways and were addicted to gambling. Bad management, lavish hospitality, betting and gambling have done their usual work in both cases. The brother who gave the site for the court-house was the janitor of that building when he died recently and his widow became the matron of the jail. The other brother also ran through his property. He has been known to stake a three-hundred-acre farm on a single game of poker. Although thirty years ago, he owned a principality in cattle ranches, he is now utterly destitute and has been glad to obtain a shelter in the county poor-house. A more deplorable end to life cannot easily be imagined. Many men who were once rich and have died poor have been happy because they were entering upon an eternal inheritance, but this man has discovered that sin and dissipation work ruin for time as well as for eternity. (Prov. 8: 36.)

A Needed Medicine.

IN a letter to the New York Times, an eminent physician calls attention to a source of danger to the public health. He refers to the reckless and indiscriminate use of suggested remedies. Having heard, he said, that certain mineral spring waters have proved beneficial to some acquaintance, they drink them by wholesale, although they are not suffering from similar complaints and are made ill in consequence. Sea-bathing is often similarly disastrous. To some constitutions it proves an invigorating tonic, while persons of different constitutions come out of the surf with teeth chattering and faces blue and pinched with the chill they have received. The effect of the plunge is a distinct evil needing medical treatment. He is now trying to recover a child who has been bathed almost to death. The mother had heard that a friend's child had been benefited by sea-bathing and had insisted on her own child taking a course of it. It is so, the physician continues, with Turkish baths, bicycling and other exercises; a remedy that suits one peron may be disastrous for another. The common need of the race, he says, is that the therapeutical world would discover a solution of common sense the administration of which should be compulsory. If the same principle were recognized in spiritual remedies there would be more kindly feeling among the sects. Services which prove helpful to one spirit are not helpful to another. No man should despise his neighbor for attending a particular church, nor doubt the sincerity of his faith, if he cannot derive benefit from religious exercises which others find profitable. Blessed is any man in whose heart is the way to God. (Psalm 84: 5.)

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

THE WELL BY THE GATE.

Sermon preached before the Tremont Temple Church, now meeting in Music Hall, Boston, last Sunday evening, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D. Text: II. Sam. 23: 15. "And David longed and said, Oh, that one would give me drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate."

THIS text is a part of an interesting chapter in the history of David; and it also sets before us one of the most stirring and touching incidents in the life of Israel's sweet singer and heroic king. David to an unusual degree evoked the love of those within the circle of his friendship. Like him who was David's Son and David's Lord, he called forth the bitterest hate and the tenderest love. Few men on the page of history, sacred or profane, so stimulated the undying devotion of his followers as did David. In this respect he takes his place beside Wallace and Bruce, beside Wellington and Napoleon, beside the immortal Grant, and Lee, and other American heroes. The text suggests an element of chivalry on the part of both David and his men which charms us alike by its sincerity and its unselfishness.

We see by this chapter that the historian is drawing to a close the history of David's eventful life. He gives us, therefore, some of the last words of the heroic king—words expressive of his faith in the purpose and promise of God. A noble poet has taught us that the bravest are the tenderest, and these words of this mighty warrior and brave ruler clearly show the gentleness of his spirit, notwithstanding the stormy scenes of his life. We have in this connection also a very appropriate account of some of the who served under David. We know that some of his last words are given elsewhere; for it is doubtless fair to presume that he often repeated words which so completely filled his great soul. The Word of God also gives us the last words of Moses and Jacob, and those of other great leaders of men and servants of God. Three groups of David's brave soldiers are here given. The first three who are named had performed the greatest of exploits; we might appropriately call them the elect of the elect in David's army. Their names are recorded on the imperishable page of sacred story. Commendations which are associated with these names give their record peculiar value. Here with words of praise are the names of Adino, the Eznite, Eleazar, the son of Dodo, and also Shammah, the son of Agee. The terms of praise associated with these names are as striking for their primitive simplicity as for their rhetorical beauty. The men forming this heroic triumvirate greatly distinguished themselves in the wars against the Philistines. Then come in the muster-roll around whose devotion a unique and poetical glory is thrown; they were three of the thirty chiefs who came to David in the harvest time at the cave of Adullam. Perhaps they were not so distinguished as the three first named, but they attained to greater glory than the group of thirty-one whose names appear later in the catalogue. Only these two of the second triumvirate are named; Abishai, the brother of Joab, who was the chief of the three, who had lifted his spear against three hundred and slew them, and who was the captain of the three; the other name is that of Benaiah, the son of Jehoiada. To his name is given the credit of many brave deeds; deeds that were reckoned brave even among the [illegible] mighty men. The interesting and poetical story, and the practical les-

The Three Heroes

[illegible]

We have, in the first place, David's earnest longing for the well of Bethlehem. Saul's anger was still burning fiercely against David. David's only resource is in waiting for a time until the unjust wrath shall have passed away. Six miles south of Bethlehem, according to many authorities, was the famous cave of Adullam. Some writers favor another location, but the popular opinion adopts this one. David knew this cave well. Indeed there was scarcely an inch of ground in all the neighborhood with which he was not perfectly familiar. Often had he trodden these hills and valleys in the sports of youth, or while caring for his father's sheep, and the knowledge gained in his early life now became useful in the time of trial. Travelers tell us that this cave is approached by a circuitous path along the edge of a hill; and they assured us that one man posted at certain points in that path could easily protect himself against the attack of hundreds. In this cave David and his men now find refuge. Were it not for

Saul's Reasonless Rage

David would not in this crisis be shut up in this cave, but might be performing service for God and country. Were it not for Saul's wrath the Philistines would not have been in garrison in Bethlehem. We are told in the text that they had pitched in the valley of Rephaim; they were thus dangerously near to Jerusalem itself. The situation was thus extremely critical; and grave doubt hung over the future. Oh, the folly of Saul's wrath at such a moment as this. Many men in the church to-day are robbed of their power for good and are giving comfort to the foes of God because of their warfare upon brothers in the Church. Nothing could justify Saul's foolish wrath against David especially at such a time as this. We know also that it was harvest time. The weather was hot; David was weary, thirsty, disappointed and sad. The memory of the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate, came over him with peculiar power. He remembered how he drank of this sparkling water in childhood's happy days. A certain sort of homesickness came upon him in his enforced idleness and his loneliness, and in the knowledge of the wretched condition of his country. We all know something of such memories as these, there are times when present trials are sharply contrasted with the bright and beautiful memories of the thoughtless and happy days of youth. While I am speaking to you many wells in your country homes at the foot of hillsides, under moss-covered rocks, or by the side of some very familiar road come vividly before you. Never was there such water as you drank from those wells in your childhood. But apart from these natural fancies and exaggerations, the water of is said to be peculiarly sweet and wholesome; it is said also to have been brought afterward to Jerusalem in conduits. The desire to drink again of this water becomes so strong that David cries out, "Oh, that one would give me drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate." It was a weak wish we may say; it was a foolish desire we may affirm; and it seemed impossible that this hasty and impulsive desire should be gratified; but perhaps the very impossibility of its gratification increased the desire.

There are many wells of childhood's hopes and dreams to drink from which in after life we might well long. To many life has proved a hard struggle. The dreams cherished in youth have not been realized in age. The cross has been heavy and the road has been rough. But let us not speak too sadly of life's experience. Manhood after all is better than childhood. There is a rock from which living waters flow, waters that flow in the wilderness, waters from which to-day we may drink and be satisfied; and, as the apostle Paul tells us, that Rock is Christ. There is also the well of Christian experience. How gloriously Paul drank and gave others to drink of the water of this well. We too seldom speak of God's dealings with us in our Christian lives. How often Spurgeon in enforcing truth upon others tells the story of his own conversion and of his growth in grace; and in this respect he followed the example of the noble Paul. There is also the well of the true Bethlehem. In the manger at Bethlehem the Christ of God was born. Here the fountain was opened in the house of David for sin and for uncleanness; here the living waters were permitted to flow forth to quench the thirst of a dying world; here the Christ came as the true hero that he might break through the ranks of his and our foes to secure for us this living water. This living water he now offers us freely. He assures us that if we drink thereof we shall never thirst again, but that it shall be in us a well of water springing up into everlasting life.

We have, in the second place, an account of the heroic sacrifice of David's brave companions. The king's cry was heard. The longing of his heart stirred the bravery of their hearts. Over the hearts of his followers David was master. His will was their law of obedience. He called out the

of these loyal hearts. There were noble men in those "brave days of old." These three men were inured to danger; and they are ready at a moment's notice to assume any degree of risk to gratify their beloved king. We see them as for a moment they converse together, stimulating one another and laying plans for the accomplishment of their purpose. We see them now as silently they steal away from David's camp. Carefully do they select their course toward the camp of the Philistines. They are going into the mouth of danger. They are putting themselves into the very jaws of death. Our eyes follow them, brave fellows as they are. How dare they undertake to force their way through the line of the Philistines? How can they reach the well of Bethlehem by the gate? Surely theirs is a foolhardy attempt. On they go in their heroic endeavor. See the astonishment on the part of the Philstines as the three heroes approach. Hear the clash of arms! See the falling of foes! They are for a moment wavering and their success is in doubt. Trying moment! Brave heroes! Surprised and defeated Philistines. See the three heroes have passed the line! They have reached the well beside the gate. They are now returning to their beloved chieftain, and they are bearing the coveted "waters clear and cold." This act of bravery showed their tender attachment to their king. They were willing to incur any degree of danger in his service. Although David was in the cave of Adullan he was still the anointed king. He could not reward them now for their brave devotion, except by approving words and smiles.

An Example.

We serve him who is David's son and David's Lord. He is now seated on the throne of universal dominion. The world is at his feet and Satan is his conquered foe. He was the true hero. His cross is the true oriflamme to-day, more beautiful, more attractive, more inspiring than was the white plume of Henry of Navarre at the immortal battle of Ivry. Let us listen to the whispers of his love. Let us make his will the law of our lives. Then let us so serve him that our devotion shall be more heroic than that of the bravest knights of the Middle Ages with their chivalry and devotion; greater far than that of the heroic men who risked their lives to gratify the wish of Israel's king. These men set us a worthy example in their love for David, and in their indifference to danger. The foes of our King are encamped near our Bethlehem. Their presence dishonors our Lord and His church. In the spirit of love to our Master and devotion to His church let us go forth constrained by affection, inspired by heroism, and consecrated by duty, so that we shall lay all that we have and are on the altar of devotion to our Lord and Master.

We notice lastly,

David's Self-Denial.

He had a tender regard for the lives of his soldiers. He now realized that he had expressed a hasty and really unworthy wish. No true leader would ever imperil the lives of men that he might have a draught of water except perhaps when wounded and burning with fever. His soldiers had performed an act of rare devotion; he must not encourage its repetition. He would now punish himself for his selfish wish and foolish word, and so he refuses to drink of the water; he therefore pours it out in honor of the heroism of his men, and as a sacrifice unto the Lord his God. His act reminds us of the heroism of Sir Philip Sidney at the battle of Zutphen. Although killed at the age of thirty-two Sir Philip was one of the most conspicuous men at the court of Queen Elizabeth. At every court in Europe he was known as a statesman of the greatest promise. He was distinguished in literature as the author of English prose and poetry of the highest order. But as the hero of the romantic incident at Zutphen he has a foremost place among the chivalrous knights of all ages. At this battle on the 22nd of September, 1586, it is said that the lord-marshal entered the field without his greaves. Immediately Sir Philip removed his own that his life might be in the same peril as that of the lord-marshal. Thus he was exposed to the fatal shot, and fifteen days later his death took place at Arnheim. When wounded a cup of cold water, for which his burning thirst made him greatly desire, was placed in his hand; but seeing a dying soldier whose pain was great, whose thirst was consuming and whose longing eyes were beseeching, he passed the water to him, saying, "Thy need is greater than mine." Noble Sir Philip! No wonder that not only the common people, but officers of the army, members of courts and the poets of the highest rank, wept over his bier and gave him their tributes of affection as a beloved chief and hero.

In this same spirit David would not drink the water, "but poured it out unto the Lord." He recognized the inspiration of God in the devotion of his men, and so he made their offering to himself a sacrifice of devotion toward God. If we possess qualities which elicit admiration and devotion these qualities are the voice, deportment, culture, every attraction which we possess is God's bestowment and should be laid joyously upon God's altar. David valued the gift which was the price of blood. Every element of unselfish gratitude was in the soul of this brave, brilliant and heroic leader. We are told that at the battle of Alma, in September, 1854, a wounded Russian called piteously for water. Captain Eddington of the British Army shared his own supply with the wounded Russian. Refreshed by the water of which he had partaken, the ungrateful Russian raised himself upon his elbow and fired his pistol at the retreating form of his benefactor. Oh, base ingratitude! But in rebuking this wounded soldier, we are pronouncing judgment upon ourselves. Our Lord left his throne in glory, broke through the ranks of the Philistines, pressed his way to the cross, and gave his blood to secure our salvation. If we refuse to receive him as our Saviour, we despise his blood as our Redeemer. Is there one in this audience who admires heroism and who despises Jesus? Is there one who praises bravery and yet who refuses to submit to the Captain of our salvation? Oh, shame on our Base Ingratitude!

Oh, shame on our indifference! Such conduct toward a fellow-man would stamp us as unworthy the confidence, esteem and affection of all men. Such conduct toward Jesus astonishes angels, amazes believers and delights devils. When in Saint Paul's, London, about a year ago to-day, I saw the superb monument recently erected to the immortal Gordon, heroic soldier for country and for God. On that monument is a representation of the scenes described in this text, and especially that of David pouring out the water unto the Lord. A part of the inscription is in these words, "The blood of the men that went in jeopardy of their lives." Once more I ask you, in the name of all that is manly in conduct, all that is heroic in devotion, all that is heavenly in love, and all that is divine in Jesus Christ, that by the memory of his precious blood you receive him now as the Captain of your salvation. He himself the water of life. He broke through the serried ranks of the hosts of sin and hell; he came back in triumph bearing the life-giving water. As his servant I offer it to you to-night. Refuse it not, I humbly beseech you, I prayerfully entreat you, I authoritatively command you in his name.

To-night my vacation ministry with you closes. Next Sunday, God willing, I shall be in my own loved pulpit in the Calvary Church, New York, where for twenty-three years I have stood. I thank God for all the tokens of his approval which he has given to the preaching of his gospel in Boston's Music Hall. I thank you for your presence in so large numbers, especially at this mid-summer season. I thank you for your loving sympathy, your earnest prayers, and your hearty co-operation. Let us constantly pray that God's word spoken during these past six weeks may not return to him void. Let us pray that any here now who are strangers to the love of Jesus Christ, David's Son and Lord, may just now submit their hearts to his gracious rule, and be saved with an everlasting salvation. That in the providence of God, your able, earnest and devoted pastor, Dr. Lorimer, may return to you refreshed in body and consecrated anew in heart; and that you may be guided amid the difficulties of your present position so that the new temple, even to a greater degree than the former one, may be the gate of heaven to many thousands, is my earnest wish and sincere prayer.

heaven. The Lama Temple is composed of various buildings, the most important of which has an image of the coming Buddha some seventy feet high, while another is the chanting-hall, where a portion of the fifteen hundred Mongol or Thibetan priests chant their Buddhist prayers at regular intervals in the day and night. The leading Confucian temple is also composed of different buildings, the largest being upwards of forty feet high, and used for the worship of the sages by the highest literary men of the land, while without are tablets telling of all the literary graduates of the third degree for five hundred years, and other monuments recording the victories of different emperors, or carved with characters that seem to indicate a history two thousand five hundred years old. In the northern part or the city are two large high structures, upwards of a hundred feet high, the one a drum tower and the other a bell tower, from both of which the watches of the night are sounded, and in the latter of which is one of the five bells cast during the time of the Emperor Yung-lo, over four hundred years ago, and which weighs one hundred and twenty thousand pounds. North of the palace of the emperor can be seen an artificial mount called Prospect Hill, nearly one hundred and fifty feet high, composed of five summits, on the top of which are Buddhist temples, while around is a park nearly a mile in circumference, and covered here and there with trees—the whole being deemed a protection to the palace of the emperor.

AUDIENCE WITH THE MANDARINS.

The day came, and I went forth in my sedan, dressed in high style. The yamen was reached; the card was taken in; a little delay, and then the summons to enter. The chair was lowered, and I stepped forth. As I walked ahead I saw a man holding my large red card above him. I shook down over my hands the fur cuffs of my gown, and, with amazing dignity, followed my guide through a gateway. Soon I saw farther on an official, who waited to accompany me to the guest-room or reception-hall. Not a word was spoken, and I stepped politely ahead and entered the room. Each to each bowed to the ground in Chinese style; the first word was then spoken, and the guest took his seat. As I looked at the mandarin I addressed him as "great man"—"his honor." His first sentence was, "What public business?" This seemed to me a very unceremonious way of receiving a stranger, and my heart sank ten degress. Still I boldly stated my business, and asked for assistance in our undertaking to benefit the people. No particular response was given of a friendly nature, and I was about preparing to leave, when another mandarin entered, and, after salutation, took a seat below the other. I also, by request, stated to him my business; and then very soon a third mandarin appeared, and this time I recognized the Taotai. For a third time I stated the business, my vocabulary receiving thereby a severe shock as to its scope and beauty. From him I received a kind response, when, lo! a fourth mandarin appeared, saluted me, and sat immediately below the Taotai and above the other two. There, arrayed opposite to me, were four Chinese mandarins, and my hopes at once arose, and my heart went up twenty degrees. They all, and especially the Taotai, expressed approval of the hospital scheme, and promise was given to petition the governor in regard to the matter. After chatting for some time, I departed.

TAI'-SHAN, THE SACRED MOUNTAIN.

This mountain is one of the five sacred mountains of China, which received the worship of ancient emperors. No mountain is more renowned as a place of worship than this one, situated in the western part of the province of Shan-tung, and only some sixty miles from the birthplace of Confucius—another important centre of religious adoration. Some four thousand years ago an ancient ruler, Shuin, whose teachings were largely absorbed by the sage Confucius, came to the mountain of T'ai-shan and sacrificed to Heaven. Before the Lord descended in majestic glory on Mount Sinai, and imparted to the sage Moses the world-embracing Decalogue, there was a seeking of help and a spirit of reverential adoration arising from the heart of an ancient sage of China. On the summit of the mountain, occupying a conspicuous position, with a magnificent panorama spread out on every side, is the leading temple, in which is an image representing the spirit of the mountain—a goddess as reverently worshipped as was Diana of the Ephesians. Before this image, dividing the main compartment, are bars, through which the infatuated people cast in their cash, hoping for every conceivable blessing.

NOT CHANGED, BUT GLORIFIED.

NOT changed, but glorified! Oh, beauteous language.
For those who weep,
Mourning the loss of some dear face departed,
Fallen asleep.
Hushed into silence, never more to comfort
The hearts of men;
Gone, like the sunshine of another country,
Beyond our ken.

In the clear morning of that other country,
In Paradise.
With the same face we loved and cherished
She shall arise!
Let us be patient, we who mourn, with weeping,
Some vanished face.
The Lord has taken, but to add more beauty
And a diviner grace.

We find once more beyond earth's sorrows,
Beyond these skies
In the fair city of the "sure foundations,"
Those heavenly eyes,
With the same welcome shining sweetness,
That met us here;
Eyes from whose beauty God has banished
And wiped away the tear.

IN THE SECRET OF HIS PRESENCE.

IN the secret of his presence
I am kept from strife of tongues;
His pavilion is around me,
And within are ceaseless songs!
Stormy winds, his words fulfilling,
Beat without, but cannot harm,
For the Master's voice is stilling
Storm and tempest to a calm.

In the secret of his presence
All the darkness disappears,
For the sun that knows no setting
Throws a rainbow on my tears.
So the day grows ever lighter,
Broadening to the perfect noon;
So the way grows ever brighter,
Heaven is coming near and soon.

In the secret of his presence
Is a sweet, unbroken rest;
Pleasures, joys, in glorious fullness,
Making earth like Eden blest;
So my peace grows deep and deeper,
Widening as it nears the sea,
For my Saviour is my keeper,
Keeping mine and keeping me!

The Man of Sin.

Signs in Character and Conduct which will Identify Antichrist.

BY REV. JOHN STORIE, F.R.S.T.

ANTICHRIST is to oppose "all that is called God or that is worshipped" not only in the Jewish but in every land; yet not in the spirit of infidelity and atheism, but as an enlightened revolutionist and bold reformer, having a mission and revelation from the Throne of Power and backed by miracle. He will profess that it is the one, true Godhead he is raised up to reveal, a deity more worthy of these times of light that have dawned on men: and only in the last stage of his career, when fully possessed and sustained by Satanic influence, he assumes, as the true representative and incarnation of the divine, the place of the Supreme; exalts himself above every god that is named on earth; and, pushing into the Holy Land, "seats himself in the Temple of God (in Jerusalem) showing himself that he is God."

There is a time fixed for his revelation. "Ye know," Paul says, "what is hindering (is now preventing) his being revealed, as he will be in his own fixed time," that is in the time determined by God, and, as we know, declared in prophecy to be the beginning of the last or seventieth septennary. But what is hindering now and since the day of Paul? Two things. There is said to be a hindrance (neuter); and there is said to be a hinderer (mas.) No doubt, that which has so long hindered and hinders now, is the steadfast resistance presented to Satan by a godly remnant in many churches and many lands; and he who hinders is the Divine Spirit "striving with men." "God has been visiting the Gentiles to take out of them a people for his name;" and when that number is complete, and the last remnant is taken, in that rapture of the saints (1. Thess. 4:17; 1. Cor. 15:51), then his Spirit, whose mission to the world is to convict of sin, of the sin of not believing in Christ, will no longer strive with men. He will continue to resist only until "that which hinders" is taken away.

Daniel also represents him as an individual man, and in Antiochus Epiphanes and his career of impious and dire oppression the prediction has no doubt already received a precursive and anticipative fulfilment. He rose to power from the stock of the Syrian kings, and in one of the four divisions of the Macedonian Empire. His conquests were all in the directions named here. But there are words and deeds in this prediction that carry it forward into the farthest future, and go beyond the deeds of a mere man. In no less than four distinct forms of warning, is the prophet informed that "the vision is for the time of the end."

He is also presented by Daniel as a King—"the wilful King." This is the ruling element in his character as the Man of Sin. It is also the prevalent element in the sin of that age. In these darkening days many will cultivate self-will, free-thinking, free-doing as proofs of manly independence; but they are really proofs and manifestations of that spirit which ruined angels, which led to the fall of our first parents and which will finally be embodied in Antichrist.

It is further stated that "he will treat with no regard the God of his fathers." We should judge from this referenee to his fathers that he will be of Jewish birth. That opinion has been the almost unanimous expectation from the earliest times. Godet says: "This name, with the idea represented by it, is Jewish in origin and character. The Anti-Messiah, as the Messiah himself, is necessarily a product of Judaism. St. Paul confirms this idea. He lays it down that the man of Sin realizes in himself the spurious Jewish Messiah set up by carnal Israel, in opposition to the Messiah of God. This personage will be the Israelite who shall consent to that act of felony to which Jesus would not consent—doing homage to the sovereignty of the Prince of this world in order that he might receive from his hands the gift of universal empire. To him Satan will fulfill the promise, 'If thou wilt fall down and worship me, all these things will I give thee.' Nor "will he regard any God," that is, any God hitherto known and worshipped as such; and why? "For he will magnify himself above all" but it will not be atheism that he will force on the nations. He will require them to worship the awful being whom he will try to place in the throne of God, that hitherto unknown being who in the margin is called "the God of Mauzzim" or God of fortresses. Perhaps the modern philosophers who are teaching that God is simply force, or power pervading the universe, may be preparing the way for the introduction of this new deity "The God of Fortresses."

CONTINUAL WITNESSING.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Aug 27. Acts 26: 22; Ps 34: 1-4.

TESTIMONY is found at this day, as it was in Apostolic times to be the most effective of all means of winning souls for Christ's kingdom. Preaching and teaching are necessary for promoting the Christian life and are also useful in arousing the conscience and presenting the way of salvation; but experience has proved that the halting and hesitating soul is led to decision more surely and more quickly by testimony than by argument, or any other means. It is so in the affairs of life. A sick man would be more disposed to apply to a particular physician if a man whom he knows had been cured of the same disease by that physician, than he would be by examining the physician's diplomas. A man would be led to take up his residence in a certain district with more confidence by the testimony of friends who were living there and who spoke of its salubrity, fertility or business advantages, than he would by any eloquent description of the district. "I have tried it and therefore I know," is a more effective argument than, "I believe it to be good and there are many reasons why it should be trustworthy." The emphasis Christ placed on the duty of public confession of him, showed that he knew its value as a means of propogating the faith. Nor is the confession to be limited to the declaration that is made on forming a connection with a Christian church. The life of a follower of Christ should be so full of peace and joy, so beneficent in prosperity and so strong in adversity that all who see it should desire to know the secret of so desirable a condition. The Christian enjoys no immunity from the ills of life. Sometimes it seems as if he were troubled more than other men. If, therefore, he maintains his cheerfulness and elasticity of spirit in trial, if he is patient under injustice, forbearing under provocation and generous and kind to his enemies, the world is not slow to infer that he has some help other than his own. That is his opportunity. It is for him to make it known that God does help those who trust in him and is willing to help others as he helps him. He becomes that conspicuous object, that living lesson, which Christ wishes him to be—the city set on a hill which cannot be hid. This opportunity of effective witness is lost to the Christian who lives a worldly life. If he frets and repines under misfortune, if he takes his pleasure in the places and ways that other men do, if he is quick to resent an injury, or if his time and effort are concentrated on acquiring money, his testimony is robbed of its power. The world fails to see any benefit that he derives from his religion and is sceptical as to its power. It comes therefore to this, that the Christian holds, as a sacred trust, the duty of making known to the world by his character, his conduct and his verbal testimony what God has done and is doing for him and thus winning others for Christ.

A THRIVING C. E. SOCIETY

A specimen report which could probably be duplicated in any one of thousands of churches in other cities, comes to us from Miss Mary E. Morse of Troy, N. Y. It shows how beneficial an influence the young people's society may have on a church when there is real consecration and vigor of purpose in the society. Miss Morse says: Our Society is connected with the Memorial Presbyterian Church. We organized in April last with a membership of twenty six. Since then the number has grown to forty-eight, of whom forty are active members. Our first consecration service which was held the first Sunday in June was one to be long remembered, as the spirit which moved the young people to give utterance to such sentences as expressed entire consecration to God, could have been none other than the spirit of Christ. During the months of July and August we are holding [illegible] services which occupy the entire evening, thus giving our pastor and the congregation an opportunity to work with the young people, as well as for them. Your enterprising secretary James H. Baxter issues a quarterly paper called "Life and Work." Our committees are all in good working order and we expect to do a great work for the Master in the months to come.

Our prayer meeting commtttee meets once a month at the houses of its members for the purpose of prayer and Bible study, in this way we have been drawn nearer to God, and from his word have learned many useful lessons which have been an inspiration to us in our Y. P. S. C. E. prayer meetings. Our earnest desire and the aim for which we are working is to bring souls to Christ.

WORK FOR KING'S DAUGHTERS.

An effort is being made by Sarah S. Paddock to interest the Order of King's Daughters in a neglected class of people whose condition is not generally known. It appears from her story that there are about two million persons living along the Appalachian mountains from Virginia to Alabama. They are chiefly descendants of hunters and trappers who were originally attracted there by the abundance of game. They have gradually sunk into a condition of semi-barbarism. Very few of them can read and they have consequently no knowledge of the world around them. Their ignorance is absolutely appalling. Their homes are rude log-cabins without windows and most of them comprise only one room for eating, living and sleeping for the whole family. Their poverty and hardships of their lives are beyond description. The women and girls especially suffer all their lives. They work from early morning until late at night to help make both ends meet, their dress consists generally of only one garment and they are often subject to ill usage. Mrs. Paddock tried the experiment of opening a school in one of these mountain districts. The result astonished her. Nearly two hundred children, chiefly girls, presented themselves the first day and some of them had come long distances in the hope of obtaining a little knowledge. Their eagerness to learn was pathetic. Mrs. Paddock suggests that the King's Daughters would find an appropriate field for work in opening and supporting such schools. Any circle willing to accept her suggestion may get full particulars by writing her at 64 East Park St., East Orange, N. J.

A SOLEMN HOUR

One of the most hallowed seasons of the recent World's Conference of Students at Northfield, is thus described by a correspondent of the Young Men's Era the organ of Young Men's Christian Associations: "At the close of his morning address Mr. Moody invited all who were anxious for a fuller anointing of God's Spirit to come to his house at three o'clock. His lawn was covered with men at that hour and, with Mr. Needham, Major Whittle and Mr. Towner leading the line, about three hundred men followed a wood road for a mile up into the hills. There in a little natural amphitheatre under the trees they sat down, and an hour and more passed quickly. The opening verses of the book of Acts and the story of the transfiguration was read, a few words spoken from time to time by Mr. Moody and one or two others, but most of the time was spent by men bending before God. Drops of rain fell from time to time but were little heeded. There was much searching of heart, much face to face communion with God, and when at the close Mr. Moody asked how many men believed they had received what they sought nearly all hands were up. The effects of that hour will be felt in many a college and in many another field of Christian work at home and abroad for years to come."

THE FOUR COLOR LEADERS OF B.Y.P.U.

On this page are four portraits which our friends of the Baptist Young People's Union will be glad to have as a memento of the great Convention at Indianapolis. They are those of the Chairmen of the Committees representing the four great geographical sections. These sections, as will be remembered, were distinguished for convenience of arrangement by the color of their badges. The blue badge indicated that the delegate came from a Union west of the Mississippi; the wearer of a gold badge came from a Northern State; green was the color for Southern delegates, and the wearers of red badges hailed from Canada. The arrangements for each section were placed in charge of a committee appointed for that section. The chairmen were consequently representative men with considerable responsibility devolving upon them. The chairman of the blue or Western section was Prof. L. D. Inskeep, of Oakland, Cal., whose portrait is at the head of the group. The chairman of the gold, or Northern section section, whose portrait is on the left was Mr. A. H. Finn of Detroit, Mich. The portrait on the right is of Dr. J. B. Cranfill of Waco, Texas, who was chairman of the Green, or Southern section. The last portrait, at the foot of the group, is Mr. Thomas Urquhart of Toronto who was chairman of the Red, or Canadian section. The respective rallies of these sections at the convention were scenes of wonderful enthusiasm, showing how firm a hold the young people's movement has taken of the churches in all parts of the United States and Canada. At all the meetings the same testimony was given that wherever a Union had been organized, the church had been benefited and was manifesting increased energy, devotion and power.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

The convention of the Utica District held at Rome, N. Y., was largely attended. The delegates brought news of growth and enthusiastic work from all parts of the district. The Sunrise prayer-meeting was a time long to be remembered by all who were present. Among the papers read at the general meetings were: "Possibilities of Ordinary Young People" by H. E. Hule; "Music as a Factor in League Work" by W. M. Hydon; "Home Mission Work" by Edward A. Evans; and the "Place of the Wesleys in History," by Anne Davis. The Question Drawer was conducted by Rev. W. F. Brown.——The chapter of Thames St. Church, Newport, R. I., has a distinguished member in the person of Miss Ida Lewis, the American Grace Darling.——At Chester, Pa., the Mercy and Help Department of the Madison St. League is proving a blessing to the town. The work is thoroughly systematized and while some members visit the hospital and take flowers and delicacies to the patients and hold song services there, others are visiting the sick in their homes and doing acts of kindness there. If through any misfortune the Department were to suspend its work the loss of its services would be severely felt, although it is not long since such an organization was unknown.——At Hoopeston, Ill., the pastor attributes a revival which the church has enjoyed to the blessing of God on the efforts of the League. Various courses of lectures and studies have been inaugurated and maintained which are thoroughly appreciated in the town. ——Four new Leagues are reported in the West Virginia Conference, all of which have been organized during the past few weeks. There is a growing sense of the value of the League throughout the Conference as it is seen how great is the benefit that churches which have it derive from it.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The Christian Endeavor meetings in connection with the Parliament of Religions at the World's Fair will be held in the Hall of Washington on Saturday, Sept. 23, and Sunday, September 24.

The Christian Endeavor Society of the West Spruce Street Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, has charge of the Wednesday night Prayer Meeting during the summer. Formerly that meeting was omitted during July and August. There is now a better attendance during these months than was formerly seen in the winter.

A gift volume will be published to commemorate the forthcoming jubilee of Young Men's Christian Associations. It will give a succinct account of work for young men in the different countries of the world, going back to a period anterior to the formation of the Y.M.C.A, and tracing the development thereof from the time of affiliation with the international organization.

A false report has been going the rounds of many papers, east and west, to the effect that Dr. Clark, the president of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, is about to retire from his duties on account of broken health and increasing age. As Dr. Clark returned from his year's journey around the world in better health than ever the rumor is evidently false, and since he has as yet scarcely reached middle age, the second reason given for his reputed resignation is manifestly absurd.

We shall be glad to receive from readers who are members of Christian Endeavor Societies, the King's Daughters, etc., reports of the progress of the work in their localities and of any new methods which have been found successful.

Coffee-Drinking in the Orient.

How the Fragrant Berry is Prepared and Served to the Guest—A Group of Peasant Coffee-drinkers from the Village of Gaza.

WHERESOEVER a traveler goes in the East, he finds coffee and coffee-drinkers. On the whole, the Orientals are an abstemious people, little given to indulgence in spirituous liquors, and well-nigh free from the vice of drunkenness, so prevalent in western countries. Next to water—which is frequently so scarce as to be a positive luxury—they love their coffee. In the Syrian rural districts it is the all-pervading, staple refreshment, and there, as among the Arabs also, it is the first thing to be offered to a guest. So important a part does the aromatic berry play in the rites of hospitality, that the master of the house himself generally prepares the coffee for his guests. According to the ancient usage of courtesy, he sips the first cup himself to re-assure the others as to its quality. Formerly this act was designed to prove that it contained nothing poisonous or deleterious. Indeed, among the Bedouins, who are regarded as a deceitful people, and who hardly trust each other, it may still be viewed as a very necessary custom. A Moslem, too, never accepts a cup of coffee from his host or landlord unless the latter first shows good faith by drinking a cup poured from the same vessel.

A peculiarity—and a very agreeable one—found everywhere in the East, is the fact that coffee which is not newly made is never offered to guests or visitors. No matter how poor the circumstances of the host, how scant his conveniences or slender his supplies, he never fails to produce a handful of beans which he places in a mortar-like vessel and proceeds to pulverize it with a mallet, not unlike a pestle used by druggists. In a few minutes the infusion is made and lo! a cup of rich, fragrant, steaming coffee salutes the nostrils of the stranger, cheering and invigorating him as he drinks or rather sips it. This is how the coffee is prepared: in a shovel-shaped spoon, which is sometimes large enough to hold a pound, a quantity of beans is placed, and the spoon is then held on the fire. The beans are stirred continually with a thin piece of iron until they are well roasted; they are then spread on a mat for a moment to cool. They are next put in the wooden vessel already spoken of, and the coffee-maker begins to pound them with his mallet until they are reduced to powder, he, meanwhile, chatting with his visitor. This powder is dropped in the coffee-pot, which contains sufficient water, and the pot is set on the fire where it quickly boils. The coffee is then decanted into cups holding an ounce apiece. It is much stronger, usually, than coffee prepared after the Western style.

In a photograph on this page a group of peasants from the neighborhood of Gaza are seen preparing coffee. One of the men has a vessel before him in which he is grinding the beans; the duty of the peasant sitting on the left is to roast them, while another—in the middle of the group—is looking after the coffee-pot. The little company seem to be agriculturists living comfortably, as Orientals do, on a farm together. These people are never in a hurry and it is quite evident from the attitude and expression of the group in the photograph that they mean to prolong their little meal and have a good chat over their coffee.

The Serpent in the Book.

HERE is a most instructive incident from India. "One day," says The Household, "a gentleman went into his library and took down a book from the shelves. As he did so, he felt a slight pain in his finger, like the prick of a pin. He thought that a pin had been stuck by some careless person in the cover of the book. But soon his finger began to swell, then his arm, then his whole body, and in a few days he died. It was not a pin among the books, but a small and deadly serpent." Many serpents are found among books in libraries nowadays. I refer to such books as contain detective stories, murder stories, love stories. True or untrue, they have their deadly influence on the minds of those who read them, and like the sting of that little serpent, they may not seem to hurt at first, but steadily their influence on the mind grows, and if the reader is not led astray through them, into sin speedily, they will pervert his desire for pure literature and degrade his mental powers, so it is hard for him to interest himself in any kind of literature that is not sensational.

PEASANTS OF THE ENVIRONS OF GAZA, PREPARING COFFEE.

From a photograph secured by Rev. Dr. Talmage in the East.

"WHEN I HAVE TIME."

WHEN I have time, so many things I'll do
To make life happier and more fair
For those with lives now crowded down with care;
I'll help to lift them from their low despair—
When I have time!

When I have time, the friend I love so well
Shall know no more those weary, toiling days;
I'll lead her feet in pleasant paths always,
And cheer her heart with words of sweetest praise—
When I have time!

When you have time! The friend you hold so dear
May be beyond the reach of your intent,
May never know that you so kindly meant
To fill her life with joy and sweet content—
When you had time.

Now is the time! Ah, friend, no longer wait
To scatter loving smiles and words of cheer
To those around whose lives are now so drear:
They may not need you in the coming year;
Now is the time.

A Navajo Housewife.

WHILE other American Indian tribes have undergone great changes, the Navajos of northern Mexico have retained many of their original characteristics. J. J. Peatfield, writing in the Californian Magazine, gives this pleasing picture of a Navajo housewife: "Seated on a blanket spread upon the ground beneath a tree whose foliage affords protection from the rays of the sun, an Indian woman is engaged in spinning woolen yarn. She is a type of the comely women of the Navajo race. In breadth of shoulders and in the size and muscular development of her arms and hands she is almost masculine; the most casual observer would willingly admit that in a personal struggle she would prove a formidable antagonist to most city-bred men of our times, while the dude would be a plaything and shuttlecock to her in a test of strength. Her hair parted in the middle, is gathered back and tied behind her head in a complicated knot, which is held together by the insertion of a rude hairpin preventing the strands from disentangling themselves. Pendant from her ears are silver bangles, and on occasions she may be seen to wear a necklace of colored beads or torquoise gems. She is clad in the costume of her primitive race." They are industrious and intelligent, faithful to their spouses and very skilful at weaving, and other domestic arts.

PERILOUS "GOOD TIMES."

IN most American communities it is the custom to permit a large amount of latitude in the way of calling and social enjoyment, to the young girl who has finished her school course. In ultra-fashionable society, this latitude runs to excess and the youthful devotee is almost sacrified in body and mind to the demands of parties, teas, receptions, sociables, concerts, etc. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has repeatedly warned parents against the perils their children encounter at such a time. We find that a wholesome crusade against this pernicious custom is going on in many parts of the country. Rev. Dr. W. T. Poynter, of Shelbyville, Ky., a leading educator, in a recent address to the graduates of a collegiate institution in that State, said:

"Allow me to utter a loud protest against the so-called 'good time' which custom allows to the well-to-do young woman between her school days and her marriage. It is a fearful misnomer to call the wasted days of this period a 'good time.' They are anything else. She learns nothing, or next to nothing; she does nothing that is permanently valuable. She seems to have no aim save to please in what she calls society, and the days and months and years come and go with nothing stored away for future use and future happiness. Jennie Smith writes to Susan Jones that if it suits Susan, she, Jennie, will visit her at a certain date. Susie reads it with joy, for reasons that will appear presently. She takes the letter to her mother, and there is probably a scene before the matter is settled.

"Mother knows what that visit means—of worry and care, to say nothing of its expense and its danger. It does not suit, but Susie is persistent, and promises all sorts of help in emergency (a promise, however, she rarely keeps), until mother gives her consent. A letter is written to Jennie at once and posted before another sun sets, telling the 'dearest girl on earth' how rejoiced the whole family is at her coming and that the two will have 'such a splendid time.' On her way to the office she tells her boy friends that 'Jennie Smith will be at my house on a certain day, and that she is just too lovely for anything and that you will be charmed with her,' etc., always ending with the invitation to call, 'be sure to call.' This canvass of the town is a more thorough one than any beggar can make,—this canvass for attention, professedly for Jennie Smith, but really for Susan Jones. The day comes, and the boys come. How could they help it. Judge Jones is an influential man and his wife keeps a good table, and these young men are debtors to their hospitality. And then did not Susan invite them—press them into service?

"Two, three, four weeks are spent by Jennie Smith with Susan Jones. She stays as long as the boys hold out. Finally takes her departure, probably for other homes for a similar experience. As soon as Susan can catch up her lost sleep and have her dresses righted and a new one or two added to the already full wardrobe, she visits Jennie Jones. And Jennie has made similar provision for Susan's return visit.

"And there is no end to this senseless and dangerous custom. I saw one of my girls who had not been home for three months. A girl in good health and a competent girl, at least she might have been a competent girl, had the idea of competency ever gotten into her head."

CHAPTER III.

A SOLEMN HOUR.

HELEN DANGERFIELD lay dying in the house of her sister-in-law, surrounded by every luxury that wealth could purchase, watched over with real tenderness and devotion, her soul at peace with God, and her mind at rest as to the future of her boy.

It sometimes seemed to her that she had no ungratified wish left. This peaceful relief, following upon a long season of struggle and anxiety came as such a boon and blessing that death itself was robbed of all its terrors, and even the parting with her boy seemed to the mother a small thing now that she left him in kind and tender hands.

Guy was a lovable and sweet-tempered child, who won his way wherever he went. Already he was almost like a brother in the new home and Monk and he were sworn friends and allies, wrapped up in each other in a fashion somewhat unusual for boys, sharing the same room, the same pursuits and studies, and never seemingly quite content unless in the company of one another.

And then Clare, as she had learned to call her newly-found sister was so unspeakably good to him. She treated him in all things precisely like her own children, and had accepted the guardianship of the boy as a sacred trust, which she had promised to carry out to the best of her abilities. She seemed to love the child—and in truth she did love him, both for his own sake, and for the fact that his very existence was a proof, so to speak, that she had nothing more to fear from anyone bearing his name—and she intended to make him in all things as one of her own. What more could mother desire? Helen, closing her weary eyes on a world that had been but a hard place for her, was more than content to answer the call which had come at last. She longed so wearily for the everlasting rest that not even the tender love of her boy could win back her thoughts to earth again. Was not her husband awaiting her on the other side? Was it not best as it was? She felt that indeed it was, and waited in gentle patience and trust for the last call that could not now be much longer delayed.

And yet, as Mrs. Dangerfield sat beside her sister that December night—giving the night nurse the unwonted luxury of a night in her own bed—neither guessed how near the end was. It was not because she had thought Helen worse than usual that day that she had offered to take the night watch, simply that she thought the nurse looked somewhat tired, and was glad to arrange for her to have an undisturbed night. Mrs. Dangerfield was an excellent and capable nurse, as had many times been demonstrated before, and Helen was never more restfully content than when she and Clare were alone together. As she opened her eyes after a light sleep to see the nurse's chair occupied by her sister, a smile of welcome lighted up her wan face, and she put out one feeble wasted hand.

"How good you always are to me, Clare: and I can never repay you."

"That is not the word to be used between sisters," answered the other, coming and sitting down beside the bed. "I only wish you had made yourself known to us before, Helen. We might have had you with us longer if you could have been cared for earlier."

"I think it is better as it is. At least I could not be happier than I am, and the blow will fall more lightly on Guy just now, now that he is but a child, and has so many new interests about him, and a second mother to love him, than if he had grown used to this life before I was taken. He will not forget me, but he will learn to be happy and content with his brothers and sisters. Ah, if you could but know how glad—how thankful I feel!"

Such words were often on Helen's lips in [illegible] answer, but pressed the wasted hand she held in hers, and presently the patient dropped off into a light sleep, from which she awoke after a while with a moan and a start. Her eyes were full of terror, but when she saw who was bending over her, she smiled and the wild look passed away.

"It was only a dream, dear—the old dream that will never quite be banished, I think, so long as I live. I seemed to see the dead body of my husband, as they brought him home that day from the ice. Did I ever tell you about it? He died saving some little children who had fallen through a black yawning hole, whom nobody else would lift a finger to save. I cannot generally talk about it—but now nothing can hurt me. He saved two. The third was brought out clinging frantically to him—but man and child were both dead. I thought it so terrible then—but nothing is terrible now."

Mrs. Dangerfield once more pressed the hand she held, but there was a look of perplexity upon her face. She had never before heard any of the details of Guy Dangerfield's death: but she had known that it had been the result of an accident, and that the birth of little Guy had happened at the same time: but the boy's birthday was in April, and Helen was talking of what must surely have happened in midwinter. She could not make it out: but at the moment no sense of uneasiness came over her. She thought that Helen might be wandering a little. Guy had been drowned—but it had not been an ice accident, or if so, it must have been a very late and phenomenal frost. But the sick woman continued to speak in the same dreamy way.

"I saw the ice clinging to his hair, and the lips that I touched were like ice themselves. And after that I can remember nothing, till I awoke to find my little Guy in my arms, and I only understood by degrees that God had taken away my husband, and had left me instead a little son."

Helen's eyes were open now, and she was looking about her with her senses all quickened and aroused. She raised her thin hand, and pointed towards a box which stood upon a table full in her sight—a box which those who knew her best were certain contained such relics of her dead husband as she still possessed, for it always stood where she could see it, and she often lay for hours with her eyes fixed upon it. The key was round her neck. She had never parted with it for a moment since the day she became a widow.

"I should like to show you Guy's portrait," she said at length. "Will you bring me the box?"

It was brought and opened, and the widow touched with gentle, reverent fingers the papers and trinkets enshrined there.

"Please let the letters be buried with me," she said softly, "I never had many—we were so little parted, but they are everyone of them here, sealed up in this packet—I know them all by heart. The watch and seals and the other things Guy must have, and the Bible. Tell him his father read it every day, and ask him to do the same always. Here is the picture—it is a miniature—I thought it very like him when it was taken. I think Guy will grow up very like his father. He must keep the portrait and love it for the sake of the father he never saw."

Mrs. Dangerfield looked, and saw a face which reminded her both of her own husband and her father-in-law, and which little Guy's strongly resembled.

Helen lay fingering the papers and other contents of the box, whilst Mrs. Dangerfield absently opened the Bible, which was not a large one, and began turning the leaves, hardly conscious of what she was doing. Between the Old and New Testaments was a blank leaf bound in, and upon that leaf were several entries written.

The first of these was the marriage of Guy Dangerfield with Helen Wayland, followed by the date of the event. After that the date of the death of Guy Dangerfield, on the fourteenth day of January now nearly thirteen years ago, and immediately following this entry was another—the birth of Guy Monksweld [illegible] the fourteenth of January that same year.

Mrs. Dangerfield sat looking upon these entries with a strange expression upon her face: but the sick woman's eyes were not turned in her direction. When she spoke no one could have detected the least excitement or agitation in her tone.

"I thought Guy's birthday was in April."

"It has always been kept on his christening day, instead of the real birthday. I could not bear for that anniversary to be kept as a bright day for my boy, nor could I let him go without a happy day of his own—for red-letter days were infrequent with us. So I decided that the christening day should be kept as a birthday, and so it has been ever since."

"Does he know himself?"

"No, there are a few things I do not talk about even to Guy."

"You are quite right. It does not do to sadden children too much, and he has known his full share of sorrow as it is. Does anyone know of this change of dates except yourself?"

"No, at least only my faithful old servant Martha Lister, who was with me then and for many succeeding years. But she married and emigrated at last, and I have lost sight of her completely. I am glad I have remembered to tell you. Sometimes in examinations and so on the difference of a few months might make it needful for the boy to stand as much as a year earlier, they tell me. However, you will know all about that. It is of no consequence in any other way."

"Not the least," answered Mrs. Dangerfield, who felt as if she were speaking and moving in a dream.

There was silence again in the room for a long time Helen was growing drowsy, and her nurse seemed locked in deepest thought. Presently she spoke and asked a sudden question.

"Did you never write to Guy's father—your father-in-law, I mean—about his death and the birth of this child?"

A look of pain crossed Helen's face.

"I did write—but I do not think he ever read the letter. He used to send Guy's back unopened. I think he put mine behind the fire unread. Guy used to say that he was a man who never forgave."

"I am afraid that is only too true—it is but too likely that he would take that course. But I wonder we never saw a notice of his death in the papers."

"It was never sent in—I was too ill to think of anything for weeks, and Martha too ignorant. There was an account of the accident—I have a cutting of it here—but the name was misprinted—they had made it into Sangerfield."

Again there was a long silence. It was Mrs. Dangerfield who broke it at last.

"What made you give Guy his second name? Was it your husband's wish expressed beforehand?

"Yes—he had said sometimes that if the child were a boy, he should call it by the name of the mother he loved so fondly. I do not believe that he would have kept up the Guy. But I could not help adding it—I had lost one—I felt I must call my boy by my husband's name."

"And you told the name to Mr. Dangerfield when you wrote?"

"I dare say I did. I cannot remember now. What did it matter what I said? He never could have read the letter. If he had done so, he must have sent me just one line. Hard and indifferent as he was, he could not quite have ignored the death of the son he had once professed to love."

"I am certain of it," answered Mrs. Dangerfield with an emphasis that was meant as much to convince herself as her listener. "I am as certain as we can be of anything that our father-in-law never had your letter—at least that he never read it. You know that he was a very passionate and impulsive man, and that he acted on the impulse of the moment without troubling himself as to the consequences. You may be very sure that your letter was thrown behind the fire unread, and that he never knew to the day of his death whether his son were alive or dead."

Helen made a little sound of dissent. She was already too far away from earth to be troubled by worldly concerns, and she knew too little of life to pause to consider that her son was the old man's natural heir. She knew almost nothing about the quarrel that had parted father and son. Guy had told her that there had been hot and hasty words on both sides, and she knew he had repented, and that had he lived he would have tried to atone for his share in the rupture: but his death had followed too quickly, and he had no chance of taking the step of which he sometimes spoke.

Something of this she told in broken words to her sister-in-law that night, as they exchanged confidences and little marks of tenderness, and before the box of precious relics was finally closed, Mrs. Dangerfield laid her hand upon the Bible, and said gently,

"Dearest Helen, will you give this to me, as a memorial of the brother I never knew? I should prize it much for your sake and his. Can you bear to part with it to me?"

"O yes, my dearest, best of sisters—I shall love to think that it is in your keeping. You would have loved Guy had you known him. Keep it for his sake and for mine—and love our boy, and be good to him. May the Almighty Father in Heaven deal as tenderly with you and yours as you are dealing with our little orphaned son."

The wasted hands closed over the hand which clasped the faded Bible, and the dim eyes looked with unutterable loving gratitude into the face of the watcher. A very faint shiver ran through Mrs. Dangerfield's frame as she met the glance of those trusting eyes, but she did not shrink from their gaze.

"I will love him as my own—I will be a mother to him," she answered steadily, and as she spoke those words she believed them to be true. She thought that she had set herself a task well within her own powers.

The sick woman sank to sleep. Mrs. Dangerfield remained with her until satisfied that her slumber was deep and tranquil, and then the book closely clasped in her hands, she glided from the room and entered her own, which was not far away. Once there she fastened up the Bible into a parcel, sealed the packet with her own seal, wrote upon the outside what it was and how and when it had been given, and then locked it carefully away in a private bureau of her own, to which no hand but her own could find access.

She did not pause to think or to consider. She resolutely kept back all thought or reflection.

Mrs. Dangerfield went back to her quiet watch. She had been gone only a few moments, and yet in those moments a change had taken place. The patient still slept, but a gray shadow was creeping over the wan face. It was a shadow that Mrs. Dangerfield had seen before. She called the nurse, and dispatched a summons for the doctor, yet she knew all the time that neither the presence of nurse or doctor could avail aught here.

The end, looked forward to for so long, had come at last more suddenly than had been expected. Was there a momentary feeling of relief in the mind of the sister bending so tenderly over her? Was she conscious herself of a sense of satisfaction in the knowledge that the secret which had just passed those pale lips would pass them never again, at least it is certain that some such feeling was there.

Doctor and nurse came and stood beside the bed, and little Guy was sent for, to look his last upon her whom he would see in this world no more. Monk, aroused by the messenger from his sleep, had come with his cousin, and held his hand tight as they both stood and looked on the face of the dying woman.

Guy was not a boy whose tears flowed easily, and though he knew that his mother was dying, he did not break down into weeping as many children have done, though all the bright color had faded out of his face, and his eyes were full of a strange longing and awe. It seemed as if there would be no word of farewell for him, no last loving glance or parting smile: but just before the end came, the dying eyes unclosed and fixed themselves upon the boy's face.

"My little Guy—you will be very good always, and come to me some day—You are not alone, my darling—not even in this world. You will be brave and good and true, and repay with your best all the kindness that has been shown to your mother on her dying bed. Give your best gratitude and love to your aunt and cousins. You will be well taken care of now, thank God."

It was not all spoken together, but at intervals, as the patient found breath. Guy did not weep or protest, but he took the wasted hand in his and said,

"I promise, mother—I will never forget. I will be good, and try and show them that I am grateful."

"And I will take care of Guy always," said Monk earnestly, laying his hand upon his cousin's shoulder, and looking into his face with his honest loving eyes. "Everything that is mine shall be his. I shall take care of him always. We shall always be brothers, and nothing shall ever come between us."

Helen Dangerfield looked at the two boys with a faint fleeting smile.

"God bless you both," she whispered, and in that whisper her weary spirit fled.

Samson, the Playful.*

SAMSON is the most singular figure brought before us in the ancient Scriptures. There is no other man with whom he can be compared. Dean Stanley says of him, "He was the most frolicsome, irregular, uncultivated creature that the nation ever produced." Ewald says of him, "He overflows with inexhaustible joyousness in word and deed, light-heartedness under the heaviest disasters, and sportive wit that accompanies him even to the moment of his self-chosen tragic end." Dr. Marshall Lang says, "His quirks and quips, his irony, his grim laughter, as well as his feats of strength, are duly recorded. The story is strange and fantastic—one over which we smile and sigh, one of boisterous mirth and tearful sorrow—such wit and such folly, such force and such feebleness, comedy so grotesque and tragedy so awful!"

The facts have, then, to be faced, that the power of Samson lay in his impulsive practical jokings—the man must be doing something odd. And this was just the ministry God wanted at that particular time. Samson served his generation, and served his God in his generation by making people laugh. "His name was the 'Sunny' (the Playful'), and a kind of wild free sunniness of nature distinguished him in the struggle. He turned the laugh against the Philistines. He showed the Philistine up in his stolidity, his blind idolatry, the cowardice behind all the bullying. He bade his brethren be of good cheer." "Nothing could disturb his radiant good-humor. His most valiant, his most cruel actions, are done with a smile on his face and a jest in his mouth. It relieves his character from the sternness of Phœnician fanaticism. As a peal of hearty laughter breaks in upon the despondency of individual sorrow, so the joviality of Samson becomes a pledge of the revival of the greatness of the nation. It is brought out in the strongest contrast with the brute coarseness and stupidity of his Philistine enemies, here, as throughout the Sacred History, the butt of Israelitish wit and Israelitish craft."

Samson was only a single man—he had no following, and so there was nothing to fear; and very possibly the Philistines enjoyed as much as the Israelites seeing and hearing of his feats of strength. He was the "strong man" of his day, and his violent deeds were at first taken as jokes; only after a time were they recognized as serious mischief, and then attempts were made to arrest his course. But there is that also to be considered: In the East there is a kind of respect or fear produced by anybody who is unusual, either extraordinary in size, or in strength, or in endowment. The maniac is left as a free man, and almost worshipped. This Eastern sentiment explains the liberty of Samson. If people laughed at him, they were also afraid of him. There was never any knowing what he would do next, or against whom his practical joking would be turned. With a kind of common consent, everybody agreed to leave the man alone. It is precisely what would occur in our time. Nobody would like to spoil the fun which such a man would make; but they all would try to get out of his way, lest the fun should be turned upon them.

The Philistines did not regard Samson as acting with any particular object. They never attempted to punish Israel for his misdeeds. All the tricks were regarded as Samson's own. Even the last calamity at Gaza was entirely Samson's own device. Nobody suppressed it; nobody helped at it; nobody followed it up; and the Philistines did not avenge it by any further humiliation of the Israelites; Samson came, and did his work, and passed away; he was a striking personality, a remarkable individual. He had his own precise work to do and he did it. Men told the tale of his riddles and his jokes over their evening meals until the companies were convulsed with laughter; but all the laughter was against the country's foe, and when that foe came to be despised the way was opened for the active efforts which men of another type would presently lead.

How far we may go in estimating Samson's personal religion is not easy to decide. He had an evident sense of a Divine mission, and clearly admitted that the power for the mission depended on the loyalty; and at the end of life he turned to God in a simple, trustful way which was only possible to a man who knew God in previous personal relations. He is the man who "served his generation by the will of God" in the use of the gift of giant-like playfulness. He is the leader of a band that God keeps for every age—a band of men and women whose life-ministry is to cheer their fellows, and bring pleasant sunshine and relieving laughter into dull homes, hard lots, and suffering experiences.

WESLEY'S YOUTH.*

IT was while he was a member of Lincoln College that that unparalleled religious career of Mr. Wesley, which has always been regarded as the most wonderful religious movement of modern times, began. "Whoever studies the simplicity of its beginning, the rapidity of its growth, the stability of its institutions, its present vitality and activity, its commanding position and prospective greatness, must confess the work to be, not of man, but of God."

The heart of the youthful collegian was profoundly stirred by the reading of the "Christian Pattern," by Thomas a Kempis, and "Holy Living and Dying," by Jeremy Taylor. He learned from the former "that simplicity of intention and purity of affection were the wings of the soul, without which he could never ascend to God;" and on reading the latter he instantly resolved to dedicate all his life to God. He was convinced that there was no medium; every part must be a sacrifice to either God or himself. From this time his whole life was changed.

A little band was formed of such as professed to seek for all the mind of Christ. They commenced with four, but soon their number increased to six, then to eight, and so on. Their object was purely mutual profit. They read the classics on week days and divinity on the Sabbath. They prayed, fasted, visited the sick, the poor, the imprisoned. They were near to administer religious consolation to criminals in the hour of their execution.

As might have been expected, they were ridiculed and lampooned by those who differed from them, and who could not comprehend the motive to such a religious life. They were called, in derision, "Sacramentarians," "Bible Bigots," "Bible Moths," "The Holy Club," "The Godly Club," "Supererogation Men," and finally "Methodists." Their strict, methodical lives, in the arrangement of their studies and the improvement of their time, their serious deportment and strict attention to religious duties, caused a jovial friend of Charles Wesley to say, "Why, here is a new sect of Methodists springing up," alluding to a school of ancient physicians, or to a class of nonconforming ministers of the seventeenth century, or to both, who received this title from some things common to both. The name took, and the young men were known throughout the university as Methodists. The name, thus given in derision, was finally accepted, and has been retained in honor to this day.

EIGHT MILLION YOUNG MEN.†

ONLY a small percentage of the young men of this country are in our colleges and universities; and truth compels the confession that many of them are living impure lives. Only five per cent. of our youths are in the churches, seeking Christian development and establishment in genuine godliness. Seventy-five per cent are not even professing to seek the truth and to live pure lives. Doubtless some who make no public statement of their belief, or declaration of principles and purposes in life, are pure and true men; but many who do claim to be virtuous are not what they profess to be. It is safe to assert that not over twenty per cent. of our young can be counted on as above habits of impurity and sensuality. Think of it! Eight million young men in the United States, and only one twentieth of them openly and aggressively striving to be honest, pure, and Christ-like—less than one fifth of them worthy of pure mothers, chaste sisters, and virtuous wives.

There is no hope of success in the effort to bring up boys in ignorance of matters relating to sex. The world has tried it for centuries, and the effort has signally failed. Promise of improvement lies only in giving early, honestly, and affectionately such information, admonition, and watch-care as the importance of the subject demands.

Of course, not all boys can be kept pure through knowledge alone; but knowledge, properly imparted, will direct aright and save from sin many who otherwise would go the way of the vile, gathering up as they go the natural fruits of a sensual life—weakness, inefficiency, discontent, disease, and premature death—and leaving behind, as a terrible legacy to the world, an emphasized tendency to disease and to race-extermination.

AFTER THE BATTLE, REST.*

REST will be sweet in the evening, when the day's long labor is done;
Now, I must be up and doing, for my work is scarce begun.

Once in the early morning, when the dews were not yet dry,
In the misty summer morning, or ever the sun was high,

As I looked along the road whereby I must presently go,
And saw how great was the journey, how fiercely the noon would glow,

Life felt too heavy a burden, and I, so weary and worn.
Weary before I had labored, and longing for night at morn.

What right have I to be weary, when my work is scarce begun?
What right have I to be weary, while aught remains to be done?

I shall be weary at even, and rest will the sweeter be,
And blessed will peace be to them that have won the victory.

But now is the time for battle—now I would strive with the best;
Now is the time for labor; hereafter remaineth rest. —MARY A. HOPPER.

A CHINAMAN'S LOST FACE.

IN the course of a letter from one of the missionaries of the China Inland Mission is the following incident: "The worst man I have had to deal with since I came to China is a man named Jan. He was a hardened reprobate. He was one of the rebel army at the great rebellion. He had been a slave dealer of the lowest type, dealing in woman and children only. He had been a coiner, and coiners in China are just as bad as coiners in other countries, and finally he became a professional gambler, spending his whole time in a gambling hell. When anyone wanted an extra steep game they sent for Mr. Jan. Owing to some rumors which he had heard, he came to see me, and said, 'I have heard strange stories about you, and so have come up to see you.' He wished to know why we came to his country. There was not much prospect of getting rich, especially for foreigners. I told him we did not come to get money. Then what did we want? Just to tell him and others of Jesus, who saves from sin. He had heard of three million gods, and had himself a good number, one for every room in the house and one for the outside, and one for himself, besides an ancestral tablet; but such a God as this, he had never heard of. One who would save from sin: what a strange God! He came back to the next meeting, and asked me a peculiar question, 'Would this strange God have anything to do with a man without a face?' That means a man without character whom no one would believe or trust. Yes, for Jesus said himself that he came to save the lost sinners. That was all, but he went to his own house, took his god and put it in the fire; then seizing the other idols, served them in the same way, and finally, to the horror of his sons and relations, took his ancestral tablet and broke it in pieces. This act showed a wonderful strength of character, as the ancestral tablets are held especially sacred. I never, even in a Christian land, found a man who so thoroughly realized and appreciated that characteristic of our Lord, the desire for the salvation of the most degraded.

ONE DAY.

REVEAL Thy face at morn,
And with thy smile adorn
The opening day,
In sign of sweet accord,
O loving Lord!

At noon extend thine arm,
To shield from threatening harm
Thy servant true,
Relying on thy word,
O helpful Lord!

'Mid darkness safely keep,
While thy beloved sleep
In promised rest,
'Neath thy sure watch and ward,
O loving Lord!

THE CARPENTER

THIS world has oft been shaken
By the restless of our race,
By the murder boom of cannon
In the strife for power and place.
Great monarchs have wielded sceptres
Leading nations into thrall,
But there is an old-time record
Of a greater than them all.

Did the brass encased Horatius
Hold the bridge against a host?
Did Cæsar's refulgent banners
Meet the sun on every coast?
Did victory crown Hannibal,
And armies before him fall?
There's a page on time's bright annals
More illustrious than all.

Who cares now for the Corsican
Who set the wide world aflame?
Who loves dead Alexander
Enough to revere his name?
Oh, 'tis not the thing called glory,
That thinkers love to recall,
The good are the earth's great landmarks,
And they last through ages all.

Bring me the robes of the Cæsars,
And the wonders of Cathay:
Lay them right here on the altar—
Who will worship them to-day?
Egypt and Thebes and Babylon
Are but writings on the wall,
The Carpenter of Nazareth
Is beloved above them all.

The Apostles' Creed.

Its History and the Circumstances under which it was Composed.

IN a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD inquiry was made by a correspondent regarding the authorship of the Apostles' Creed. This was explained briefly at the time, within the restricted limits of the "MAIL-BAG." Since then, a very interesting article on the subject from the able pen of Dr. Adolph Harnack, Professor in the University of Berlin, has appeared in the Nineteenth Century. Prof. Harnack writes:

"When we trace the text of the Apostles' Creed back through our catechisms and other printed versions of it to the oldest of all, and back again through them to the manuscripts and to the writings of the later Fathers, we are brought up in the second half of the fifth century. There are strong reasons for believing that it did not exist as it now stands before the middle of the fifth century. About this time, however, we meet with this text of the Creed in the Church of Southern Gaul, and in this Church alone. Hence it follows—and the conclusion is now, so far as I know, universally accepted—that the Apostles' Creed in its present form is the baptismal confession of the Church of Southern Gaul, dating from the middle, or rather from the second half of the fifth century. From Southern Gaul the Church carried the Gallican Creed into the kingdom of the Franks, and it spread with the expansion of that kingdom. The relations of the Carolingian kings with Rome brought it to the capital of the world (at least we have no authority for believing that this happened any earlier); it was adopted at Rome, and thence imposed on all the countries of the West.

"To this Creed was attached a legend that it was composed on the tenth day after the Ascension at a meeting of the Twelve Apostles, each of them contributing one sentence. Peter's contribution was 'I believe in God, the Father Almighty, Maker of Heaven and Earth,' and he as Judas to Matthias, who contributed the final words, 'and the life everlasting.' This conception of the origin of the Creed held its ground, so far as I know, unbroken and unopposed all through the Middle Ages and throughout the jurisdiction of the Roman Church; the Greek Church alone maintaining that she knew nothing of an Apostolic Creed. [illegible] must have had to which such an origin was attributed. Unconsciously it came to be classed [illegible] [illegible] about 250 and about 400, and probably still later, the [illegible] which she held in the highest honor; to which she would allow no additions to be made; which she believed to be directly descended from the Baptism of Christ; she knew it as she possessed it, and whereof she conceived that Peter had brought it to Rome. To this [illegible] legend as to its composition, which I have [illegible] Roman Apostles' Creed. We must regard it as an [illegible] Roman Creed came into existence about, or shortly before, the middle of the second century. It was composed in Rome itself, where it did not at first count as Apostolic in any strict sense. On the contrary, the legend of its Apostolic origin most probably sprang up some time afterward in Rome between 250 and 330 A. D., after the Creed had spread over the Western provinces.

"How did it come about that the Roman Church gave up her old Creed in the eighth or ninth (possible even the tenth) century, in exchange for the younger confession of Gaul, when it has been clearly proved that up to the fifth century she valued it above everything else and would not suffer the slightest alteration to be made in it? The obscurity enveloping this exchange has not yet been cleared away, although it has been lightened to a considerable extent. When, from the last third of the fifth century onwards, large numbers of Aryan Christians poured into Rome and in a short time became the lords of Italy and her capital, the Roman Church, in order to express her hostility to the Aryans, gave up her old Creed and substituted for it at baptism the Nicene Creed. Disregarding, then, the additions and amplifications made to the Old-Roman Creed by the Gallic confession, and considering the former, as we justly may, to be the original of what we call the Apostles' Creed, we may safely say that the Apostles' Creed dates from the post-Apostolic age. The author of it is unknown. The purpose for which it was composed can be determined with certainty from our knowledge of its uses; it sprang out of the missioning and catechising function of the Church, and was originally merely the confession to be used at baptism."

AN ARCTIC EXPLORER DEAD.

In the death of Dr. John Rae (which lately took place in England), there passed away one of the oldest Arctic explorers of the present generation. Dr. Rae was a native of the Orkney Isles, and early in life made several voyages in the Northern Seas. In 1846 he commanded a small exploring party, which made a voyage of 900 miles to Repulse Bay, and wintered on shore there. Next year, with his companions, he walked 1,300 miles along the coast, of which he made a scientific survey, practically connecting the discoveries of Ross, in Boothia Felix, with those of Parry, in 1823, at the strait of the Fury and Hecla. Dr. Rae's next important expedition, jointly with Sir John Richardson, in 1848, was in search of Sir John Franklin, coasting eastward along the Arctic shores, Wollaston and Victoria Lands, from the Mackenzie to the Coppermint River; after which Dr. Rae, with two men, hauling sledges, traveled 1,350 miles to Winnipeg, now in the Canadian Dominion. He gained the reward of $50,000 offered for intelligence concerning Franklin. His third notable performance, in 1853 and 1854, was the exploration of the west coast of Boothia to Bellot Strait, completing the map between the surveys before made by Ross and Dease and Simpson. He was afterwards engaged, in Greenland and in British Columbia, upon surveys for telegraph lines. In 1850 he published a "Narrative of an Expedition to the Shores of the Arctic Sea in 1846 and 1847." His name will rank among the Arctic explorers of the nineteenth century.

A Heathen Hindoo Festival.

"The Holi" and its Abominations Described by an Impartial Eye-witness.

OF all the festivals that are celebrated in India, writes Rev. T. E. F. Morton, the Holi, in my judgment, is the most horrible. A trip to the post office a few days ago gave me an opportunity of witnessing some of the doings of the uncontrolled participators of the feasts. Large tubs of colored water could be seen at different points in the city, into which the rollicking scamps would plunge their brazen, tin, or bamboo syringes and then freely discharge their crimson contents on the Hindoo passers-by. In the absence of syringes and paint, some would descend to the office of scavengers, by scraping up gutter filth and bedaubing their friends with it. Men and children would be forcibly seized and their persons abundantly supplied with red powder, and those who managed to extricate themselves, would have a red shower bath in flight. Hindoo women would make themselves scarce on those wretched festival days, but those who dared to venture out received no little of the worst of abuse.

Rich and poor, great and small, old and young, strong and weak, men, women, and children—all participate in the filthy feast. The grog shops are freely visited by the men. Madak (betel leaf mixed with opium), charas (a kind of intoxicating drug) and bhang (the leaf of the hemp plant) are constantly smoked; and under these maddening and intoxicating stuffs, they sally forth with country cymbals and drums singing monotonously all over the place, to the infinite disgust of the Christian ear. The place overrun with the rowdy crowd is a perfect pandemonium.

Under the maddening influence of opium and drink a quarrel ensued the other day at Undilla, a village near by in which eighteen men were wounded and one almost killed. While seated at the civil dispensary an old man was brought in from a village, who, from the nature of the wounds sustained, must have been severely belabored with a club; for he had three broad gashes on the head. From a small station like this such cases as the above are reported, but what must the large centres furnish? Drunkards and opium eaters and smokers are no respecters of persons; they are devoid of those nice, tender, filial feelings which are the heritage of the sober and the righteous, and are in danger any day of ruthlessly destroying others and themselves.

There are educated Hindoos who are verily ashamed of the outrageous doings at the Holi; who, would rejoice, should the government wipe the evil out of existence. The officer in charge of the civil dispensary here an educated Brahman, regards the Holi as a nuisance and would be glad if the government knocked it on the head.

FRANKLIN AND THE SCOFFERS.

WHEN Franklin was in Paris, among the infidels and scoffers of that day, he was ridiculed for loving a Bible. He determined to find out how many had read the Book at which they scoffed. He informed one of the learned sonietiss, of which he was a member, that he had come across a story in pastoral life in ancient times that appeared to him very beautiful, but he would like the judgment of the society upon it. On the evening appointed, Franklin had a reader of finely modulated voice read to them the Book of Ruth. They were in ecstasies over it, and one after another rose to express gratification and admiration and the desire that the manuscript should be printed. "It is printed," said Franklin, "and it is part of the Bible."

HOW A QUARREL WAS SETTLED.

A RECIPE for the settlement of quarrels will be useful to many people, and one is given in the following incident by a correspondent, which may be commended as almost infallible:

Mrs. A. was a widow, and, like many of God's children, she had a trouble. Of a quiet, inoffensive disposition, unwilling to give offence, from some unknown cause a person who had lately taken a room in the same house had an extreme dislike to her. Mrs. B. was a woman of a proud, arrogant spirit, and seemed most ingenious in finding ways of annoying her neighbor. This at first produced tears and depression, but after a time Mrs. A.'s heart was filled with anger, and a desire for revenge took possession of her.

I was accustomed to call on her, and often we had taken sweet counsel together of the goodness and mercy that had followed us, and the bright country towards which, through sovereign grace, both our faces were turned. Now this was altered. The conversation turned to the cruel conduct of her adversary, who daily provoked her sore; even the reading of a chapter or psalm was often interrupted by the relation of some fresh insult or unkind word.

The time came for me to leave the locality, and with a heavy heart I went to say "Goodbye" to my poor friend, who was as sad as ever. In a few words of parting prayer, I was unpremeditately led to pour out my heart in earnest pleading for blessing for Mrs. B., and immediately light seemed to dawn on this dark affair. I said to Mrs. A., "I think there is a way out of your difficulty. Whenever you see, or hear, or think of Mrs. B., pray for her—if you can only say, 'Lord, help and bless her.'" The suggestion was not very well received, and very cool was the response to my parting handshake.

Many years passed away, and when at last we met, I was pleased to see how well and peaceful my old friend looked. After a chat on various subjects, came the rather reluctant question, "Do you know anything of Mrs. B.?" "Oh, yes; and you will be surprised to hear we are the best of friends. That morning you prayed for her, I felt much hurt. I said to myself, you had gone over to her, and instead of one friend, I had two enemies. When I next saw her, she threw out a spiteful word, and I was furiously angry, so that it made me quite faint. When I got home, I thought, 'It is not what Mrs. B. said, but my anger towards her, that has made me ill.'" I don't know how I did it, but I knelt down and said, 'Lord help and bless Mrs. B., for Jesus' sake.' From that time things began to get better. We did not make aay fuss about it, but we got more friendly. Her boy was ill, and I helped to nurse him, and she is greatly changed. I believe she is a true Christian, and she is the dearest, kindest friend I ever had."

A HELPING HAND SAVED HER.

MRS. WILLIAMSON, the city missionary who is endeavoring to establish a permanent lodging-house in New York City for homeless girls, has many experiences in her slum work, that demonstrate the power of God's saving grace among the fallen. One notable case is that of a young and beautiful Jewish girl who had sunk to the lowest level of vice and who, through the instrumentality of the missionary, was brought to Jesus. A few days ago she wrote to Mrs. Williamson as follows:

DEAR SISTER IN CHRIST—Thinking this morning how good the dear Lord has been to me all along through my life, and especially since you so kindly through God's help spoke to me on the street a few months since, inviting me down to the Florence Mission—a poor miserable lost girl, friendless and vile, discouraged and without hope—I write you trusting the dear Lord will reward you and bless you in body and in soul for the helping hand and kind words to a poor sinner like me. Oh! I bless God this morning and praise his holy name that I listened to your advice and made a right-about-face there and then, and to-day I have God, you and the kind friends in the Florence Mission to thank, for I feel I am saved by his precious blood—washed and made every whit whole, and through God's grace I will trust him while I live. I hope this may reach the eyes and heart of some other poor lost girl, and be the means of bringing them to Christ, fully saved. I bless God to-day for a full and complete salvation. A brand plucked from the burning. R. S.

Forty Years Among the Zulus.

Rev. Josiah Tyler's Personal Experiences of Missionary Life in Zululand—Six Weeks in a Zulu Kraal—Peculiarities of the Language—Polygamy and its Evils.

ONE Sunday morning in a church in Central Massachusetts a congregation was assembled for worship. It was in one of those disagreeable intervals in church life when the pulpit was vacant. The church was a prosperous and thriving one and the prayer was going up at the church meetings that God would send a man after his own heart to minister to them. No regular candidate for the pulpit was before the church and on this Sunday morning the congregation knew that the services would be conducted by a student from the Theological Institute at East Windsor Hill, Conn. There was the usual apathy which a congregation feels when the preacher is "only a student;" but on this occasion the indifference vanished before the student had spoken many words. It gave place to keen interest; for the student was a scholarly man, tremendously in earnest and gifted with rare eloquence. The sermon moved the people as they had not been moved for a long time past and they hung breathlessly on the glowing words. In the interval between services the news of the eloquent young man spread through the town and the second service was crowded. There was no hesitation in that church. A meeting of the members was called and a resolution was voted unanimously to send an invitation to the preacher, Mr. Josiah Tyler to become the pastor of the church. The invitation was a surprise to the young preacher and the result was a surprise to the church. Mr. Tyler was naturally gratified by the unexpected offer, but declared himself unable to accept it for the strange reason that he had decided to go to Africa to preach to the Zulus.

To the church the decision seemed to involve a waste of good material; to the young preacher it might have seemed a wanton sacrifice of the good of life. On the one side were comfort, congenial society, the advantages of civilization, and an assured income; on the other were dangers to health, repulsive surroundings and possibly hostility from the men he proposed to serve. But his choice was already made and the opportunity of ease and personal advancement did not attract him. The people, who would have had him devote his life to preaching to them, had heard the Gospel; those men in far distant Africa had never heard the life-giving story of the Cross and he longed to tell it to them. Love for them and a profound conviction of the blessings it was capable of bringing to them filled his heart and excluded every other consideration. A few months later, with the noble-hearted lady who had become his wife, and who fully shared his enthusiasm for a missionary life, he was on his way to his field of labor in South Africa. Something of the glory and grandeur of the way of life he had chosen came to the heart of the self-denying missionary in the summer of that same year. He was at the house of good old Dr. Philip in Capetown. The veteran missionary gave his young American brother cordial welcome. It cheered his heart to see a young and vigorous man come to take up the work that his aged frame could no longer perform. "This is your room, Tyler," said Dr. Philip opening the door of a modest guest-chamber; "it may interest you to know that at various times it has been occupied by Vanderkemp, by Robert Moffat and by David Livingstone." The names of the famous heroes fell on his ears like martial music. He was one of their order, engaged in the same enterprise, and serving the same Master. Even to come into such association with them as the four walls of the room involved, was like the conferring of a patent of nobility and gave him new inspiration. After a brief stay with the saintly Dr. Philip, he was again on board ship on the way to Durban, the seaport of Natal on the south-eastern coast of Africa. Here he was welcomed by Rev. Daniel Lindley to whose appeal for help Mr. Tyler was the personal response. The next stage of the journey was to Amzimtote, where Dr. Adams was laboring. It was performed in the cumbrous bullock-wagon which was the ordinary mode of travel. In the great lumbering vehicle dragged over hill and dale by twelve oxen, with drivers who could speak nothing but Zulu, Mr. and Mrs. Tyler began to realize something of the life they were to lead for the next forty years. They found Dr. Adams rejoicing in a period of religious interest, after a long time of arduous labor. Eleven years had he spent in patient, earnest toil before one soul was won from heathenism, but now the time of discouragement was past and many were coming to inquire after the white man's God. The young missionaries rejoiced with them and diligently studied their methods. Here, too, they began the study of the Zulu language, which was to grow so familiar to them, that at this day, Mr. Tyler often finds himself unconsciously making Zulu ejaculations and even thinking in Zulu. There was then no grammar or dictionary and all the instruction they had in the difficult tongue was therefore oral. It was a mere skeleton, or framework of some familiar words and phrases, with the principles of derivation and construction, that they could acquire from their kind friends during their short stay. The real knowledge of it they were to

A GREAT WOMAN.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., Founded on the Text: II. Kings iv. 8: "And it fell on a day that Elisha passed to Shunem, where was a great woman."

THE hotel of our time had no counterpart in any entertainment of olden time. The vast majority of travelers must then be entertained at private abode. Here comes Elisha, a servant of the Lord, on a divine mission, and he must find shelter. A balcony overlooking the valley of Esdraelon is offered him, in a private house, and it is especially furnished for his occupancy—a chair to sit on, a table from which to eat, a candlestick by which to read, and a bed on which to slumber, the whole establishment belonging to a great and good woman.

Her husband, it seems, was a godly man, but he was entirely overshadowed by his wife's excellencies; just as now you sometimes find in a household the wife the centre of dignity and influence and power, not by any arrogance or presumption, but by superior intellect and force of moral nature wielding domestic affairs, and at the same time supervising all financial and business affairs. The wife's hand on the shuttle, on the banking house, on the worldly business. You see hundreds of men who are successful only because there is a reason at home why they are successful.

If a man marry a good, honest soul, he makes his fortune. If he marry a fool, the Lord help him! The wife may be the silent partner in the firm, there may be only masculine voices down on Exchange, but there oftentime comes from the home circle a potential and elevating influence.

This woman of my text was the superior of her husband. He, as far as I can understand, was what we often see in our day, a man of large fortune and only a modicum of brain, intensely quiet, sitting a long while in the same place without moving hand or foot—if you say "yes," responding "yes"—if you say "no" responding "no"—inane, eyes half shut, mouth wide open, maintaining his position in society only because he has a large patrimony. But his wife, my text says, was a great woman.

Her name has not come down to us. She belonged to that collection of people who need no name to distinguish them. What would title of duchess, or princess, or queen—what would escutcheon or gleaming diadem be to this woman of my text, who by her intelligence and her behavior challenges the admiration of all ages? Long after the brilliant women of the court of Louis XV. have been forgotten, and the brilliant women of the court of Spain have been forgotten, and the brilliant women who sat on mighty thrones have been forgotten, some grandfather will put on his spectacles, and holding the book the other side the light, read to his grandchildren the story of this great woman of Shunem who was so kind and courteous and Christian to the good prophet Elisha. Yes, she was a great woman.

In the first place, she was great in her hospitalities. Uncivilized and barbarous nations honor this virtue. Jupiter had the surname of the Hospitable, and he was said especially to avenge the wrongs of strangers. Homer extolled it in his verse. The Arabs are punctilious upon this subject, and among some of their tribes it is not until the ninth day of tarrying that the occupant has a right to ask his guest: "Who, and whence art thou?" If this virtue is so honored even among barbarians, how ought it to be honored among those of us who believe in the Bible, which commands us to use hospitality one toward another without grudging?

Of course, I do not mean under this cover to give any idea that I approve of that vagrant class who go around from place to place ranging their whole lifetime, perhaps under the auspices of some benevolent or philanthropic society, quartering themselves on Christian families, with a great pile of trunks in the hall and carpet-bag portentous of tarrying. There is many a country parsonage that looks out week by week upon the ominous arrival of wagon with creaking wheel and lank horse and dilapidated driver, come under the auspices of some charitable institution to spend a few weeks and canvass the neighborhood. Let no such religious tramps take advantage of this beautiful virtue of Christian hospitality.

Not so much the sumptuousness of your diet and the regality of your abode will impress the friend or the stranger that steps across your threshold, as the warmth of your greeting the informality of your reception, the reiteration by grasp and by look and by a thousand attentions, insignificant attentions, of your earnestness of welcome. There will be high appreciation of your welcome, although you have nothing but the brazen candlestick and the plain chair to offer Elisha when he comes to Shunem.

Most beautiful is this grace of hospitality when shown in the house of God. I am thankful that I am pastor of a church where strangers are always welcome, and there is not a State of the Union in which I have not heard the affability of the ushers of our church complimented. But I have entered churches where there was no hospitality. A stranger would stand in the vestibule for a while and then make pilgrimage up the long aisle. No door opened to him until flushed and excited and embarassed he started back again and coming to some half-filled pew with apologetic air, entered it, while the occupants glared on him with a look which seemed to say: "Well, if I must, I must." Away with such accursed indecency from the house of God. Let every church that would maintain large Christian influence in community, culture Sabbath by Sabbath this beautiful grace of Christian hospitality.

A good man traveling in the far West, in the wilderness, was overtaken by night and storm, and he put in at a cabin. He saw firearms along the beams of the cabin and he felt alarmed. He did not know but that he had fallen into a den of thieves. He sat there greatly perturbed. After a while the man of the house came home with a gun on his shoulder and set it down in a corner. The stranger was still more alarmed. After a while the man of the house whispered with his wife and the stranger thought his destruction was being planned. Then the man of the house came forward and said to the stranger: "Stranger, we are a rough and rude people out here and we work hard for a living. We make our living by hunting, and when we come to the nightfall we are tired and we are apt to go to bed early, and before retiring we are always in the habit of reading a chapter from the Word of God and making a prayer; if you don't like such things, if you will just step outside the door until we get through I'll be greatly obliged to you." Of course the stranger tarried in the room and the old hunter took hold of the horns of the altar and brought down the blessing of God upon his household and upon the stranger within their gates. Rude, but glorious Christian hospitality!

Again, this woman in my text was great in her kindness toward God's messenger. Elisha may have been a stranger in that household, but as she found out he had come on a divine mission, he was cordially welcomed. We have a great many books in our day about the hardships of ministers and the trials of Christian ministers. I wish somebody would write a book about the joys of the Christian minister, about the sympathies all around him, about the kindnesses, about the genial considerations of him. Does sorrow come to our home and is there a shadow on the cradle, there are hundreds of hands to help, and many who weary not through the long night watching, and hundreds of prayers going up that God would restore the sick. Is there a burning, brimming cup of calamity placed on the pastor's table, are there not many to help him drink of that cup and who will not be comforted because he is stricken? Oh, for somebody to write a book about the rewards of the Christian ministry—about his surroundings of Christian sympathy.

This woman of the text was only a type of thousands of men and women who come down from the mansion and from the cot to do kindness to the Lord's servants. I suppose the men of Shunem had to pay the bills, but it was the large-hearted Christian sympathies of the women of Shunem that looked after the Lord's messenger.

Again, this woman in the text was great in her behavior under trouble.

Her only son had died on her lap. A very bright light went out in that household. The sacred writer puts it very tersely when he says: "He sat on her knees until noon, and then he died." Yet the writer goes on to say that she exclaimed: "It is well!" Great in prosperity, this woman was great in trouble.

Where are the feet that have not been blistered on the hot sands of this great Sahara? Where are the shoulders that have not been bent under the burden of grief? Where is the ship sailing over glassy sea that has not after a while been caught in a cyclone? Where is the garden of earthly comfort, but trouble hath hitched up its fiery and panting team and gone through it with burning ploughshare of disaster? Under the pelting of ages of suffering, the great heart of the world has burst with woe.

Navigators tell us about the rivers, and the Amazon and the Danube and the Mississippi have been explored, but who can tell the depth or length of the great river of sorrow made up of tears and blood rolling through all lands and all ages, bearing the wreck of families and of communities and of empires—foaming, writhing, boiling with the agonies of six thousand years! Etna and Cotopaxi and Vesuvius have been described, but who has ever sketched the volcano of suffering retching up from its depths the lava and the scoria and pouring them down the sides to whelm the nations? Oh, if I could gather all the heartstrings, the broken heartstrings into a harp I would play on it a dirge such as was never sounded.

Mythologists tell us of Gorgon and Centaur and Titan, and geologists tell us of extinct species of monsters; but greater than Gorgon or Megathereum, and not belonging to the realm of fable, and not of an extinct species, is a monster with iron jaw and iron hoofs walking across the nations, and history and poetry and sculpture in their attempt to sketch it and describe it, have seemed to sweat great drops of blood.

But thank God, there are those who can conquer as this woman of the text conquered, and say, "It is well! though my property be gone, though my children be gone, though my home be broken up, though my health be sacrificed, it is well, it is well!" There is no storm on the sea, but Christ is ready to rise in the hinder part of the ship and hush it. There is no darkness but the constellations of God's eternal love can illumine it, and though the winter comes out of the northern sky, you have sometimes seen the northern sky all ablaze with auroras that seem to say: "Come up this way; up this way are thrones of light and seas of sapphire, and the splendor of an eternal heaven. Come up this way."

We may, like the ships, by tempest be tossed
On perilous deeps, but cannot be lost;
Though Satan enrage the wind and the tide,
The promise assures us, the Lord will provide.

I heard an echo of my text in a very dark hour when my father lay dying and the old country minister said to him: "Mr. Talmage, how do you feel now as you are about to pass the Jordan of death?" He replied—and it was the last thing he ever said—"I feel well; I feel very well; all is well"—lifting his hand in a benediction, a speechless benediction which I pray God may go down through all the generations. It was well! Of course it was well.

Again, this woman of my text was great in her application to domestic duties. Every picture is a home picture, whether she is entertaining an Elisha, or whether she is giving careful attention to her sick boy, or whether she she is appealing for the restoration of her property—every picture in her case is a home picture. Those are not disciples of this Shunemite woman, who, going out to attend to outside charities, neglect the duty of home—the duty of wife, of mother, of daughter. No faithfulness in public benefaction can ever atone for domestic negligence.

There has been many a mother who by indefatigable toil has reared a large family of children, equipping them for the duties of life with good manners and large intelligence and Christian principle, starting them out, who has done more for the world than many another woman whose name has sounded through all the lands and through all centuries.

I remember when Kossuth was in this country there were some ladies who got reputation, honorable reputation, by presenting him very gracefully with bouquets of flowers on public occasions; but what was all that compared with the work of the plain Hungarian mother who gave to truth and civilization and the cause of universal liberty a Kossuth? Yes, this woman of my text was great in her simplicity.

When this prophet wanted to reward her for her hospitality by asking some preferment from the king, what did she say? She declined it. She said: "I dwell among my own people," as much as to say, "I am satisfied with my lot: all I want is my family and my friends around me. I dwell among my own people." Oh, what a rebuke to the strife for precedence in all ages.

How many there are who want to get great architecture, and homes furnished with all art, all painting, all statuary, who have not enough taste to distinguish between Gothic and Byzantine, and who could not tell a figure in plaster of paris from Palmer's "White Captive," and would not know a boy's pencilling from Bierstadt's "Yosemite." Men who buy large libraries by the square foot, buying these libraries when they have hardly enough education to pick out the day of the almanac! Oh, how many there are striving to have things as well as their neighbors, or better than their neighbors, and in the struggle vast fortunes are exhausted and business firms thrown into bankruptcy, and men of reputed honesty rush into astounding forgeries.

Of course, I say nothing against refinement or culture. Splendor of abode, sumptuousness of diet, lavishness in art, neatness in apparel—there is nothing against them in the Bible or out of the Bible. God does not want us to prefer mud hovel to English cottage, or untanned sheepskin to French broadcloth, or husks to pineapple, or the clumsiness of a boor to the manners of a gentleman. God, who strung the beach with tinted shell, and the grass of the field with the dews of the night, and hath exquisitely tinged morning cloud and robin redbreast, wants us to keep our eye open to all beautiful sights, and our ear open to all beautiful cadences, and our heart open to all elevating sentiments. But what I want to impress upon you, is that you ought not to inventory the luxuries of life as among the indispensables, and you ought not to depreciate this woman of the text, who, when offered kingly preferment, responded, "I dwell among my own people."

Yea, this woman of the text was great in her piety. Faith in God, and she was not ashamed to talk about it before idolaters. Ah, woman will never appreciate what she owes to Christianity until she knows and sees the degradation of her sex under Paganism and Mohammedanism. Her very birth considered a misfortune. Sold like cattle in the shambles. Slave of all work, and at last, her body fuel for the funeral pyre of her husband. Above the shriek of the fire worshippers in India and above the rumbling of the juggernauts, I hear the million-voiced groan of wronged, insulted, broken-hearted, down-trodden woman. Her tears have fallen in the Nile and Tigris and the La Plata and on the steppes of Tartary. She has been dishonored in Turkish garden and Persian palace and Spanish Alhambra. Her little ones have been sacrificed in the Ganges. There is not a groan, or a dungeon, or an island, or a mountain, or a river, or a lake, or a sea but could tell a story of the outrages heaped upon her.

But thanks to God, this glorious Christianity comes forth, and all the chains of this vassalage are snapped, and she rises up from ignominy to exalted sphere, and becomes the affectionate daughter, the gentle wife, the honored mother, the useful Christian. Oh, if Christianity has done so much for woman, surely woman will become its most ardent advocate and its sublimest exemplification.

When I come to speak of womanly influence, my mind always wanders off to one model—the aged one whom, twenty-seven years ago, we put away for the resurrection. About eighty-seven years ago, and just before their marriage day, my father and mother stood up in the old meeting-house at Somerville, New Jersey, and took upon them the vows of the Christian. Through a long life of vicissitude she lived harmlessly and usefully and came to her end in peace. No child of want ever came to her door and was turned empty away. No one in sorrow came to her but was comforted. No one asked her the way to be saved but she pointed him to the Cross. When the angel of life came to a neighbor's dwelling she was there to rejoice at the starting of another immortal spirit. When the angel of death came to a neighbor's dwelling she was there to robe the departed for the burial.

We had often heard her, when leading family prayers in the absence of my father, say: "O, Lord, I ask not for my children wealth or honor but I do ask that they all may be the subjects of thy comforting grace!" Her eleven children brought into the kingdom of God, she had but one more wish, and that was that she might see her long-absent missionary son; and when the ship from China anchored in New York Harbor, and the long-absent one passed over the threshold of his paternal home, she said: "Now, Lord, lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." The prayer was soon answered.

It was an autumnal day when we gathered from afar and found only the house from which the soul had fled forever. She looked very natural, the hands very much as when they were employed in kindness for her children. Whatever else we forget, we never forget the look of mother's hands. As we stood there by the casket, we could not help but say: "Don't she look beautiful?" It was a cloudless day when, with heavy hearts, we carried her out to the last resting-place. The withered leaves crumbled under hoof and wheel as we passed, and the sun shone on the Raritan River until it looked like fire; but more calm and beautiful and radiant was the setting sun of that aged pilgrim's life. No more toil, no more tears, no more sickness, no more death. Dear mother! Beautiful mother!

Sweet is the slumber beneath the sod,
While the pure spirit rests with God.

I need not go back and show you Zenobia, or Semiramis, or Isabella, or even the woman of the text, as wonders of womanly excellence or greatness, when I in this moment point to your own picture gallery of memory, and show you the one face that you remember so well, and arouse all your holy reminiscences, and start you in new consecration to God, by the pronunciation of that tender, beautiful, glorious word, "Mother! Mother!"

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people

Caring for the Babies.

Some of the Many Christian Philanthropies in their Behalf in New York—The Babies' Shelter and the Summer Home by the Sea

AMONG the multitudinous charities in New York, there are none more beautiful, or more generously supported, than those that have for the objects of their care the helpless babies of the tenements and the slums. There is in the metropolis a vast army of these little ones, thousands of them homeless and still other thousands who are either orphans or whose parents are too negligent to care for them. To those unfortunate waifs, the sympathy of all good people goes out spontaneously, and the result is that a number of very noble Christian organizations are constantly at work in their behalf. There have been established, in recent years, the Babies' Hospital, where the sick children are treated with the utmost care and skill; the Foundling Hospital, for the forsaken little waifs; several Nurseries in connection with various churches, and a number of other philanthrophic enterprises for taking care of the homeless little ones. All these charities are especially active in midsummer, when the torrid temperature and the foul disease-breeding odors of the tenements sweep off the frail little creatures like a pestilence.

THE SUMMER HOME FOR THE TENEMENT BABIES OF NEW YORK.

One of the most noteworthy of the institutions of this class is the Babies' Shelter, at 118 West 21st Street, New York City. It is now twenty-seven years since its doors were first opened by the kindly ladies of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Holy Communion on Sixth Avenue, nearby, of which Rev. Henry Mottet is present pastor. No poor little one whom poverty, vice or intemperance had rendered homeless was ever turned away from its welcoming portal. A seaside cottage was rented for a Summer Home, first at North Long Branch, and later at St. Johnland, L. I., and there the sickly children were sent for fresh air, surf bathing and rejuvenation. It is expected that soon the Babies' Shelter will have a permanent Summer Home of its own. Prominent among the managing ladies of the Shelter are Mrs. Hilborne L. Roosevelt, Mrs. Clarence R. Conger, Mrs. Wm. O. McDonald and Mrs. Mortimer Fargo.

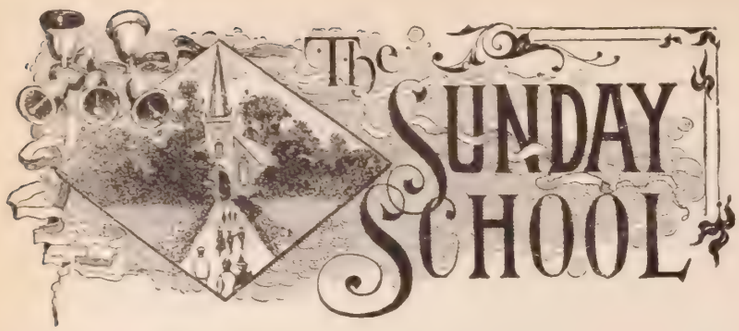
Our artist has shown a scene at the Babies' Summer Home at St. Johnland by the sea. In the great, cool, roomy house there are accommodations for nearly forty babies and the necessary number of attendants. The building is fifty feet by thirty feet with wings on the eastern and western sides. There are play-rooms to be used when the weather keeps the little folks indoors. The shady lawns are a perpetual delight, and the babies return to the Shelter in town in the fall, bronzed like so many pappooses and as happy as crickets.

This is only one of the beautiful charities that aim to help both soul and body, for it need hardly be added that the spiritual training of the children is not neglected. They are helped through the years when character, both moral and physical, is forming and when the foundadation of a useful life can best be laid. Such charities deserve all praise and encouragement. Some children have been at the Babies' Shelter for six years, very few for less than a year. The good ladies who conduct it have interested the children of the rich, and many a little waif is cared for by the petted son or daughter of some wealthy household, who supplies the protege with clothing and sometimes provides for it otherwise, This is helpful to both, and mutually develops the spirit of well-doing and brotherly love among the children. The Shelter is managed by a Board of Trustees and its patrons include a number of the wealthiest and best known society ladies in New York, who take pleasure in thus quietly and unostentatiously fulfilling the Saviour's injunction: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

EXILED PROFESSORS.

The two professors in the American College at Marsovan, whom the Sultan sentenced to death, but subsequently released and exiled, have taken refuge in England. Dr. Herrick of the American Board had prepared a warm welcome for them. He feels the loss of their help keenly in his work. The first occasion on which the professors appeared in public in London was at the Noonday Prayer Meeting in the Y. M. C. A. rooms, Aldersgate Street. The occasion was one for praise and prayer rather than for speeches. Towards the close of the meeting Prof. Thoumaian made a brief address. In explaining the reason of their arrest and subsequent condemnation, he remarked that to the Turkish Government all educational movements meant sedition. He had tried to preach Christian unity with the result that the officials had assumed that he was urging his fellow-countrymen to unite against the Government. On that plea he and his colleagues were arrested and sentenced to death. He expressed great gratitude to the English Government for the efforts they had made to secure the release of himself and Prof. Kayayan. He urged them to pray for the remaining prisoners, whose distress was great when they found that they were not to be released.

Prof. Kayayan who had rendered himself specially obnoxious to the Turkish Government as president of the local Y.M.C.A., said that in addition to the prisoners already condemned, twenty-four were awaiting their trial. There was, he pointed out, a great work to be done in Turkey for the spread of Christianity, but it should at present be undertaken by foreigners and not by natives whose lives were in danger if they attempted to enlighten their fellow-countrymen.



PAUL SHIPWRECKED.

S S. Lesson for Sept 3 Acts 27. Golden Text, Ps. 46 : 1 By Mrs. M. Baxter.

GOD is our refuge and strength; a very present help in trouble. Therefore will we not fear." Fear is unworthy of a Christian, it springs from unbelief. In God's dealings with his children, all through the past, he has called on them to fear not. In his education of his children, it is only consistent that every lesson really learnt shall lead to another and more difficult one. It is a sad ignorance of God and of his ways to wonder that his truest and choicest children are permitted to undergo the heaviest and most impossible trials, and to pass through experiences which test faith and patience to the utmost.

Paul had passed standard after standard in the school of Christ. We cannot read II.Cor. 11 : 23-29, without wondering how one man could pass through so much of physical and mental suffering. This Epistle must have been written before his journey to Jerusalem and his subsequent imprisonment in Cæsarea Thus we see that God took him from trial to trial, that in his life, as that of his Master, the grace of God might be made manifest, and that a life, divine in its power and principles, might by grace be lived on earth, not only by the Son of man himself, but by others in whom Christ the Hope of glory should dwell. God knows how far he may go with each one of his children.

Three times Paul had already suffered shipwreck, and one day and night he had been (perhaps on a plank) in the midst of the sea(II. Cor. 11 : 25). But up to this time his journeys had been in the character of a missionary,—misunderstood and persecuted indeed,—but now he must come yet nearer to his Master: in this last voyage he must travel as a State criminal; Paul "and certain other prisoners" were on board together. After passing Crete, Paul, whose acquaintance with God rendered it possible for the Lord to give him a prophetic view of what was coming, ventured to warn the ships' crew of coming danger. But men of the world are Regulated by the World.

Who was this follower of the Nazarene, this prisoner, that he should have the presumption to pretend to nautical skill? And yet the centurion had been kind to Paul, and allowed him liberty when the ship had touched at Sidon. Men of the world will show many a favor to Christians, but when it comes to altering their own course of action in any particular, it is quite another matter. They do not like to acknowledge to themselves that Christians know better than they do, for such an admission must oblige them to take the place of the learner at once. Perhaps nothing tries a true Christian more than to see those whom he has warned from God bringing trouble and sorrow upon themselves and others which might have been avoided had they only hearkened. It seems such a pity. It is a great lesson to learn stillness in such circumstances; it is truly a fellowship with Christ's sufferings. Many a mother has had to stand by powerless and see her son led to ruin, and she must wait until God moved and see the suffering which might have been spared. Paul had to stand by and see the wind coming upon them. The services of the ship's carpenter were taxed to the utmost lest [illegible] raged and many days of continued cloud and [illegible] neither sun nor stars to steer by, and compasses were not invented; and he knew that had they listened to him all might have been spared! But, amongst his other lessons, Paul was learning to trust his God also about his dealings with others. He waited for the right moment, and then after [illegible] in their perplexity and almost despair of their [illegible] than before, and brought them a message of hope. Let us learn how to wait God's moment.

"Sirs, ye should have hearkened unto me, and not have loosed from Crete, and to have gained this harm and loss. And now I exhort you to be of good cheer: for there shall be no loss of any man's life among you, but of the ship. For there stood by me this night the angel of God, whose I am, and whom I serve, saying, fear not, Paul; thou must be brought before Cæsar; and, lo, God hath given thee all them that sail with thee. Wherefore, sirs, be of good cheer: for I believe God, that it shall be even as it was told me."

There was no uncertainty about this message, Paul knew in whom he had believed, and now there were prepared hearts to listen, it was God's opportunity. May it not be that in another way than simply the sparing of their physical life, God had given Paul all them that sailed with him? Who knows all which took place between Paul and his Master during that night? Who knows what the exercise of patience had been to him and how he had entered into the fellowship with Christ's sufferings on that vessel? the tide was turned now, and Paul had an open door now for his Master's work. When he added that they must be cast upon a certain island, no man disputed his word. Paul was now practically and when signs of land ahead were discovered, and they cast anchor, and some of the sailors sought to escape to land, the prisoner Paul's word was law: "Except these abide in the ship ye cannot be saved." In answer to his servant's prayer, God had undertaken the conduct of the vessel and the safety of the passengers and crew; if they sought to save themselves they took themselves out of the hands of the Lord; so doing they could not be saved. O how many hinder God's deliverance by the impertinence of self help, for self help, in a matter which has been committed to God is impertinence. The Lord gave Paul the confidence of the crew and the soldiers, with whom he had the most intercourse cut off the ropes of the lifeboat, and now they must trust or perish. "I believe God," had been Paul's own testimony: he was, without doubt, the calmest man on board.

One man who fully believes God may be a blessing to many. God does not leave his believing ones without witness, he appears on their behalf. The belief of the crew in the word of Paul at this juncture was no less marvellous than the effect of Jonah's preaching on the city of Nineveh; the power of God was manifest in both. But Paul was learning his own lessons while God was making him a blessing to others. Had he yielded to natural irritation that the centurion had been so obstinate in loosing from Crete, he would not have had the same power now over his fellow passengers and the crew. The same faith which would wait for God to bring round the mind of Julius, the centurion, could also wait for God to fulfil his promise; is always a power. "Let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing." (James 1: 3.) The terror of death on board had been such that for a fortnight no regular meal had been taken. Paul now exhorted them to act with calmness and eat: and he took bread, and gave thanks to God in the presence of them all, he was not ashamed of acknowledging his God before the brethren, they saw God was real to him. And when he had broken it he began to eat. This example was followed by all, and then, in faith for their deliverance, "they cast out the wheat into the sea," so fully did they begin to trust the God whom Paul believed in. And he did not disappoint them. One more night, and land appeared; they hoisted the main sail and made towards shore. Here Paul met with another difficulty. The soldiers were responsible for the prisoners, if they made their escape, the soldiers' lives must be forfeited, better to kill them at once. But God had given these lives to Paul, and he counted on his God. And not in vain, "the centurion willing to save Paul, kept them from their purpose," and gave command to all that they get to land the best way they could, for the ship was going to pieces. And God was true:

A Patient Man

Not One Life was Lost.

But they were in a barbarous land of uncivilized people called Melita. Here also God made a way for his servant. The people of the island "kindled a fire" to dry the clothing of the escaped crew,—and Paul, helping to gather sticks, a viper fastened on his hand. But the same faith which had counted on his God hitherto was present with him now. The poor savages began to suspect that he was some evil doer that he should meet with this misfortune, but, counting on the word of his God: "Behold I give unto you power to tread on serpents and scorpions and over all the power of the enemy." (Luke 10: 19.) "he shook off the the beast into the fire and felt no harm." This opened the way for a great work of healing in the island, and thus the poor savages and the ships' crew together saw the power of God, and his name was magnified in the life of the servant. Paul proved him true in all these circumstances, and as those around saw how, in one thing after another, this man of God was more than conqueror through him who loved him, they learned to know God through his servant's conduct in a way they could not forget.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

SINCE Paul had appealed to Cæsar, his departure to Rome was delayed only until other prisoners whose cases also were remitted to the imperial tribunal, were collected at Cæsarea. They were then put on board ship under the charge of Julius, a centurion of Cæsar's guard. This man, whose title indicates that he was captain of a hundred soldiers, was a worthy officer, who, as the historian Tacitus states, afterward attained high honor in the empire. We infer that Luke was one of the party, as the first person, "we," reappears in the narrative, and there is that minuteness and detail of description characteristic of Luke when he is writing of events that he personally witnessed. The party reached Myra in Lysia safely and there changed to another ship which was going to Italy, laden with corn from Alexandria. This ship must have been of considerable size, probably about 500 tons, as there were 276 persons on board. Rough weather appears to have prevailed from the start and it was with difficulty the ship entered a harbor on the shores of Crete. Paul urged the centurion to remain for a time, bur it was not a convenient place for wintering as it was then November, so an effort was made to reach Phenice, a port thirty-four miles away, on the same island. No sooner, however, was the ship outside the harbor, than she was caught in a storm and carried out to sea. The sailors were panic-stricken, part of the cargo of corn was thrown overboard; and afterward, some of the "tackling," or loose spars and furniture. The crew seem to have been too much harassed and apprehensive even to eat and were becoming worn out, when Paul encouraged them by telling of the visit of an angel, who had assured him that no man's life would be lost, although the ship would be wrecked. Fourteen days they were tossed about on the Adriatic Sea before land was sighted. They were then near the island of Malta, although the sailors did not recognize it. The lesson for the day is the graphic story of the ship being wrecked on the shore of the island.

Except these abide in the ship, ye cannot be saved. This was a warning to the soldiers. The sailors were about to leave them to their fate. As the soldiers did not know how to manage the ship there would have been no hope for them, so they cut the ropes that held the boat in which the sailors were going away. The sailors, therefore, had to stay behind to do their best for the general safety. Paul was not a fatalist. Although he had been assured that all should be saved and had communicated that assurance to his companions, he did not neglect the means. In spite of his previous statement, he now tells the soldiers that they cannot be saved, unless they prevent the sailors deserting them. A girl in a boarding-school was distinguished for her success in the recitation-room. Another girl envied her and asked her how it was that she could always recite her lessons so well. The reply was, "I pray that I may understand and remember them." As the plan succeeded so well, the other girl resolved to pray, too. But the next day she made a more dismal failure than usual. Very much astonished she went to her friend. "I prayed," she said, "but I could not say a word of my recitation." The other rejoined, "Perhaps you took no pains to learn it." "Learn it!" was the reply, "I did not learn it, at all. I did not know I needed to learn it, if I prayed that I might say it."

A party of tourists were out in a rowboat on a great lake when a squall came up. There was considerable danger and the man in charge of the boat tugged at the oars until his strength was almost exhausted. When it seemed that the crisis had really come and there was little hope of their reaching the shore, the largest and strongest man in the party, in an agony of fear, said, "Let us pray." The bluff old boatman looked him over and said, "No, no, my man; let the little man pray; you take an oar."

They lightened the ship. It was better that the cargo be sacrificed than that their lives should be lost. They would rather lose the cargo than lose their lives. There are many wealthy men, who, if they were wise, would do the same with their property. It would be better for them to lose their property than to lose their souls. There are some who answer the minister as the Duke of Alva answered the astronomer, who asked him if he had observed a recent eclipse of the moon, "I have so much businesss upon earth that I have no time to look up to heaven." "I have seen," says a famous writer, "a tree borne down and broken by the weight of its fruit. I remember, too, seeing a fine sheep lying dead in the field. The shepherd told me that it had been killed by a strange dog. The other sheep in the flock got safely away, through a hole in the hedge, but this fellow was so fat and had so much wool on him that he could not get through and the dog caught him. He might have been alive. then, said I if he had not had so much wool. I once knew a poor maimed soldier who suffered in the same way. He lost both his legs in a skirmish in the war. He was one of a party which had seized some plunder. The enemy came upon them unexpectedly, but all got away safely save this man, who had secured a larger share than the others and being loaded down with it fell into the rear and was shot by the pursuers. He might have kept his legs if he had not been so intent in keeping his riches. Mind you never get in a state in which it may be said of you 'he might not have lost his soul if he had been willing to part with his money.'" In the ruins of Pompeii there was a petrified woman, who, instead of flying from the doomed city, had spent her time in gathering up her jewels. She saved neither her life nor her jewels. There are multitudes making the same mistake. In trying to get earth and heaven, they lose both. Many a man will be lost who might be saved, if he were only willing "to lighten the ship."

Took bread and gave thanks. In the confusion and agitation of the moment many persons would have omitted the asking of a blessing; but with Paul it was a matter of principle to "acknowledge God in all his ways." When the late Commodore Foote was in Siam he had upon one occasion the king on board his vessel as a guest. Like a Christian man, as he was, he did not hesitate in the royal presence to ask a blessing as the guests took their places at the table. "Why, that is just as the missionaries do," remarked the king with some surpise. "Yes," answered the heroic sailor, "and I am a missionary, too."

When they had taken up the anchors. It was the first thing to do as they wished to reach the shore. A gentleman was walking on the beach and was watching a pretty little vessel with its white sails shining in the sunlight. "How is it that yonder ship does not seem to be moving?" he said to a seaman standing; "her sails are spread, and there is plenty of breeze, but she seems to make no progress." "She's anchored sir; she's anchored!" replied the sailor. "That's just how it is with many of us," said the gentleman, in answer; "there is everything to help us in our heavenward journey, but we can make no progress at all because we are anchored to something here on earth—some sin indulged in, or some worldliness we cannot give up." Yes, that's the secret; we are anchored.

Temperance in America.

How the National Temperance Society has Popularized Sobriety—The Work of over Twenty-five Years Briefly Described.

HOW much of a nation's happiness and progress depends upon the morality of its individual members, is a problem which may well attract the attention of the philosopher and publicist. How much depends on the sobriety of a nation cannot well be reckoned in cold statistics. This latter interrogatory has received a very generous elucidation in the papers, addresses, essays and discussions of the World's Temperance Congress, recently held in Chicago. These are now given to the public in permanent form and skilfully edited by Mr. J. N. Stearns, Cor. Sec'y of the National Temperance Society and Publication House, and the volumes will doubtless be read with interest in other lands as well as our own.

One of the most instructive and interesting articles in the compilation is that by Mr. Stearns himself, being a historical sketch of the National Temperance Society and Publication House. He writes:

"It was called into existence immediately after the close of the late Civil War. Temperance societies had been largely disbanded both North and South, and the temperance sentiment of the country was at its lowest ebb. The land was flooded with drunkenness. The drink habit had become fastened upon hundreds of thousands of soldiers who had just returned to their homes. The work among the children had been almost universally abandoned. There was no temperance literature, but little temperance education, and few organizations anywhere in existence. A widespread desire was manifested for something to be done, and a spontaneous call came from all parts of the land, especially from among the churches, that there should be an organization that could rally all good men, women, and children to the work of saving the people from becoming

A Nation of Drunkards.

The beer and liquor interest had become active and aggressive. It flourished as the war progressed. The beer brewers had organized themselves into a National Congress, with millions of money at its command. The friends of Temperance saw clearly that something must be done at once if the land was to be saved from all these downward influences. In August, 1865, a National Temperance Convention, composed of 325 delegates from twenty-five States and Territories, assembled in Saratoga Springs, and organized the National Temperance Society and Publication House. The Convention was composed of representatives from all religious denominations and temperance organizations of the country. The object was to create and circulate a sound temperance literature, and to unify and concentrate the temperance sentiment of the country against the drink habit and the drink traffic.

"The Society is genuinely non-partisan in politics and non-sectarian in religion; its fundamental principle is total abstinence from the use, manufacture, and sale of all alcoholic liquors as a beverage. It avoids all side-issues. It specially seeks to arouse and enlist the Christian Church in this great reform. Any person, male or female, may become a member who will pay the fee and subscribe to the pledge. Three dollars constitutes an annual member; twenty dollars a life member; one hundred dollars a life director; and five hundred dollars a life patron. Its business is conducted by ten of whom are elected each year, representing all the great leading religious denominations and temperance organizations of the land. Hon. Wm. E. Dodge, the Christian merchant and philanthropist, was its President eighteen years, until his death. Mark Hopkins, D.D., President of Williams College succeeded him for two years, and he was followed by Rev. Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler, who has served for eight years in that capacity.

"With Vice-Presidents in every State, and agents in almost every community, its work covers the nation, and its literature permeates every part of the country. It furnishes ammunition and inspiration for every organization and for all classes in the community. It enters the Sabbath-school, the Church and the home with wholesome truth and sound instruction. It supplies the book for the library, the paper for the family circle, the pamphlet for the workman and searcher after truth, and the tract for the masses of the people. It is the one great National Temperance organization of the land that bends all its efforts to secure a sound public sentiment in favor of total abstinence and the suppression of the liquor traffic. Its more than total abstinence, law and order, and the suppression of the drink traffic. It publishes three monthly papers with a circulation of over 150,000, and has over three hundred first-class writers. It publishes the Youth's Temperance Banner, with a monthly circulation of a hundred thousand; the Water Lily, with about forty thousand monthly, suitable for circulation in Sunday Schools; and the National Temperance Advocate. It has published 189 different books adapted to Sunday School libraries. Of these books it has printed 510,000 volumes, which are changing hands weekly in many thousands of libraries throughout the land, reaching millions of children who otherwise would have no temperance instruction. It has published the ablest text-books ever issued upon the nature and effects of alcohol on the human system. Its scientific, economic, religious, and legal publications are from the foremost writers of the day. It published the first Temperance Lesson Book for public schools ever issued in the country, and has spent large sums of money in the initial agitation for its introduction into the schools of the land. It has published fifty-six Temperance Lesson Leaves, giving Bible-texts, questions, notes, teaching hints, etc., of which over 900,000 have been printed. Twelve different Music and Song Books have been issued, of which 500,000 copies have been published.

"Three American Standard Prize Essays have been published, for which the sum of $1,500 was paid: 'Alcohol and Science,' 366 pages; 'Alcohol in History,' 481 pages; and 'Alcohol in Society,' 398 pages. It is not only a Publication House but a great Missionary Society. The great majority of its publications are never expected to pay the cost, but are indispensable to speakers and writers and thinkers in this reform. The missionary work covers the country and extends even to foreign lands. This is the one Society of the land fully equipped, thoroughly non-sectarian and non-partisan, embracing all denominations and organizations, that seeks to overthrow the drink habit and the drink traffic. Our missionary work now consists in part as follows: Work among the colored people in the South; scattering a literature in prisons, hospitals, penitentiaries, jails, ships, and army posts; work in Congress for a National Commission of Inquiry; holding conferences, conventions, mass-meetings, congresses, Sabbath-evening services, and other public gatherings; to supply special literature to pastors, editors, lecturers, foreign nations, etc.

"It commenced to petition Congress for a Commission of Inquiry into the results of the liquor traffic over twenty years ago, and has continued it ever since, holding many hearings in Washington and conferences in different parts of the country to forward the object. A series of Gospel Temperance meetings have been held in New York and other cities nearly every year since its existence, and a large number of Temperance Camp-meetings have been held each year.

"A great effort has been made to induce churches to form total abstinence societies among the members, and to train and the doctrines and principles of total abstinence. It commenced the agitation in this country for the study of the nature and effects of alcohol upon the human system in public and private schools of the nation. Eight or ten colored missionaries have been employed in different Southern States, visiting churches, schools, families, institutions of learning, to lecture and to circulate a temperance literature among their people."

During the twenty-seven years of its existence, the receipts of the Society for publications have been $1,142,023.81, and from donations, legacies, membership, etc., $295,167.44 while its missionary work has cost more than double the latter amount. It is now endeavoring to secure $250,000 for an Endowment Fund, the interest to be used in missionary operations. Its most pressing need is a centrally located permanent building in New York, which shall be the focus of its extended work.

Mr. John N. Stearns, whose portrait is given on this page was born in New Ipswich, N. H., in 1829, and ever since 1836, when as a mere child he joined the cold water army, he has been identified with the Temperance movement. He has held many offices in various Temperance organizations, was President of the New York State Temperance Society for 1875-76 and temporary chairman of the National Temperance Convention of 1865 which organized the National Temperance Society and Publication House. His pen and voice have done a mighty work in advancing the Temperance cause in America.

HELPED OVER A HARD PLACE

I am specially desirous to do right in the matter of keeping the Sabbath, writes Margaret Meredith. Especially with regard to that sentence which commands that "thy man servant and thy maid servant shall rest as well as thou," does my conscience call for care. Therefore, in boarding, in hotels or private families, it had always puzzled me how to treat the fine Sunday dinners, of which I quite disapprove. If I refused ice cream, having had experience in the difficulties of my confectioner Sunday School scholar from his rush of Sunday work, I was met by the excellent argument, that custards and jellies cost still more labor, and so at each point I seemed to find no sensible way to make a useful difference between my conduct and that of those who cared not at all.

A friend, who usually dined by my side last summer, cut this gordian knot so simply, that I adopted her method at once. She merely refused soup and dessert, and took a good, healthy dinner off of one plate. Beyond that, she refused viands which she knew to be specially troublesome of preparation. She thus solidly saved the washing of all unnecessary dishes, and as far as her influence went, lessened the demand for desserts and extras altogether. The beauty of the plan is that it is so unembarrassing. If you do not choose to speak of it, no one is likely to notice your dinner as peculiar, except the caterer, who, if he be not looking on, will be asking questions behind the scenes, and, probably, the waiter, and he will be sure to approve. This idea has simplified things so much for me, that I am glad to hand it over to you.

A COMEDIAN EVANGELIST.

Mr. Charles Minor, the English Evangelist, who was formerly a comedian has been holding services in the Broome Street Tabernacle, New York, with large audiences. His illustrations, humorous anecdotes and his singing kept his hearers deeply interested and made the meetings a complete success. Mr. Minor's address is 427 East 114th Street, New York.

Bathing in Egypt.

The Ladies of the Land of the Pharaohs as Patrons of the "Hammam."

TO the women of the East and especially to those who dwell in the larger cities, like Cairo, Alexandria and Damascus, the "hammam" or public bath is an unfailing source of health and recreation. Confined to their own homes by the peculiar usages that have governed society in the Orient from time immemorial, they welcome the visit to the bath as the one opportunity they have of meeting and mingling with their own sex freely and indulging in what European or American ladies would denominate, "a real nice talk." But the Moslem ladies are not by any means so free and unconventional, even in their hours of relaxation as their Western sisters, and their liveliest social chat would be tame in comparison with the gossip of an old-fashioned New England "afternoon tea," or a Western "quilting bee."

Our illustration on this page shows an Egyptian woman returning from the bath. Her dress proves her to belong to the lower orders. She wears the long, loose gillabiyah or cloak, with the libas, or lower garment peculiar to all Moslem women. On her head, resting upon a tarah, (or cushion) is the copper jar (hallah) in which Eastern woman carry their toilet paraphernalia, when visiting the hammam. In this jar are soap, unguents, perfume (beylon) and towels (manashif.) The hammamji, or attendants, at these baths are usually very skilful at massage, and for a nominal fee (anything from a piastre upward—the piastre being equal to about six cents), the bather receives all the necessary attention.

Some Eastern baths are of exquisite workmanship and beautiful design. The tiled floor is covered with rugs, upon which the bathers sit and chat pleasantly together, with the temperature at 105. In the centre of the heated room is a pool of water much warmer than the surrounding atmosphere, in which some of the bathers dip their feet. After the massage (performed by attendants, called kayas), comes the cold dip (if desired), and then the anointing with oil and perfume, following which the bather retires to another room, where refreshments are served.

The whole operation at the hammam consumes from two to three hours. Wealthy ladies make the visit to the hammam a daily duty, those of the middle classes go there on alternate days, while the poorer women (such as the one in our illustration), rarely fail to go once a week, at least. They look forward with pleasant anticipation to the afternoon of leisure, the invigoration and the parting chat over the sweets and coffee in the refreshment-room.

THE BIBLE SOCIETY.

At the recent meeting of the Managers of the Bible Society, Mr. Augustus Taber gave an account of his recent visit to Japan. An application was received from Western Africa for the publication of a revised edition of the New Testament in the Benga language.

RELIGION EVERYWHERE.

LET us all reconstruct our business and our homes by the principles of the Christian religion. Our religion ought to mean as much on Saturday and Monday as on the day between and not be a mere parenthesis of sanctity. It ought first to make clean our heart and then make clean our life. Religion is not, as many suppose, a matter of church delectation, a sort of confectionery, a spiritual caramel or holy gum-drop or sanctified peppermint or theological anesthetic, but an omnipotent principle, all-pervading, all controlling, all conquering. With something short of that you may deceive yourself but you cannot deceive God and you cannot deceive the world. The keen man of the world puts on his spectacles and looks clean through to the back of your head, and knows whether your religion is a fiction or a fact. And you cannot hide the deceptions of your samples of sugar, or coffee, or rice, or tea, with the cloth of a communion table. All your prayers go for nothing, as long as you misrepresent your banking institution and put in your report of its resources more specie, and more fractional currency, and more clearing-house certificates, and more legal tender notes, and more United States certificates of deposit, and more loans and discounts than there really are, and among your liabilities do not make proper mention of dividends unpaid and national bank notes outstanding, and individual deposits, and what is due to State banks and bankers.

I have now a word of comfort for all who suffer from the malfeasance of others, and every honest man, woman and child does suffer from what goes on in scampdom. Society is so bound together that all the misfortunes which good people suffer in business matters come from the misdeeds of others. Bear up under distress, strong in God. He will see you through, though your misfortunes should be centupled. Philosophers tell us that a column of air forty-five miles high is resting on every man's head and shoulders. But that is nothing compared with the pressure that business life has put upon many of you. God made up his mind long ago how many or how few dollars it would be best for you to have. Trust to his apportionment. The door will soon open to let you out and let you up. What shock of delight for men who, for thirty years have been in business anxiety, when they shall suddenly awake in everlasting holiday. On the maps of the Arctic regions there are two places whose names are remarkable, given, I suppose, by some polar expedition, "Cape Farewell," and "Thank God Harbor." At this last the Polaris wintered in 1871 and the Tigris in 1873. Some ships have passed the Cape, yet never reached the Harbor. But from what I know of many, I have concluded that though your voyage of life may be very rough, run into by icebergs on this side and icebergs on that, you will in due time reach Cape Farewell and there bid goodbye to all annoyances, and soon after drop anchor in the imperturbable waters of Thank God Harbor.

There the wicked cease from troubling,
And the weary are at rest.

A SURE TEST.

THERE is an easy way of discovering whether any institution is good or bad. Abstract discussions will throw only a little light. Gather together a number of men who have been under the influence of any institution for a number of years, and you may learn from their character whether the institution which has influenced them is good or bad. There are two ways of finding out about an evil: one is to go to the Tract House, or to the Sunday School Union, or to a religious newspaper, and find a discussion upon the subject: the other way is to go out into the community and watch practical results. Just as there are two ways of finding out the difference between harvest apples and choke pears. You may either take a pomological journal, and read about the difference, or you may take a club and go out and knock down some of the harvest apples, and some of the choke pears. The latter way will be the most positive and effective. "A good tree bringeth not forth corrupt fruit; neither doth a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit. For every tree is known by its own fruit."

DEBT.

OUR young men are coming up in this agitated state of commercial ethics, and I am solicitous about them. I want to warn them against being slaughtered on the sharp edges of debt. You want many things you have not, my young friends. You shall have them if you have patience and honesty and industry. Certain lines of conduct always lead out to certain results. There is a law which controls even those things that seem hap-hazard. The most insignificant event you ever heard of is the link between two eternities—the eternity of the past and the eternity of the future. Head the right way, and you will come out at the right goal.

Bring me a young man and tell me what his physical health is, and what his mental caliber, and what his habits, and I will tell you what will be his destiny for this world, and his destiny for the world to come, and I will not make five inaccurate prophecies out of five hundred. All this makes me solicitous in regard to young men, and I want to make them nervous in regard to the contraction of unpayable debts.

When a young man wilfully and of choice, having the comforts of life, goes into the contraction of unpayable debts, he knows not into what he goes. The creditors get after the debtor, the pack of hounds in full cry, and alas! for the reindeer. They jingle his door-bell before he gets up in the morning; they jingle his door-bell after he has gone to bed at night; they meet him as he comes off his front steps. They send him a postal-card, or a letter, in the curtest style, telling him to pay up. They attach his goods. They want cash, or a note at thirty days, or a note on demand. They call him a knave. They say he lies. They want him disciplined at the church. They want him turned out of the bank. They come at him from this side, and from that side, and from before, and from behind, and from above, and from beneath, and he is insulted and gibbeted and sued and sworn at, until he gets the nervous dyspepsia, gets neuralgia, gets liver complaint, gets heart disease, gets convulsive disorder, gets consumption.

Now he is dead, and you say: "Of course they will let him alone!" Oh, no! Now they are watchful to see whether there are any unnecessary expenses at the obsequies, to see whether there is any useless handle on the casket, to see whether there is any surplus plait on the shroud, to see whether the hearse is costly or cheap, to see whether the flowers sent to the casket have been bought by the family or donated, to see in whose name the deed to the grave is made out. Then they ransack the bereft household, the books, the pictures, the carpets, the chairs, the sofa, the piano, the mattresses, the pillow on which he dies. Cursed be debt! For the sake of your own happiness, for the sake of your good morals, for the sake of your immortal soul, for God's sake, young man, as far as possible, keep out of it!

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Mary F. Greener, Philadelphia. What is the Oriental form of Mary?

Mary is changed to Miriam in the Hebrew and Arabic. Other forms, not peculiar to the East, however, are Maria and Marian.

Subscriber, Texas. What would be the expense of a trip to Europe and what is the board there per month?

The expense might vary according to circumstances. A first-class round trip from New York to London per steamer will cost from $120 upward; second-class round trip about $80 and upward; steerage round trip about $60. Board (including lodging), $1 per day and upward.

Mrs. J. E. Cummins, Cornish, Ind. Ter. Has the prophecy of the two witnesses (Rev. 11: 3), ever been fulfilled? Who are the witnesses?

It has not been fulfilled. They will be two divinely appointed men who will preach and testify during the closing years of this dispensation. They will suffer martyrdom under Antichrist. There is no means of establishing their identity, but many expositors of prophecy believe that they will be Enoch and Elijah.

Jas. F. Rentrew, Dubuque, Ia. 1. How many saloons are there in the United States? 2. What is the population of Corea, and how many missionaries are now at work there?

1. Estimated nearly 230,000, but as there are unquestionably many unlicensed places, the real number may exceed this considerably. 2. Thirteen and a half millions. There are considerably less than 100 missionaries, the greater proportion of them lay workers. It is an inviting field for missionary effort.

E. J. Ulmer, Williamsport, Pa. Did not David sin in receiving the priest 1 Samuel 21: 1 and eating the shew-bread? If so did Christ approve his act in Matthew 12: 3?

David's deception was sinful and his eating the shew-bread was a technical violation of the law. Christ did not express approval of his conduct; he was being assailed by the Jews on questions of the observance of the strict letter of the law and he referred to the incident as an illustration. He reminded them that their great king whom they so highly venerated had broken the command in that particular. He was constantly reproving the Jews for their bondage to the letter of the law and their disregard of its spirit.

G. S Schiller, Starke, Fla. Are Ethiopians, spoken of in the Bible, the same as negroes of the present day? If so what countries did they occupy?

Practically the same; the Ethiopia of the ancients included in its boundaries the modern Nubia, Sennaar, Kordofan and Northern Abyssinia. The ancient northern limit as described in the Bible and classical geography was Syene, the most southern town of Egypt, the eastern was the Red Sea, the western the Libyan Desert, aand the southern the highlands of Abyssinia. It therefore represented all of interior Africa and the eastern coast—all being then as now, the distinctive home of the negro race.

G. R. Thompson, Clinton, N. Y. 1. What is the meaning of Ezekiel 14: 9? 2. Does a proper observance of the Lord's Day exclude the reading of newspapers for general information?

1. It is a reproof of the false prophets who gave assurances of salvation in return for gifts. The false prophets deceived the people declaring that many would be lost who would be saved and that many would be saved who would be lost. They acted much as the Pope acted in the days of Luther, when he sold indulgences. 2. The observance of the Lord's Day is not a matter of law as the Jewish Sabbath was. Christ trusts to the honor and affection of his people and did not legislate on the subject, nor did the Apostles. If you are anxious to serve him and avail yourself of every opportunity of working for him, you will be glad to keep your mind free of secular matters on his day and have it filled with spiritual concerns. One day in seven is little enough for the purpose. The reading of newspapers on that day is therefore an intrusion which you will not invite lest it distract your thoughts and occupy time which you can use to better purpose.

F. Grange, Keokuk, Ia. Noticing a paragraph in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD about John G. Woolley and his work, I would ask: Where is his present field of labor?

His evangelical and temperance field has been and is a very wide one, including many of the Middle, New England and Western States. Lately he has founded a mission at Rest Island, on Lake Pepin, Minn., sixty miles below Minneapolis, where, as he himself explains, "any drinking man, who wants to go in for a clean life, may come and be at home until he shall be strong and able to make an honorable way in the world." He also publishes a paper called The Rest Islander.

Subscriber, Justus, Pa. Who was Melchizedek?

He was the king of Salem, who went out to meet Abraham on his return from the pursuit of Chedorlaomer and his allies. He combined the offices of priest and king, as was not uncommon in patriarchal times. The Jews, on the authority of their ancient writings, regarded him as a type of the regal-priesthood, to which the Messiah should belong. The mystery surrounding his person, his office, his sovereignty and his relation to Christ has given rise to many discussions. Some of the Jewish chroniclers held that he was no other than Shem, the most pious of Noah's sons, and who had lived to the time of Abraham; others affirmed that he was an angel, etc.

A. Anderson, Burlington, Ia. The legend referred to by "Reader," Centre Point, Tex., is as follows: In the reign of Romulus (753 B.C.), in order to increase the population, Rome was made a city of refuge for all nations. This increased the male population, but furnished no women. The well-known strategy of stealing the Sabine women was then resorted to; the consequence was that a Sabine army at once besieged the walls of Rome. The most vulnerable point was a castle under the captaincy of Sp. Tarpeium. His daughter, Tarpeia, a vestal virgin, was approached by the Sabines and asked what she would take to show them a way into the city, she answered: 'That which the soldiers wear on their left arms'—meaning the bracelets they wore. When the soldiers had entered the city they overwhelmed Tarpeia with their ponderous shields, which they also wore on their left arms, until the treacherous virgin was crushed to death.

C. A. Hamlin, Syracuse, N. Y.: "I have read your admirable sermon on 'Children's Rights,' and am moved to ask you to give us one on 'Animals' Rights,' for our domestic pets, and servants of the speechless races, are much more wickedly treated than are children—to the 'hardening' and degrading of those who mismanage them. The abuse of cats, dogs, birds, the starving of farm cows, the misuse of the whip on horses, the rule of force and fear, rather than the rule of kindness and friendship, and the duty of everyone to 'interfere' with cruelty, all need a full exposition by every clergyman on earth. I have been urgently appealed to by a number of humane people to write to you asking you to stir up this far-reaching subject. They seem to think that because I write on this subject I could have more influence with you than themselves. I do not think so. I have circulated in several States extracts from your sermon on 'The Nativity.' But a sermon on the plan of this one in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of August 2d, specifying the wrongs to domestic animals, the evil influences on children of flogging the dog and mauling the cat, 'collecting' birds' eggs, stoning and shooting birds, etc., is urgently needed, and will do great good. Neither crime nor cruelty to animals will ever cease until little children are taught that animals have rights and no one has any right to distress them."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

FLIGHT DOWN PIKE'S PEAK.

A REPORT of a severe accident on Pike's Peak is telegraphed from Colorado Springs to the New York Sun. This mountain top, a picture of which as it appears from Colorado Springs, appears on this page, is 14,146 feet above the level of the sea. On August 7th, three men attempted to descend it on a toboggan. This is a flat board with a groove underneath which fits the rack rail on the cog road. In the centre is a lever which, when pressed, operates as a brake. Light arms reach over on each side to the side rails to steady the machine and form a foot-rest. The three men sat one behind another on the board and the descent commenced. The speed increased every moment and before ten minutes had elapsed they passed a party who had been two hours traveling on foot from the summit. There is a sharp turn in the road below Windy Point and it was necessary to go slowly around the curve. The men applied the brake, but it failed to work. The toboggan maintained its terrific speed until it reached the curve, where it leaped from the rails high into the air. The men were flung off, away over the mountain side, and fell among the broken, jagged rocks which form the surface of the mountain at that place. All were insensible from the concussion; but, after a few minutes two of them recovered consciousness. They were covered with dreadful bruises and had deep ugly gashes on their arms and bodies. One of them had an ear torn off. The third lay unconscious and helpless. His leg was broken in addition to his contusions. The two went to the nearest section house, from which help was sent to the injured man. All three were placed under medical treatment, but it is feared that they will die. Their confidence in the power of the brake to arrest their rapid course must have existed, but it was misplaced. There are many who are taking a downward moral course, with a similar confidence in their power to stop when they wish, who are similarly deceived. (Heb. 3: 13.)

A Buried City Unearthed.

An extraordinary discovery has been made in Guatemala, near the village of Santiago de los Caballeros. A gentleman who has an estate near the village found some strange tools and utensils when a foundation was being dug near his house. He decided to extend the excavation, and at a depth of about seven feet the workmen came on the walls of a house. At the level of the floor of the house they discovered a confused mass of human skeletons—some in sitting postures, some lying on their backs, some on their faces. On excavating farther, other houses were discovered, showing that a city of considerable size had existed there. The position of the skeletons, and in fact the whole condition of the ruins, point to the conclusion that the city was suddenly swallowed by an earthquake. In searching the houses, the men found, in good preservation, a number of interesting articles, such as domestic utensils, engraved and brightly painted glasses, vases and kitchen pots. Along with these were a great number of painted clay idols. Statues, carved in black basalt, displayed great artistic skill, and are the more remarkable from the fact that their sculptors had only stone implements. Although nothing is known of the people who were thus buried hundreds of years ago, it is evident that in spite of their artistic and mechanical skill and the high degree of civilization they had attained, they worshiped idols and knew nothing of the true God. This is another proof of the fact the Bible declares, that revelation was a necessity and man by searching could not find out God. (Job 11: 7.)

Died in Saving her Sister.

A melancholy fatality occurred at Huntington, L. I., on August 9. Three sisters went out to bathe that morning. Having undressed in the bathing house which their father has erected on the beach near his house, the eldest of the three, a girl seventeen years old, who was an expert swimmer, plunged into the water and swam out beyond the point. Her younger sisters, aged respectively ten and twelve years, had been cautioned against venturing beyond their depth. The younger, however, seeing the ease with which her sister breasted the waves, attempted to follow her. In a minute she was in the grasp of the sweeping tide and cried out in terror. Her sister heard her and quickly swam to her side. Bidding the child clasp her round the neck she struck out for the shore. The tide was against her and her strength was failing, but she would not unclasp her sister's arms. As she neared the shore her strokes became feeble and the weight of the child on her back kept her head too long beneath the water. At last she cried to the child, "Save yourself, Connie," and the child let go her hold in shallow water. In the meantime the cries of the girl on the beach had brought help. The little one was drawn out of the water and then a man dived in to rescue the eldest sister. He brought her out, but it was too late. She was dead. She might have saved her own life if she had abandoned her sister. We admire such devotion, but we often forget him of whom it was said in reproach, "He saved others, himself he cannot save." (Matt. 27: 42.)

To be Buried Alive.

A mind-reader at Hillsboro, Ill., proposes, if the law officers of the State do not interfere, to undergo a dangerous experiment. He believes it to be possible to suspend the consciousness and the operation of the physical organs for a long period of time and to resume them unimpaired at the end of that period. To prove the truth of his theory he has determined to be buried and remain underground while a crop of barley grows on the earth above him. His manager whom he has appointed to superintend the arrangements gives the following account of the means to be adopted: "For several days the man will subsist on a diet of fat and heat-producing food. He will then throw himself into a cataleptic state and the lungs will be filled with pure air to their fullest capacity. After paraffine has been spread over the entire body to close the pores it will be ready for burial. The body will be put into an extra large coffin. This will be placed inside another, and both will be perforated. The interment is to be made in a clay soil." Probably the authorities will regard the experiment as being too suicidal in its nature to be permitted; but the desire of the man to make it, is a proof of his own faith in its being safe. It is much to be wished that there was similar confidence, for which there is far better ground in the resurrection of those who really die and are buried, and that there were none to whom it is appropriate to put the question Paul put to Agrippa, "why should it be incredible with you that God should raise the dead?" (Acts 26: 8.)

An Immigrant's Suspense.

Among the passengers in the steamer Stuttgart, which arrived at Baltimore a few days ago, was a Swiss peasant woman. She had no money, but said she was the wife of an American gentleman residing in Baltimore, whose name and address she gave. A messenger was sent to notify him of her arrival, but he was away from home on his vacation. The woman had no proof of the marriage, but said that it took place in Switzerland last year. Her husband had been unexpectedly summoned to America a few weeks after the marriage took place, but had promised to return and fetch her. Since then, however, he had sent her a sum of money, with an intimation that as her station in life was so much beneath his, she had better remain in her own country. She had, however, used the money in following him to America. As none of the gentleman's friends had heard of the marriage, the woman was detained until word could be had with him. If he does not confirm her story she will be sent back to the port from which she embarked, as she is without funds. Her distress was acute when she heard that there was a possibility of her being sent back, and she is waiting in intense suspense the return of the man she calls her husband, to see if he will recognize her as his wife or not. If she has wasted her love on an unworthy object, as seems probable, there is little prospect of his recognizing her, and she will be excluded from the country. Some Christians of weak faith, conscious of their own imperfections, sometimes fear that they will be excluded from heaven when they die; but the fear is groundless. As in this case, their admission or exclusion does not depend on themselves, but on the character of Him whom they have loved, and of his fidelity they can have no doubt (Luke 12: 8.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Mr. J. C. Lanphier who has conducted the Fulton Street Daily Prayer Meeting for thirty-six years has reluctantly given up the duty, owing to his advanced age. He is now eighty-four years old. His successor is Rev. C. F. Cutter.

At the Mission Church, established by Gen. O. O. Howard in Forsyth Street, New York, services were held on Aug. 13, by Rev. J. Flyfield, the new pastor whose work in New Jersey, two years ago was much blessed. Mr. Flyfield is the first regular pastor the little church has had.

Evangelist George W. Jacoby reports that he has been holding services on Sunday afternoon at Vernon Park, Germantown, Pa., under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. He has also spoken at the Gospel Pavilion in Front Street on week evenings.

Referring to some public remarks on the fatalities of a recent cyclone, the Interior calls attention to the fact that while, all told, 170 persons have died from tornadoes and cyclones this year in the United States, over 6,700 persons perished by murder within the past twelve months within the same territory. Life's darkest shadows are not the work of Providence but the result of human folly or human sin.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

A SUBLIME PRAYER.

Sermon Preached last Sunday, Aug 20, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.

Text: Eph. 3: 14-20: "For this cause I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," etc

FOR some time I have been studying the prayers of the apostle Paul. They are a delightful subject for investigation, meditation, and discussion. It is deeply interesting to know that the apostle Paul prayed for a church; it is equally instructive to know what are the blessings for which he prayed. What he prayed for, we may certainly pray for both for ourselves and for the churches of Christ. His prayers would form a prayer-book which we might constantly study and daily use.

The prayer selected as the text this morning is unspeakably sublime. There is nothing of the nature of a prayer by any inspired pen which can approach it for spirituality of feeling and for sublimity of language. There is nothing even in the Bible which can surpass it in the particulars named. The prayer bears resemblance in important features to Solomon's great prayer at the dedication of the Temple. In a certain sense the apostle was now dedicating the church of God; he therefore kneels down, as did Solomon, and invokes rich blessings which may abide in the spiritual temple of the Lord Christ. Every word of this prayer seems to have come direct from heaven; it is not of the earth earthy, but is heavenly in thought and divine in speech.

Paul's Aspirations

are God's inspirations. The great apostle piles word upon word in the endeavor adequately to express his great and glowing thoughts. He also adds intensive affixes to his words with the same object in view. The language is unparalleled in its sublimity. Dr. Adam Clarke has well said that no paraphrase can do the prayer justice, and that few commentators have entered into its spirit, probably being deterred by its loftiness of thought.

The "cause" for which he bows his knee, to which he refers in the fourteenth verse, probably carries us back to the very first verse of the chapter, all between being regarded as a parenthesis. The apostle here prays to the Father, although the Lord Jesus by name is also addressed in prayer. He also prays with bowed knee. It has been said that "any posture but imposture" is appropriate in prayer. We know that the publican prayed standing and that his prayer was acceptable to God; but we know that Daniel knelt when he prayed; that Stephen knelt when he prayed while the stones were falling upon him; that Peter knelt when he prayed, and said, "Tabitha, arise;" that Paul knelt while he prayed with and for the elders of the church at Ephesus who came to meet him at Miletus; we know also that later they all "kneeled down on the shore and prayed." Kneeling is the most natural, most reverent, and altogether appropriate attitude in prayer. Posture is not everything, but posture is someting; posture is very much. We could scarcely forgive a man who could sit while presenting himself even to a human dignitary of whom he was asking a favor. There is authority in the Bible for praying either standing or kneeling, but none for praying while sitting in the presence of our Maker and Judge. It is most unfortunate that in prayer at public worship should have been [illegible]; and it is to be hoped that it [illegible] be revived in all our churches. Be[illegible] he worship these Puritans felt called upon to oppose this attitude. Nothing but a narrow prejudice now prevents the general adoption [illegible] to be the first to heed that example in their public prayers.

All the saints form one family. This family includes all true believers now upon the earth, the spirits of just men made perfect, and all the holy angels before the heavenly throne. It is instructive to emphasize the relation in the Greek words between father, "pater," and family, "patria," showing how this latter word is derived from the former. Fatherhood in God results in brotherhood among men. All God's children, whatever their color or creed, whether in this world or in distant spheres, are one family, and the day will come when they shall stand together with holy rejoicing in the presence of their common Father.

We now see the blessings for which the apostle prays for this beloved church. The first petition, according to the 16th verse is that they may have great Spiritual Strength.

The source of all true strength we are here taught is God, and all spiritual blessings are divine gifts. The channel through which spiritual blessings come is the Holy Spirit, and the measure of spiritual blessing is "according to the riches of his glory," or according to his glorious riches. The measure of blessing is God's eternal fulness and infinite mercy. We may expect the measure of blessing to be according to his infinite ability. We do not expect a peasant to give as a millionaire might bestow. We need strength for daily duty in the glorious measure here indicated. We have enemies who are numerous and strong; we have grievous trials to bear; we have great temptations to overcome. The location of this blessing is "in the inner man." Man consists of body, soul and spirit. The inner man stands in special relations to God and the future life. As the outward man needs earthly food, so the inner man needs the bread of heaven. As truly as the body needs daily supplies, so does the soul its daily manna. Religion must have its normal support, or it will wither and decay. In the largest sense, Jesus Christ is the bread of life of which we must eat. This is a glorious petition. We ought to offer it daily that we may grow in grace and in the knowledge of Jesus our Lord.

The next blessing asked for is the dwelling of Christ in our hearts. It has been supposed by some commentators that the apostle here likens the body, or the church, to a temple. We know that Solomon's temple was not complete until God honored it by his august presence. The church and each believer is to be "a holy temple in the Lord." Each Christian is to be through the spirit." Before man sinned he was God's temple; but when that temple was defiled by sin it was no longer a fit dwelling place for deity. Christ comes to restore its pristine purity and to make it again a habitation for God. So the apostle prays, using terms in an intensive sense, that God may constantly dwell by faith in the hearts of his children. In the majestic passage in John 14: 23 our Lord said that on certain conditions regarding the believer, speaking of the Father and of himself, "we will come unto him and make our abode with him." That is truly a majestic "we." These are wonderful words; they are beyond the comprehension even of many who profess and call themselves Christians. Christ is the most desirable of all guests. Where his law of love dwells in human hearts, there he himself is in all the sweetness of his nature and in all the blessedness of his divine presence.

We learn also here that this indwelling in our hearts is by faith. Faith opens the heart's door to the coming of the Lord Jesus; faith sweetly invites him in and communes with him when he has taken up his residence in the soul. The language here employed is very strong; it might be rendered "that Christ may intensely and constantly dwell in our hearts;" it is almost impossible to transfer to English speech the intensive thought of the Greek words employed by the apostle. If the heart be not Christ's throne it must be Satan's seat. Which is it in your case to-day? Is it the abode of unclean spirits, or the dwelling place of the Lord Jesus Christ? You can positively answer this question. Any man may know whether or not Christ dwells within him. Does Christ rule your life to-day? That is a plain question. What is your answer? I must press you to examine your heart and life in the presence of the ominscient God. Who dominates your will, self or Christ? With whom do you hold communion, Christ or Satan? In a word, are you Christ's freeman or Satan's dupe and slave? This is a question of the utmost importance. I beg that with Christ's help you will dethrone Satan and enthrone the Lord Jesus; receive him as your prophet to teach you, your priest to atone for you, and your king to command you.

Experimental Knowledge.

We see by parts of verses seventeen, eighteen and nineteen that the apostle prays that they may have an experimental knowledge of Christ's surpassing love. We are to understand that this is the love of Christ to them, not their love to him. We see also that in order to a possession of this knowledge they must be "rooted and grounded in love." We are here dealing with great truths and profound experiences. There is matter enough in this prayer for many sermons, matter enough for several volumes; but it is often of great importance that we take a considerable portion of Scripture as the basis of our exposition that we may catch the unity of its thought and the ultimate purpose sought by the writer. We know that love is the fulfilling of the law; we know that it is the fundamental principle of true religion. The apostle prays that they may be grounded in love. The love for which he prays is not an occasional emotion, but a continuous experience; it is not a sudden flash but a steady flame. He here employs two figures in very close relations in order that he may fully express his thought, but even his double metaphor is inadequate to his lofty purpose. He conceives of love as soil in which the Ephesian Christians were to strike their roots. They were to be as firm in Christ's love as a tree is in the soil when its roots go down deep and extend widely in all directions. This is the agricultural figure which the apostle employs; but immediately he introduces an architectural figure. His mind moved rapidly in the effort to express his grand conceptions. He multiplies and almost mixes his figures. The architect must have his ground plan and his minute specifications. As love is the soil in which Christian character is to grow, so love is on which the structure rests. Christians are to be grounded in love as a building is based on its foundation. On Christ's mighty love they were to rest as does a temple on the everlasting rock. Only when so rooted and grounded could they develop nobilty of character and make great attainments in divine knowlekge. It is interesting to observe that it is here suggested that there is a blessed companionship in this heavenly love. The Ephesian Christians were to comprehend the love "with all saints." Paul desired that all others might also appreciate the wonders of redemption. Christ's love is like the natural sun; each believer can have it all to himself without taking any from any other believer. The lowly plant can say to the sun, "thou art all mine;" and the lofty cedar can say, "thou art all mine." Sitting in my study basking in the sunshine I have as much thereof as if I were the only man in the universe.

We now come to the glorious dimensions of this love. We here reach wondrous heights, profound depths, and illimitable breadths. The love of God is measureless. Oceans and continents have been measured. The distance to the sun and stars from the earth is measurable; but the love of God is a sea without bottom or shore, is or dimensions. The language which the apostle employs in this part of the prayer is so full that it is impossible literally to translate it. His thought is that they may be thoroughly able fully to take in this mighty love. Intensive particles are constantly used in order to express his great thoughts. No angel's arithmetic can compute the vast dimensions of heavenly love. No algebraic formula can discover this unknown quantity—the greatness of Christ's love. Again some have supposed that there was a reference to the temple of God at Jerusalem, or possibly to the temple of Diana at Ephesus. We know that this latter temple was considered to be one of the wonders of the world. We know that by its length, breadth and height, number of pillars, symmetry and beauty it was worthy of the high esteem in which it was held. But if the apostle had any temple in view it is more natural to suppose that it was that at Jerusalem, which was built as the dwelling place of God. It would suggest and appropriately the human heart as a temple, and as the honored edifice in which Deity might dwell. But it is not necessary to refer the language to any earthly building. It is simply the language of a heart surcharged with great thoughts and laboring to express them in forceful forms of speech. The apostle desires in the most emphatic manner to express his conception of Christ's love in redemption, and his own desire that the Ephesian church should in some way apprehend its greatness.

It is possible, however, for us to get additional suggestion from the apostle's descriptions of Christ's love. We know that imagination can but inadequately express or conceive these heavenly dimensions. They take in the eternity of God himself. God is love. In that definition there is an infinity of all dimensions, but our thought is helped by the apostle's descriptions. By the breadth of this love we may understand its and to all classes of sinners; its breadth is a girdle that surrounds the globe. By its length we may understand its continuance from everlasting to everlasting; its vast reach from the eternal purpose in the mind of God to the eternal blessedness in the experience of the believer. By its depth we may understand its stooping to the lowest condition in our fallen race, to the deepest depravity of the most sinful soul. By its height we may understand the lofty altitude to which it raises men in their completed redemption; the infinite dignity which shall be theirs as sons of God and occupants of his throne.

The apostle prays that they may know the love of Christ which he immediately informs us passeth all knowledge. We have here a striking paradox; we are asked to know what surpasseth knowing. But the word "know" may be used in the sense of acknowledge, or approve, or experience. Although we may not know God fully we may know him partially. But perhaps we ought simply to understand this extravagant language as the expression of a speaker whose heart was full to overflowing, and who by the use of strong, and even contradictory, terms is laboring to utter his profound and lofty thought. His mind reaches up to this Infinite Love.

He knows much of its sweetness and preciousness. He wishes the Ephesian church to know it also. He struggles to rise to its great heights. Suddenly the truth flashes upon his mind that this is infinite love, that no one can fully know it, that no one can exhaustively tell it; that, like God, it is without beginning and without end, without measure and without limit. This love is a part of the science of salvation, the science of heaven, the science of the infinite God. It is unique love. There is nothing like it in the universe of God. Language utterly fails to tell its greatness. The Son of God plunged downward from the bosom of the Father to be the world's Redeemer. He became the child of the manger. He was the man of sorrows. He died on Calvary's cross. Was ever love like thine, thou Christ of God? Love for bitterest foes. Such love cannot be told; but much of it may be known. A drop of the ocean tells something of the mighty deep. Oh, heavenly love! Oh, blessed paradox! Oh, wonderful prayer! May we know at least something of this surpassing love!

Lastly the apostle prays that the Ephesian Church might be filled with the fulness of God. This prayer abounds in but this is the greatest of all. The best of the wine was kept for the last of the feast. Who can understand the glorious meaning of this petition? Perhaps the idea of the temple is still present in the apostle's mind. If so, he has spoken of its firm foundations and of its vast dimensions; but the glory of the temple is the indwelling of the deity to whose worship it is erected. The glory of the Lord filled the temple of Solomon. Paul's prayer now is that the Ephesian Church may be filled with God. This is a remarkable petition; it is rich and glorious; it bewilders our judgment; it confounds our reasoning; it causes our imagination to reel, to wonder, to adore. It reminds us of Christ's majestic "we," as given in the passage in John to which we have referred; it reminds us of the exhortation that we should be holy as God is holy, and that we should be partakers of the divine nature. Not many believers are able to come up to the possibilities of this prayer. Some commentators have endeavored to weaken the force of the words by explaining that the apostle meant "so much of God's fulness as is communicable"; but we may be assured that the apostle knew the meaning of the petition which he offers. It is a great thing surely to pray that we should be full of God; greater still to be filled with the fulness of God; but unspeakably greater to pray that we be filled with all the fulness of God. We would not dare use such words if we had not the apostle's example as our authority. The word "fulness" is a favorite one with this apostle. It is a prayer that we should partake of all the fulness of the Eternal. Dare we offer this prayer? Dare we submit to the crucifixion of sin which it implies? Dare we grasp the thought of the blessings which it includes? Dare we set bounds to the saving power and cleansing grace of the Almighty? Dare we offer this petition that we may receive its fulness of blessing? We ought to pray this prayer oftener. Religion is everything. It is God's divinest gift to man. We live far below our possibilities as sons and daughters of the Almighty. We should be like God. We shall some day be like Christ, for we shall see him as he is. We shall live with him forever. We are here and now sons of God; we are here and now partakers of the divine nature. Here are dignity, nobility, grandeur and glory. Oh, men and women admit Jesus Christ into your hearts to-day, and then all these blessings shall be yours for time and for eternity. Sublimely does this chapter close with a doxology, a doxology which is in harmony with these glorious petitions; a doxology which recognizes that God is able to do all that we ask, and above all, that we ask or even think. Then let this doxology ascend to God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit, throughout all ages, world without end. Amen.

AN EVANGELIST'S STORY.

Among the speakers at a recent missionary meeting at Glasgow, was a Kaffir, who is doing work as an evangelist at Lovedale, in Southern Africa. He told the following unadorned story of the conversion of his parents: My mother was a heathen girl. She attracted the notice of a Christian white lady, who became interested in her, and taught her how to read the alphabet, then the spelling-book, and lastly a Kaffir hymn-book. When my mother married a heathen man, she received as presents from this lady the spelling-book and Kaffir hymn-book which she had used, and lastly the lady's own English Bible. After the marriage my father wanted to read them. They had no candle light, but by the flickering light of the wood splinters which they burned, reclining on the mats spread on the floor, the young wife taught her young husband first the alphabet, and then the spelling-book. But his thirst for knowledge did not stop there. "What is that other book?" he asked. It was the Kaffir hymn-book, and when he had been taught to read it, he was not contented, he must learn more, and at his wife's suggestion he went to the missionaries at Lovedale, where he was told they had another book called the New Testament, in the Kaffir language. They taught him how to read it, but they taught him more—they taught him the love of Jesus Christ; and he returned to his native village a saved man. That was how my father was brought to Jesus.

A JEWISH RABBI'S APPEAL.

A common mistake as to the attitude of modern Jews toward Christianity was corrected at the recent Chautauqua Assembly by Rabbi Henry Berkowitz. In the course of a lecture he delivered there he gave utterance to the following remarkable sentiments which will surprise many of our readers as much as they astonished his audience. "I want to say to you, friends, that the fallacy that there is antagonism on the side of a Jew against Christianity should be laid aside once and forever. Let all the religious forces be united and stand shoulder to shoulder that we may go forward in a conquering march against vice, ignorance and superstition. Nowhere in Jewish pulpit or writings will you find that there is hatred of Christianity. Oh, let the crime of 1800 years ago be fully atoned for! The Jew disclaims forever the guilt which has been charged upon him and has been the source of woes that may not be retold. We cannot bow the knee to Jesus, cannot worship him as divine; none the less do we glory in the inspiring example of his life as it has been pictured to the world. His nobility was the highest product of Judaism itself. We are one."

THE GENTLE ANGEL

What if some morning, when the stars are paling
And the dawn whitened and the East was clear,
Strange peace and rest fell on me from the presence
Of a benignant spirit standing near;

And I should tell him, as he stood beside me,
"This is our Earth—most friendly Earth, and fair;
Daily its sea and shore through sun and shadow
Faithful it turns, robed in its azure air;

"There is blest living here, loving and serving,
And quest of truth, and serene friendships dear;
But stay not, Spirit. Earth has one destroyer,—
His name is Death; flee lest he find thee here?"

And what if then, while the still morning brightened,
And freshened in the elm the summer's breath,
Should gravely smile on me the gentle angel,
And take my hand and say, "My name is Death?"
—Sill.

OUT OF SELF.

Whate'er thou lovest, man,
That, too, become thou must;
As God, if thou lovest God,
As dust if thou lovest dust.
Go out, God will go in,
Die, and thou let him live,
Be not, and he will not be,
Wait, and he'll all things give.

To bring thee to thy God,
Love takes the shortest route;
The way which knowledge leads
Is but a roundabout.
Drive out from thee the world,
And then like God thou'lt be,
A heaven within thyself
In calm eternity.

THE NEARNESS OF HEAVEN.

They whose hearts are whole and strong,
Loving holiness,
Living clean from soil of wrong,
Wearing truth's white dress—
They unto no far-off height
Wearily need climb;
Heaven to them is close in sight
From these shores of time.

Only the anointed eye
Sees in common things—
Gleams dropped daily from the sky;
Heavenly blossomings,
To the hearts where light has birth
Nothing can be drear;
Budding throught the bloom of earth,
Heaven is always near. —Lucy Larcom.

PRECURSORS OF ANTICHRIST.

Who the Kings were of whom John Wrote that tney should be of Antichrist's Order.

BY REV. JOHN STORIE, F. R. S. T.

The heads of the Antichristian kingdom, as we learn from the communication of the angel to John (Rev. 17: 10, 11), were to be seven kings of whom five had fallen before the time of the vision. They had lived and gone; but "the one was;" the seventh, "not yet come." Now he who was then—in or about the year 90 or 95 A. D.—the world's Head, is known. He was the reigning Emperor, Domitian. From him as the last of the six, we must go back to Nebuchadnezzar as the first; and between these two find four whose imperial and imperious reign and character stamp on them the Antichristian mark—fierce, imperious, persecuting, demanding divine worship.

1. Of Nebuchadnezzar, as being a type of the final Antichrist, and the first Head of Antichristian empire, there is distinct intimation. "Thou art this Head of gold," Dan. 2: 38. He is the man who sacked and emptied Jerusalem; "Who burnt the House of the Lord," II. Kings 25: 9; who "caused the sacrifice and the oblation to cease;" Dan. 5: 2-4; who made a golden statue of himself, and commanded all nations, and in special the captive Jews, to fall down and worship under pain of the fiery furnace.

2. Alexander of Macedon, is the next Head in succession of the Great World Empire; and in the speed with which he overran and subdued the East; in his siege of Tyre, Ezek. 26; in his angry march against Jerusalem; in his conquest of Egypt; in his fixed determination to be acknowledged by the High Priest of Jupiter Ammon as the Son of God, and to be worshipped "with the honors of divinity."

3. The third Head was no doubt Antiochus Epiphanes, "the illustrious," who filled the throne of Syria, and resembled so closely in his career that of the predicted Antichrist as to satisfy many, both Jews and Christians, that in him as "the vile person," then as "the wilful king," the predictions in Daniel were fulfilled. He laid siege to Jerusalem and took it; 400,000 of its inhabitants he slew; captured and sold as many more for slaves; entered the sacred recesses of the temple, and polluted by his presence the Holy of Holies; the Books of the Law were rent in pieces and burnt; a great sow sacrificed on the altar of burnt offering; and an ordinance issued that whosoever would not do according to the king's command should die. He was worshipped as a God after his death.

4. The fourth Head may have been the Roman Emperor, Caius Caligula. He commenced his reign with moderation; but soon was attacked by a disorder that seems to have left him a madman or a man possessed. He first declared himself "the one master, the one king;" then he took the names and worship of Pagan deities. Then he had a temple built, and in it "was a golden statue of himself done from the life, which was dressed every day in the same clothes he wore; and there the choicest victims were offered to him.

5. The fifth Head—all seem to have agreed—was the Emperor Nero; "vile," "wilful," "lawless," "bestial." "One of his greatest passions was to be a learned magician;" by a knowledge of the black art to command the demon world. The king of the Parthians knelt before him in worship, saying, "You are my God; and I am come to adore you as I adore the sun; my destiny is to be determined by your supreme and omnipotent will!" Nero replied, "I will make you king of Armenia, that the whole universe may know it belongs to me to give or take away crowns."

The sixth was Domitian, the reigning Emperor, by whom the apostle had been banished to the isle of Patmos. He did not show all his vices at first, but gradually developed into the demoniac and impious king. "He filled the world," as Don Cassius says, "with his statues, and would suffer none to be erected to him in the capitol that were not of gold, or at least of silver, and of a certain weight. Such quantities of victims were sacrificed to him that the streets leading to the capitol were often crowded by them. He commanded all despatches issued in his name to take the form—Our Lord and God commands as follows. . . . . This impious style was observed during his whole reign. None were allowed to write to him, but in these impious terms."

These, then, may be received as the six Heads, the precursors of the final Antichrist. The seventh is yet to come. And it is a fact to be noted and pondered, that, since Domitian, no great monarch has risen, at least within the bounds of the civilized world, professing to be God and requiring worship from men.

THE INNER LIFE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Sept. 3. Acts 27: 32 36; Ps. 5: 11, 12

How [illegible] the best of things, is the problem propounded for solution. And truly it is an important problem which concerns the vast majority of Christians. Comparatively few of them possess the good things of life. If they enjoy the best of things, it is because they make them so. If they can learn the secret of making the best of adverse circumstances they will have abundant opportunities for using it. The common idea is that the secret consists in the hope of a time coming, when the troubles which now afflict them will cease, and they will have compensation in riches, and power, and ease for all they have endured. They will reach a city whose very streets are paved with gold and where huge jewels abound. Possibly there are minds which would rejoice in the prospect of so great a profusion of wealth! but to the man who has entered into the spirit of Christ the golden crown, the golden harp, the golden pavement and the gates of pearl are not the things that make him strong. The blessedness of heaven is a blessedness of spirit, of heart and of soul, and that blessedness may be had here in such measure as we are capable of enjoying it. The strength and glory of the divine life in the soul are the real heaven, which may be experienced in this life with full fruition in the life to come. It is the presence of that divine life in a man which enables him to make the best of things.

The manifestation and exercise of that life produces faith, so that the Christian is not cast down by adversity. He knows that his life is in God's hands and therefore whatever befalls him is by God's permission, and is sent for his good. He knows that his life is a discipline and an education for eternity and that whatever in it may be painful, is useful and he will try to gain the strength from it which it is capable of imparting and to learn the lesson it is capable of teaching. With such a faith it should not be difficult to be cheerful in adversity. The inner life should also produce hope and joy. The consciousness of sonship is a support that should sustain a man in any trial. Even though the trial should be extended to the uttermost and death, the chief dread of man, come to him, it can but liberate his soul and open to him the gates of life. The knowledge that if he hold fast his faith no evil can hurt him—the ultimate ego—though it may maim or cripple his body, or strip him of his fortune, ought to give him strength and courage knowing that he is where he is, by divine appointment, he accepts his position cheerfully and looks around him to see what opportunities for usefulness and helpfulness it affords. Doing his duty there, filling the place well that he occupies, realizing that his responsibilities are restricted to his powers, he is troubled by no envy, by no discontent; he is unmoved by life's worries, possessing the peace that the world cannot give, neither can it take away.

A NEW ENGLAND Y. M. C. A.

On this page we give a picture of the handsome and commodious edifice which is now the home of the Young Men's Christian Association, of New Bedford, Mass. It covers an area of seventy by eighty feet and is centrally situated. The cost of the building was $62,000. The Association which has acquired this beautiful structure for its work is twenty-six years old this year, having been organized in 1867. Although the population of the city is under fifty thousand, the Association has [illegible] are on the active list. It has a well selected library of fourteen hundred volumes and a reading room fully furnished with the current literature of the day. In the basement of the new building extensive provision is made for [illegible] partment five distinct branches of education are carried on, and a large number of students avail themselves of the facilities afforded. It has besides, a well organized boys' auxiliary, which will doubtless become a productive recruiting ground for the Association. With the new building as a centre of operations a new era of increased prosperity may be looked for.

A CHINESE LEAGUE.

The value of such an organization as the Epworth League cannot be proved more conclusively than by its adaptability to people in all climes, and of all nationalities. An illustration of this fact appears in a letter which Miss Lydia A. Wilkinson sends from Foochow, China, to the Epworth Herald. She says: Our chapter here in Foochow was organized from the League work here as elsewhere. Dear young people in the home land, pray for us here in Foochow that the baptism of the Holy Ghost may be poured out on these young Christians, that they may indeed "let their light so shine" that the Father may be glorified. Truly this great field is "white already to harvest." We are praying "the Lord of the harvest" that he lay his hand upon many consecrated young men and women of America, saying, "Go ye, therefore."

HOW TO BEGIN.

The following excellent suggestions to young people who are contemplating organizing a Christian Endeavor Society are extracted from a valuable little manual, entitled, How, by W. F. McCauley, President of the Ohio Christian Endeavor Union.* Mr. McCauley is an enthusiastic believer in the value of the Society, and his wide experience enables him to give practical advice of the most helpful kind:

The formation of a Christian Endeavor Society should proceed with enthusiasm, yet with carefulness, that the work may be thoroughly done. What is well done is better than what is twice done. Some societies have languished and died, have been reorganized, and then possibly have led weak existences, because of some defect in their organization at first. Prayer in the preparation must not be overlooked. In addition to any suggestions given in this book, there should be divine guidance. The following steps are recommended:

Hold a preliminary meeting and explain the Christian Endeavor idea fully. If possible, have some experienced Endeavorer present. Circulate literature explanatory of the work. Be sure to have a prayer-meeting before you close. There is nothing like having the Endeavor spirit from the beginning.

In organizing, let all who unite sign the pledge. For this purpose, be provided in advance with pledge cards. Appoint committees on nominations and constitution, the pastor on each. Close with a prayer-meeting as before.

If some object to the pledge, show that it is not iron-clad, but love-clad; that announcing a hymn is taking part, if that is all one can do at the first; that the pledge simply requires conscientiousness before God; and that God has filled the Bible with pledges made to us. Be patient with those who will not sign at once; they may do so further on. Some of our best workers hesitated to sign the pledge in the beginning. Do not say that those who are not willing to sign are not Christians. It has been said that "good food for a horse is sawdust and oats—the less sawdust, the better!" So good treatment for unwilling Christians is scolding and information—the less scolding the better!

There will be some Christians who will perhaps desire to compromise, and ask to be admitted to associate membership. This should not be allowed. There is no advantage to Christians in such membership, nor would they suffer deprivation by denying it to them. If their objection to the pledge is that they cannot take part in public, they will be just as well off to look on without being members as to look on as associate members.

After the society is once organized, all new members should be received publicly, by repeating the pledge in concert, led by the president, by signing in the presence of the society, and with singing and prayer. This service will not only impress all with the importance of what has been done, but will prove an efficient way to train members to participate at once in the meetings. The ice should be broken at the first plunge.

The Family and Home Circle

The Chained Tiger.

An Incident that Aroused Excitement in an Indian Village—The Man-eater and his Ways

DURING the hunting season in India, many tigers are slain by white and native sportsmen—not a few of them being notorious man-eaters, who have forfeited their lives by their depredations among the native population. Recently, a courageous native succeeded in trapping a fine young tiger, almost full-grown, and after "hobbling" him with chains and stout ropes, he bound him securely to a bamboo carriage and drove him through the villages on exhibition. Crowds gathered around wherever the tiger-cart appeared, but the people kept at a respectful distance, not caring to risk the possibility of an escape. The artist has shown the native and his unique device for chaining the great beast of prey, whose defiant attitude and looks only too clearly prove that the slightest chance of escape would be taken advantage of in an instant. But the wary native hunter has seen to it that the brute is securely fastened and he does not intend that his new source of income shall slip from his grasp, if he can prevent it.

The man-eating tiger is the terror of India—the characteristic beast of prey of that country—and is found everywhere, from the mountain slopes of the Himalayas to the great Sundarban swamps. His human victims are numbered by thousands every year. Although his favorite food would seem to be deer, antelope, and wild hog, which he prefers to domestic cattle, when these fail he will attack human beings without hesitation. Man-eaters are generally old tigers, whose slowness of movement combined with loss of teeth, has unfitted them for the active chase after nimble game. There are well authenticated cases of single animals performing havoc that would appear almost incredible to those who do not know the cruel, persistent, stealthy, bloodthirsty nature of the species. In three years, in one district of India, one tiger killed one hundred and eight people; another made a record of eighty per annum; a third drove the terrified inhabitants from thirteen villages and stopped cultivation in 250 square miles of land, and a fourth slew 127 persons, and blocked a public highway for months until a European laid him low with a well-aimed bullet. The man-eater will not hesitate to venture into the streets of a village, seize his human game at a single bound, grasping it in his formidable jaws and tossing it across his broad shoulders, much as a workman would carry a sack of flour. His burden seemingly does not inconvenience him, for, unless very hotly and courageously pursued, he usually succeeds in getting away safely with the prey into the bush or jungle, where he cannot be followed except at great peril. On the retreat, he runs swiftly with a long, loping, catlike movement.

India, next to Africa, is the hunters' paradise, and of course the tiger receives the largest share of their attention, as befits the royal leader of the denizens of forest and plain. The favorite mode of hunting him is from the back of an elephant or from machans (elevated platforms), placed in the boughs of trees. Hunting parties are conducted by shikaris or guides to the vicinity of the tiger's retreat. Occasionally the natives succeed in trapping the brutes, either in pitfalls or by the use of skilfully contrived snares or nets in which they become entangled and are powerless. Although large numbers are killed and caught every year, there is no present likelihood of the tiger becoming scarce in India, the dense malarious thickets at the foot of the Himalaya mountains, the jungles of the central plateaus and the extensive swamps surrounding the delta of the Ganges offering a secure retreat and breeding-place, and being almost impenetrable by the hunter.

Tigers vary in size and ferocity according to the climate and their surroundings, the largest, most handsomely striped and probably the fiercest being the royal tiger of the province of Bengal. Full-grown males of the Bengal breed frequently measure ten feet from tip to tip. As a rule, young tigers are more destructive to cattle and game than the older ones, killing apparently for the mere gratification of their cruel and bloodthirsty natures. The Indian government pays a bounty for the head of every tiger killed or captured.

THE CAPTIVE TIGER AND HIS HINDOO MASTER.

False Standards for the Young.

Writing on the subject of extravagance, Rev. Charless Mitchell, D.D., observes: "It is time for the young man to learn that "wisdom is better than rubies;" that character is worth more than reputation; that honesty is the best policy; that truth is better than falsehood; that sham is dishonest; that paste jewels are lies; that "poverty with contentment is great gain;" that true manhood is worth more than blue blood; and that an honest clerk is more to be honored than a rich knave. It is an easy thing for a young man to spend more in a night than he can earn in a day. More character can be demolished in an evening than can be erected in a life-time. The night's pleasures produced insatiable appetites, and with the new desires came increased weakness of moral fiber. The thoughts during the hours of labor were on the coming pleasures of the hours of leisure. He would have better clothes and more money than his talents could earn. He may have made the friendship of those who had more money at their command than he, and he must not appear mean among such companionship. His clothes must be as new and fashionable, his treats must be as lavish and his tastes as extravagant as theirs. He must keep up appearances. You cannot distinguish the difference between this poor young man and the son of a millionaire by any dissimilarity in attire or ease of manners, as you see them in the street, at the opera, or in the ball-room. The tailor can do for the young man what the dressmaker can do for the young woman."

All of this comes of a false standard in the education of the young. The true education does not aim at the acquisition of property in money and lands, but at acquiring wisdom; it does not seek to make men and women mere grub-worms, with all the vile selfishness of that class, but seeks to develop their nobler natures and to help them fulfil their real mission on earth, which is to live for the glory of their Maker and the loving help of their fellows.

Helpless Folks.

EVERY once in awhile, says a reverend writer, one comes across a person whose sole aim and object in life appears to be expressed by the remark of a venerable grandmother, who declared that there were many people in the world who were good for nothing but to keep bread from molding. The consumption of the staff of life by such persons is much greater than the careless person would be willing to believe. In all communities we find people who are so useless and so helpless that the wonder is that they have purpose and vitality enough to live. They must always be looked after and waited on and bothered with until life to their associates, especially those who are victims of their peculiarities, becomes almost a burden. It ought to be a criminal offense to bring up children without some clearly-defined, well-learned and useful occupation. At sometime in their lives these dead-weights on society are made to feel that they are a burden; but this, as a rule, is only when age and infirmities have overtaken them.

Child-Logic.

IT is undeniable that sometimes the little ones do put their elders in a tight place, in casual controversy. One wee maid had a pet cat to which she was so devoted that her mother undertook to chide her. "My dear," she said, "you love your pussy too much. What would you do if she were to die, for you would never see her again." "Oh, yes, mamma," cried the little one, confidently, "I would see my pussy again when I went to heaven." "No, Daisy," said the mother, "animals have no souls, and when they die that is the end of them. They cannot go to heaven like people." The child's eyes filled with tears, but suddenly she exclaimed triumphantly: "Animals do go to heaven, for the Bible says the promised land is flowing with milk and honey, and if there are no animals, where do they get the milk?" It is hardly necessary to add that the debate stopped right there.

BABY AND I.

TO Slumberland our craft we steer,
Baby and I together.
Slowly but surely our port we near,
Baby and I together.
Where the Dream tree spreads its branches wide
And scatters rare fruit on every side,
Down the twilight river we float along
While lapping waves croon a tender song,
Baby and I together.

A fair little head is drooping low,
Baby and I together,
Gently into the harbor we go,
Baby and I together
Have reached the shores of Slumberland,
By whispering breezes softly fanned;
Amid the fleet that are anchored fast,
Hush! we are safely moored at last,
Baby and I together.

FRANKNESS WITH CHILDREN.

IN dealing with youths from twelve years upwards, writes J. Mortimer Granville, it is indispensable to assume they have obtained so much knowledge of the world that nothing short of honest truth-telling will secure their confidence. It is idle to speak in riddles about the wickedness of the surroundings and the waywardness of the young and the inexperienced. Probably the less preaching the better, not because "boys will be boys" in going astray, but obstinacy is a prominent element in the character of youth; and if any demonstration be made by a parent or tutor in favor of a particular line of conduct, the boy is almost sure to suppose that the advice tendered is in accord with the feelings of age rather than of youth, and a strong pulling in the opposite direction will then be provoked. The young never give the old credit for remembering their own early aspirations, or for a desire to make the opening years of life as happy as may be for those who follow them. Boys have exaggerated notions of what their fathers did before them — often created by the vain-glorious fashion in which too many well-meaning but ill-advised men of mature years regale their young acquaintances with highly-seasoned narratives of their early exploits. It is only natural that with the passion for adventure strong within them, young folk thus treated should be more powerfully influenced by the example set before them, than by the precept doled out for their guidance.

There is too much prating of morality in the education of the young. A little plain speaking between father and son on the subject of false appearances, Mephistophelean lures, and the humiliating disappointments encountered in pursuit of pleasure, would result in a less frequent repetition of the Faust-like experiences of life. Confidence must always form the basis of the relation between those who give, and those who are expected to take, advice. This is especially necessary when the counsellor is old, and therefore naturally supposed to be satiated with, or perhaps, even, to have had a surfeit of, the enjoyment he condemns. Confidence begets confidence. A prudent confession of the truth about a parent's experience of life would do good service to many a youth setting out on a dangerous path, whereas the little stories of the past he hears half-boastfully narrated by his father or mentioned in a spirit of banter by the latter's compeers only stimulate his appetite for adventure, and urge him on a career where sorrow and regret await him, with bitter disappointments he might well have been spared. If we would have our own experiences turned to account for the benefit of our children, we should adopt the principle of frankness in speaking of them, when we touch them at all.

CHAPTER IV.

FRIENDS AND NEIGHBORS.

SOCIETY in the neighborhood of Dangerfield Park experienced a genuine sensation when news came that Mrs. Dangerfield was coming with her family to live at the Park. During the years that had elapsed since her father-in-law's death, she had probably changed much and the young folks who were children then must be pretty well grown-up. Curiosity was rife and there was much speculation among all classes as to the effect on society of the return of the family. Dr. Northesk, who had attended old Mr. Dangerfield and Lady Conway, who had been Mrs. Dangerfield's friend in the old days were especially interested. Lady Conway sought information from her son Norman, who had met Monk and Guy at college.

"So," she said, "the Dangerfields are really coming back to the Park—well I am very glad to hear it. It is high time it was occupied again by its owners. Are you certain, Norman?"

"I am certain that Dangerfield said so. I asked him if he would be this way in vacation time, and he said that the whole family meant to take up their abode at the Park, and make it headquarters for some time to come. He's got an idea that now he is of age he ought to look after the property in person, and I dare say he is right."

Lady Conway made a sign of assent. "Yes, I think he is very right. It is a fine property and might in good hands be made much of. A long minority must have increased its value. Monk Dangerfield, as we all used to call him, must be one of the wealthiest men in the county by this time. He is a nice fellow you say, Norman?"

And the fashionable mother almost unconsciously, perhaps, stole a glance at her daughter Joyce, as she put the careless question.

"O yes, so far as I know, but it is only lately I have come across him. Dangerfield is no such very uncommon name, and it was only by chance we recollected each other as having been playfellows when we were little chaps. He's tall and robust, and awfully good-natured and all that kind of thing, but no genius, you know—rather a muff at his books, I believe, though he has scrambled so far through the schools all right. It's the other fellow who has all the brains of the family by what I can make out."

"Which other one? Do you mean Fulk? He was always thought rather a clever boy, if I remember right."

"No, not Fulk. I mean the cousin—Guy is his name, I think. He has carried everything before him so far. Dangerfield is just as proud of him as if it were himself. They are always about together, live on the same staircase and are a by-word for their attachment to each other. But the cousin has the brains."

"Ah, that must be poor Guy's son—we heard that the widow had been discovered and that she had died, leaving her son to the care of Mrs. Dangerfield. Well, she was just the sort of woman to accept such a trust and carry it out faithfully. I have a great respect for her. I shall be glad to have her for a neighbor once again."

Miss Joyce suddenly looked up from the book she had been reading before the conversation had attracted her notice. "Mamma," she said, "ought not the cousin to be the master of Dangerfield Park, instead of Monk? I thought the son of the eldest son was always the heir, and Monk's father was only the second son."

"Quite true, my dear; but there was no entail, and it was willed away to Monk. Guy Dangerfield offended his father some time before his marriage, and the quarrel was never made up."

"I [illegible] ed Joyce with decision. "Don't you think it's rather tame of him to be such friends with his cousin? It would be much more natural for them to be at daggers drawn."

Norman laughed and stretched his long limbs.

"Alas for the degeneration of the age and race, Joyce! Deadly feuds and secret assassinations are hopelessly out of date. The supplanted and the supplanter are bosom friends, and there seems no hope of any sport to be got out of the situation."

"Which is the elder?"

"I'm sure I don't know—they look much about of an age. They've both got the same name, too, Guy Monkswold. It makes some amusing confusion sometimes between them."

"Old Mr. Dangerfield would never let Monk be called Guy," remarked Joyce. "I remember that Yolante told me so long ago. I wonder what Yolante will be like now. Have you seen her, Norman?"

"No, but I heard that she was up for commemoration. If I saw her I did not know her again. I've not seen her since she was a child, you know."

"We used to be great friends," said Joyce. "I wonder if we shall be now."

"I hope so, my love," said Lady Conway smiling suavely, "I am glad that you should have some more young companions near at hand."

"Yes, if they are nice—but some people are disappointing. I am not going to expect too much. And I don't think one can make friends just because it is expected of one. After all, if I have Cicely Northesk, I do not much care about anybody else."

Something akin to displeasure sat on Lady Conway's brow as she heard this frank avowal, but she made no remark. She was possessed of a daughter who was proving less easy to manage than the elder sisters happily and successfully married off already, and she had tact to know when to speak and when to hold her peace.

"So Cicely is still in the ascendant?" said Norman. "No diminution of sweet enthusiasm, eh, Joyce? And how are all the Northesk household? I suppose I ought to go and pay my respects to them one of these days."

"O, do, and I will go with you," cried Joyce, throwing aside her book. "It would be just the afternoon for a drive, and I will take you into Fordringham myself. We should have plenty of time—"

"But, my dear Joyce, the Northesks don't live in Fordringham."

"O, don't you know? Did I never tell you? Geoffrey Northesk has gone to live in the town, and Cicely has gone with him to keep house for him. You see, when it came to dividing the practice, old Dr. Northesk kept most of his old patients round here, whom he had attended so long, and Geoffrey took the townspeople, who are not so much of old friends and then he was offered a hospital appointment as well — demonstrator or something, I think it is — and so he thought it would be better to have his own rooms, and live more in the midst of his work. And then Cicely, said she would go with him, and take care of him: and now they have found very comfortable quarters in a big old-fashioned house, where they have a whole floor to themselves."

The brother smiled, but he made no objection to the expedition. Geoffrey Northesk was the most intimate friend he had in his native place, and he was always interested in what concerned him. Joyce ran off to prepare for her drive, whilst Lady Conway remarked somewhat incisively:

"I have no wish to interfere in any way with your liberty of action, Norman: but please to remember that I do not wish your sister to be encouraged in her infatuation for the Northesks. I have a great respect for them as our oldest friends, but Joyce carries her enthusiasm beyond all bounds, and now that her friend is living farther away, it will be easier to check the growing friendship unless you foster it injudiciously now that you have come home to live."

Norman looked up with a slight laugh.

"I didn't know there was much growing power left. The friendship seemed to have reached its uttermost growth years ago. I don't know if I quite take you, mother. It has always seemed to me that the Northesk girls have been capital friends for Joyce."

"I have not a word to say against the girls—nor indeed against any member of the family: but you ought to know enough of the world to understand that as things now stand, I cannot permit her to be constantly running after Cicely, as she did when the girl was at home. The thing is self-evident—only one is really afraid to speak a word of caution to Joyce, she has such a trick of flying off in a tangent."

Norman looked at his mother with a languid smile of amusement. He had always reserved to himself the privilege of teasing her somewhat, and as he was an only son, and a son of whom any mother might well be proud, she had never resented this, but on the contrary rather enjoyed it, though there was no other being in the wide world who would have presumed to poke fun at her ladyship. Even her husband in his lifetime had stood somewhat in awe of his stately wife.

"Ah, I see, it is the brother who is the lion in the path. A country town doctor is no fit match for Miss Conway of the Moated Grange. Is that it, mother? And yet seriously the Northesks are as well born as we are, and Geoffrey is without exception the finest and handsomest man I know. I always feel uncommonly small beside him. Is the little girl growing smitten?"

"Really, Norman, how you do exaggerate. Joyce knows the Northesks far too well to have the least nonsense of that kind in her head—and I trust you will not be so foolish as to try and put it there. What I want you to understand and to make her see, is that she cannot go on in the old easy way now that Cisely is keeping house for Geoffrey instead of living at home. Common sense and simple propriety would teach her that if she were not such a hot-headed child, but she listens to advice more patiently from you than from anybody else. I call it very fortunate that the Dangerfields are coming back just now. There are two nice girls amongst them, and no doubt they will help to fill the vacant place in Joyce's life left by the absence of Cicely Northesk."

"Ah exactly, no doubt it will be so. Well, here she comes. Have you ordered the cart? For if you think I am going to walk into Fordringham this hot afternoon, madam, you are very much mistaken."

"I know you too well to expect such a thing. No, I've ordered your machine, and the new horse too—and if you daren't drive him I will," and as, a few minutes later the pair drove off from the door, Norman handling the ribbons in a very workmanlike way, Joyce gave a little sigh of delight and exclaimed in low eager accents:

"O, Norman, it is so delightful to have you home again—and to have you for good. I don't know how it is—I suppose it is my fault—but I don't get on with mamma just quite as well as I should like. Juliet and Mabel did much better: but I have never quite managed it. I am afraid there is something not quite proper about me. I can never see things quite as mamma does, and yet I know that she ought to know best."

Norman gave a quick smiling glance at the bright face beside him, and could not help feeling what an attractive face it was, albeit a little wilful and mutinous in expression. It was not an easy face to describe, and the charm of it lay almost entirely in its vivacity and expressive nobility. The brows were low and level and a little dark and heavy, the wide-open eyes were deeply set and wonderfully quick and observant, whilst the features were somewhat retroussee in character, and only the firm square moulding of the jaw had any particular individuality of its own. But the clear complexion and soft peach-like bloom upon the cheek took away any appearance of hardness suggested by some of the lines, and the bright color that came and went with every passing wave of feeling was wonderfully pretty, as was also the bewitching archness that not unfrequently shone out of the dark gray eyes.

She chatted to her brother with the utmost freedom as they drove through the shady lanes together, till the country became gradually merged in the town, and they found themselves trotting through the wide High street of the place, returning many acknowledgments as they went.

"Go straight on—right through the fashionable part of the town, till we get to those big old-fashioned houses near the river. That is where Geoffrey and Cicely live. Yes, down there. Now I wonder if there will be any one at home. But I shall take you up to see their rooms anyhow. I'm sure you would like them."

However they had come at a fortunate time. Both brother and sister were in—sitting at a sociable tea in the shady bay window that looked towards the river, and very warm was the welcome the guests received.

Cicely Northesk was a great contrast to her friend and fervent admirer, Joyce. She was tall and fair and rather stately in appearance, though when she smiled there was something so sweet and winning in her aspect that the momentary awe she generally inspired at first sight melted away in the light of these soft brown eyes. She would have graced any society, and some people thought her rather thrown away in her present life; but she had never cared very much for the gaieties which attract most girls, and was wont to say that if she had any beauty to boast of, it would be quite as much appreciated by her friends the sick and poor as in a ball room.

As for her brother Geoffrey, Norman Conway had not gone much beyond the mark in his praise of him. He was possessed of one of those rare physiques which win the admiration of foreigners, and his great height, his breadth of shoulder and strength of limb had made him a hero and champion wherever his lot had been cast. He was enthusiastic over his profession, and promised soon to be somewhat engrossed in his work, and though he had never thought himself clever, or won any particular distinctions, he had a nicety of touch and a quick insight into symptoms which promised well for his success both as surgeon and physician. For the present surgery was his special line, but he was keenly interested in the medical side of his profession, too, and already his power of successful diagnosis had been put to some considerable test. Norman and he were old friends and liked each other in an almost brotherly fashion. Some considerable time was spent in discussing the events which had passed since they had last met, and in a survey of the quaint old rooms in which Geoffrey and his sister had established themselves; and it was only after this had been pretty well exhausted that the name of the Dangerfields came up.

"Coming back, are they? And the cousin with them," and then Geoffrey suddenly went off into a brown study which lasted so long that Norman asked him what he was thinking of.

"Of something I heard my father say long ago, when he had just returned from a visit to old Mr. Dangerfield who lay dying. I can't quite recollect the words, but they left a queer impression on my mind. I wonder if Dad would remember about it after all this time."

Joyce looked up laughing.

"A mystery—a mystery—O, Geoffrey, do go on, do try and remember. What was the impression—you can at least remember that?"

"Yes, but it sounds so absurd—the impression was that Mr. Dangerfield had said that Monk would never be the master of the Park. And yet he had drawn up a will leaving it all to him."

"Curious!" said Norman. "Perhaps the old man was wandering."

"Possibly—he was very ill—so ill that our father had felt it necessary to warn him, and to mention his elder son to him, in case he might wish him sent for. When he came home he told me what had passed. He had felt a little puzzled and so was I when he repeated the words. I cannot recall them now: but it was something about Guy's son coming after him—but it might have been a delusion, of course."

"Yes, it almost must have been, for Guy's widow and son were only found and that quite by accident, two years later by Mrs. Dangerfield in London. Well, it will be interesting to see them all again. I wonder if they will have quite forgotten us. We used to be great friends when we were all children together."

Joyce, who had been sitting very silent all this time, suddenly burst out with a question.

"Norman, didn't you say the name was the same? Do you think old Mr. Dangerfield could have meant Guy's son when he made his will?"

"Hadly, as he did not even know of his existence then."

"But are we sure he did not know?"

"Well, practically so, or he would have left some notification of the fact. I'm afraid your romantic little notions about the rightful heir must be destined to disappointment."

"If I were Guy, I would look into it and dispute the will—that would be an excitement for us all."

"If I were you, I would not make a little goose of myself, and try to set tongues wagging," answered Norman, with an undertone of significance not lost upon Joyce. "It's a silly habit to get into of speculating about other people's affairs — especially when it trenches upon an old family quarrel."

And with that brief summing up of the case the subject dropped, and after another half hour of pleasant chat the guests said good-bye, and Norman drove his sister home.

pick up on their field of labor. A singularly beautiful language, not unlike Italian in its abundant use of the vowels, Mr. Tyler considers it, after using it continuously for forty years. It is, he says, very regular and flexible, but poverty-stricken in words that convey moral ideas. Its chief peculiarity is its "clicks," which he thinks the Zulus acquired from intercourse with the Hottentots. The similarity in the sound of some words of very distinct meanings has often led to ludicrous blunders. Mr. Tyler tells the story of a missionary who was so eager to preach that he could not wait for a perfect knowledge of the language and began his sermon by asking, as he supposed, for the attention of his hearers. The proper Zulu word to use for the purpose was Lalelani, but the preacher said Lalani nonke, which means "Now all go to sleep." A more serious blunder, if the direction had been obeyed, was made by a missionary's wife. She bade a young man who was helping at the mission house kill two ducks and she should have used the word amadada, but instead, she used the word amadoda. Her helper looked at her in amazement, for unconsciously she had bidden him go and kill, not two ducks, but two men. It is evident, therefore, that Zulu is not a tongue to be used carelessly.

Leaving Mrs. Tyler behind for a few weeks, Mr. Tyler again entered the bullock-wagon and proceeded a three days' journey northward to Esidumbini, a beautiful valley fifty miles north of Durban. At the close of the third day, the end of the high table land was reached and from its edge a dense thicket like a jungle sloped to a river glistening far away in the distance. There elephants, lions, leopards, buffaloes and hyenas held undisputed sway. On the other side was a wide and fertile valley, dotted as far as eye could reach with the kraals of the Zulus. Pointing to it, Mr. Lindley, who accompanied the new missionary, said, "Brother Tyler, that valley is to be your home: let us take possession of it in the name of King Immanuel." The two men knelt on the ground beside the wagon and prayed. Mr. Lindley besought for his young brother the two blessings of untiring patience and unwavering faith. Many years afterward, Mr. Tyler recalling that prayer, perceived how clearly his comrade understood the qualities which would be most needed in the work.

A site for the new mission house was chosen on the rising ground, the plan marked out and then Mr. Lindley having introduced the newcomer to the chief men of the valley, returned to his distant home in Durban, leaving Mr. Tyler to his own resources. His first business was to secure a shelter until his own home was built. He therefore applied at the nearest kraal and was permitted by its owner to occupy one of its huts. A Zulu kraal is a circle of huts arranged around a palisade, or thorn fence, inside which, cattle, cereals and stores are kept. A king's kraal sometimes has as many as two hundred huts for the accommodation of his soldiers. The private kraals generally consist of only as many huts as the owner has wives and children. The way the huts are made is to fix long tapering poles in the ground in a circle and bend the ends over toward the centre and tie them together with wild vines. Two or three poles are then laid underneath horizontally to support the roof, which is composed of long grass secured by long lithe twigs after the manner of a thatch. The hut then resembles a gigantic bee-hive. The doorway is only two feet high and about three feet wide, so it is necessary to enter on the hands and knees. The floor is made of a glutinous earth, pounded hard and rubbed smooth with stones. It is the pride of a Zulu matron to have the floor of her hut so polished that it would serve as a mirror. In the centre is a saucer-like indentation, surrounded with a ring about six inches high. This is the fireplace and around it the inmates of the hut sit in the evening talking, smoking or singing until bedtime, when they unroll their mats and sleep with their feet to the fire.

Mr. Tyler lived six weeks in one of these kraals, during which he learned much of the language, the habits and the character of the people. Some of his lessons came in the form of dignified reproof. The owner of the kraal administered one of these in characteristic fashion. Mr. Tyler, not liking to creep into his hut on all-fours, offered to put in a door of the height common in civilized countries; but the owner said, "My father entered on his hands and knees and I shall continue to do so and while you are among the Zulus you must do as the Zulus do." Mr. Tyler having to go some distance for material for his house, said to the head-man of the kraal, referring to tools that he was leaving exposed, "Please see that none of them are stolen while I am away." The Zulu looked at him in astonishment. "Where did you come from," he asked, "that you make such a request? We have law here. If a man steals in Zululand he eats no more corn." Mr. Tyler did not think it necessary to tell him that there was law in Massachusetts, too; but he found during his long residence in Zululand that there was a difference in its enforcement not altogether in favor of civilization. He lost nothing by theft during his stay, except cattle and live stock and those were taken by lions or leopards, not by the Zulus. There was much that was hard to bear during those six weeks in the kraal; disgusting habits, filthy customs, drinking, but Mr. Tyler was there to win their hearts and he bore all cheerfully and lost no opportunity of doing acts of kindness to the other inmates of the kraal.

TRAINING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS IN ZULULAND.

Six weeks sufficed to render his house habitable, and then he sent for his wife and began in earnest the work which he had come to do. He was profoundly convinced, and his forty years' experience has confirmed his belief, that the only sure way to success, is to begin, not with maxims of civilization, but with the Gospel. To tell the story of Jesus and his power to give salvation is the best way to the heathen heart and accomplishes more in the end than teaching the industrial arts. Mr. Tyler has been a close observer, and he declares that every effort to civilize the African before he is Christianized has failed. It was hard work, however, for many years. In surveying the ground and the material with which he must work he found that it was occupied with superstition and no belief that could by any stretch of imagination be called theological. Witchcraft and charms and an idea that the spirits of the dead inhabited snakes and animals comprised their system of theology. Yet there was one aid to the missionary's work which was turned to account. The Zulu knew right from wrong. One of them being asked how he knew the difference, replied, "something within speaks when we do wrong." It was no small encouragement to know that the Zulu understood and recognized the voice of conscience.

The politeness, courtesy, and quick recognition of disinterested kindness, which characterize the Zulu, soon brought Mr. and Mrs. Tyler into friendly relations with the inmates of all the kraals in the valley. They would come to the services and listen to the preaching and would show intelligent interest in what was said, but it was long before any one would accept the new religion. The native shrewdness and penetration were often evinced in searching questions, which would have embarrassed the missionary if his system of theology had not been compactly welded in the schools of the New England of fifty years ago. The same shrewdness was manifested in their ordinary concerns combined with a curious suspicion of motive. Many amusing illustrations of this character are related by Mr. Tyler. On one occasion, he says, Dingaan, the king, consulted the missionary as to his health. The king was suffering from a severe cold and the missionary prescribed a mustard plaster for the chest. The king looked at it suspiciously and ordered it to be applied to the chest of one of his warriors, that he might witness the effect before submitting his own person to the operation. Mr. Tyler found a slight knowledge of medicine very helpful in gaining the confidence of the people, but the chief aid was the school in which Mrs. Tyler labored unweariedly. "It is only a question of time," said one Zulu, "our children are yours; they will all be Christians."

The chief difficulties in the way of winning the adults were their drinking habits, their custom of smoking hemp, and, greatest of all, polygamy. The last mentioned proved the barrier that held back the largest number and it is so still. A man is respected in Zululand in proportion to the number of wives he has. For ten cows he can purchase a wife, and being his, she works for him like a slave. She cultivates the soil and does all the work about the kraal, supporting her lord in comparative idleness. Mr. Tyler rigidly refused, after converts began to come, to admit any polygamist to the church. All wives but one must be put away. It was seldom that the wife regarded it as a hardship. She would have less labor to perform when she lived alone and would not be subject to ill-usage. Sometimes she was glad to return to her father's kraal and live there. But there were cases when they clung to their husbands; and he and they remained out of the church, though attending the services and otherwise leading Christian lives. Many have pleaded that in such cases the husband and his wives should be admitted, but Mr. Tyler contended that the unmarried men, or men with one wife, who had been admitted would surely relapse into polygamy if polygamists were admitted.

In 1871, after twenty-two years continuous labor at Esidumbini, Mr. and Mrs. Tyler paid a brief visit to their native land. Six children had been born to them and four of these they wished to leave here to be educated. A native pastor was placed in charge of the little church of thirty members, that they had gathered, and with many affectionate farewells the faithful missionary and his family sailed homeward. It seemed less home to them than did the valley in Zululand where so long a period had been spent. After a short season, spent in visiting old friends, attending missionary meetings and arranging for their children's welfare, they returned to Africa. Their Esidumbini charge had prospered so well under the native preacher, that, at the request of the Board of Missions, Mr. Tyler consented to leave it in his care to open up new ground at another place. His people demurred, but yielded on condition that he make periodical visits to them. The new station was at Umsunduzi, fifteen miles away, and there the missionaries began again their teaching and preaching. After some sixteen years there, Mr. Tyler suffered the great affliction of his life in the death of his beloved wife and helper. Shut out from civilized society, as they had been for so many years, they had drawn very close to each other, and the death of one was all the more severely felt by the survivor. He struggled on alone, save for the tender and devoted attention of his daughter, for another two years, and then turned his face homeward, having given forty years of his life to the cause of Christ among the Zulus.

A life so full of labor and incident cannot be even summarized in the space at our disposal. It has been possible only to indicate the lines on which it was passed. For a full account of the labors, trials, dangers and successes of which it was so full, we must refer the reader to Mr. Tyler's charming work, Forty Years among the Zulus. Its fascinating descriptions of Zulu life and customs, of the wedding ceremonies, funeral rites, strange superstitions, quaint observances and interesting folk-lore stories charm the reader and give him a vivid idea, not only of the land and people, but of missionary life. Its price is $1.25 and it may be obtained of the publishers or of the author, Rev. Josiah Tyler, St. Johnsbury, Vt.

Saved Her Sight.

"My little girl Hazel two years ago had the grip, leaving her with inflamed eyes, so bad that for seven months we had to bandage them and keep her in a dark room. The family physician and an oculist said the sight of one eye was destroyed and she might lose the other. She suffered intense pain, and when light was admitted to the room would cry as if burned with a hot iron. We began giving her Hood's Sarsaparilla, and to our surprise her eyes began to improve rapidly. The sight gradually returned and she is now as well as ever. Her eyes are permanently and perfectly cured." W. A. BUTTERFIELD, 1495 Hasting St., Detroit, Mich.

Spurgeon's Own Words.

"DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since first I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your remedy. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally, I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation.

"Yours heartily, (Rev.) C. H. SPURGEON.

But no case is too serious for despair, remembering the marvellous cures resulting from my treatment. My book on the "Cure of Consumption" will tell you of poor sufferers who had given up all hope, but who are now enjoying vigorous, happy, healthy lives, through the timely use of my treatment. I will mail my book on Consumption and Diseases of the Chest on receipt of 35 cents, or will send the book with a 50 cent bottle of Balsamic Elixir, and a 50 cent box of pills upon receipt of One Dollar.

A HEART DEAD IN SIN.*

EVERY one descended from Adam, consequently is spiritually dead, dead to God, wholly dead in sin: entirely void of the life of God, void of the image of God, of all that righteousness and holiness wherein Adam was created. Instead of this, every man born into the world, now bears the image of the devil, in pride and self-will; the image of the beast, in sensual appetites and desires. While a man is in a mere natural state, before he is born to God, he has, in a spiritual sense, eyes and sees not: a thick veil lies upon them. He has ears but hears not; he is utterly deaf to what he is most of all concerned to hear. His other spiritual senses are all locked up; he is in the same condition as if he had them not. Hence he has no knowledge of God, no intercourse with him; he is not at all acquainted with him. He has no true knowledge of the things of God, either spiritual or eternal. He says unto God depart from us, we desire not the knowledge of thy ways; we do not want to know aught of God, nor what is our duty to him.

The state of nature is a state of utter darkness; a state wherein "darkness covers the earth, and gross darkness the people." The poor unawakened sinner; how much knowledge soever he may have as to other things, has no knowledge of himself; in this respect "he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know." He knows not that he is a fallen spirit, whose only business in the present world is to recover from his fall, to regain that image of God wherein he was created. He sees no necessity for the "one thing needful," even that inward universal change, that "birth from above," which is the beginning of that total renovation and sanctification of spirit, soul, and body "without which no man can see the Lord."

THE TRUE VALUE OF EDUCATION.†

IT is as an immortal being that education is valuable to man; and civilization, with its refinements, has value just as it develops us into fitness for the dignities and sovereignties of everlasting life. Education, therefore, is not merely or mainly to enable us better to make dollars, or to enjoy our ease in this life; but to impart to us ideas, taste, knowledge and wisdom that shall lead us into eternal fellowship with the beauty of goodness and holiness. It is to teach us the alphabet and the structure and combinations of the language of immortality, and to graduate us out of the schools of books and technicalities into the schools of actual life, where, mastering higher problems and attaining to grander developments in the College of Experience, we may be finally graduated, in the great commencement day, as worthy to stand among the bright immortals in the paradise of God. Let us dismiss, then, this unseemly ambition to obtain an education that will merely serve utilitarian purposes in this life—an education whose value can be estimated by dollars and cents; and desire rather to gather all knowledge that can make the soul pure and brave and wise and loving and holy, and start it on paths of inquiry, whether in the realms of physics or metaphysics, in pursuing which it may rise to God-like grandeur and blessedness, and aspire to glory, honor and immortality.

What is the ultimate purpose of my life, and to what end am I to direct the educational forces now in my possession? That is the question which awaits your answer. I will not conceal from you that the answer is attended with difficulties. To the uneducated mind, accustomed blindly to revere the tradi- [illegible] to generation in the family, it may offer no difficulty. But to the educated mind—to the ear [illegible] and made familiar with the bold researches of [illegible] everything—even the mind and heart and con- [illegible] science of man—in the iron chains of blind necessity, it is not so easy a task to settle upon fixed principles in morals and religion, and start out upon life with a definite and untrembling faith. It is all the more difficult because students get just such a smattering of these teachings as to unsettle their faith, but not enough to recover them from the paralysis and enable them to rest on their faith all the more firmly because it has been assaulted in vain.

COULD NOT SPARE THE RING.

AMONG some reminiscences of the late Lord Raglan who commanded the British forces in the Crimea, is the following incident: When a young man, Raglan was riding from the terrible field of Waterloo, when his elbow was shattered by a stray shot. Refusing to dismount, he rode into the village of Waterloo. Here he was taken to the Duke of Wellington's quarters, and into a room where two wounded officers already lay. One of these, the Prince of Orange, afterwards said that not a word or a groan told of the arrival of the new patient, and that he had no idea Lord Raglan was present till he suddenly heard him call out in his usual tones: "Hallo! dont carry away that arm until I have taken off my ring!" The ring was the gift of his wife, and, even in the midst of his sufferings, Lord Raglan was unwilling to part with it. But all the pain of his wound, and of the amputation that removed his arm, had been patiently borne in silence.

The Cry of the Nations.

A Famous Lady Traveller Tells How She Was Converted to the Value of Missions.

AT a recent conference of the Student Volunteer Missionary Society, Mrs. Bishop, the famous traveller, who has just returned from an exploring tour in North Eastern Asia, gave a remarkable address. After being abroad for two years, hearing nothing of what was going on in Christendom, she said she returned to civilization, and discovered to her joy that the missionary spirit was rising, and had greatly risen during those two years. The modern growth of medical missions—there are now 169 missionaries abroad holding medical diplomas, and nineteen of them women—is a remarkable fact. Of the value of medical missions, Mrs. Bishop spoke very highly. But while thanking God for what has been accomplished, she felt impressed more by the magnitude of the task and the enormous area of the unenlightened world, than by what has been achieved. For four and a half years it was her fortune to travel in Asia, and to come in contact with Buddhism, Hindooism, Shintooism and Islamism. All these systems seem to present an impenetrable wall against the advances of Christianity; though we know the wall is not impregnable. Except in Japan, she could not say that she had seen large results. But she had seen an enormous amount of self-denying toil on the part of those who are carrying the Gospel to the heathen, and she could not speak too highly from the traveler's point of view, and from extensive observations in all parts of Asia, of the labors of Christian men and women in the regions where she had traveled.

"I am a convert," said Mrs. Bishop, "to missions through seeing missions and the need for them. Some years ago I took no interest whatever in the condition of the heathen. I had heard much ridicule cast upon Christian missions, and perhaps had imbibed some of the unhallowed spirit. But the missionaries by their lives and character, and by the work they are doing wherever I have seen them, have produced in my mind such a change and such an enthusiasm, as I might almost express it, in favor of Christian missions, that I cannot go anywhere without speaking about them and trying to influence others in their favor who may be indifferent as I was before I went among heathen countries."

As to the condition of women in Eastern countries, the speaker said she had had unusual opportunities of seeing that, and she had found that the life of an Oriental woman is really without hope in the world. They lead a degraded life in which the intellect is dwarfed. While the circumstances of their lives develop fierce passions of hatred, jealousy and intrigue, their better natures are stunted, and in intelligence they are little better than a child of eight or nine years old with us would be. Having with her a medicine chest, which she often used in the relief of various ailments, Mrs. Bishop said that women had come to her hundreds of times and asked for something to make a favorite wife look ugly or odious, or to destroy a favorite wife or the favorite son of a favorite wife. She really thought that the position of woman in Mohammedan countries is more degraded than in the heathen lands she had visited. We may well be broken-hearted and agonize in prayer over the pitiable condition of our sisters in these non-Christian countries. All this, of course, involves the degradation of the men. She looked forward to the day when in those Eastern lands the work of Christian women among women should turn out to be the great elevating and evangelizing agency.

As to political and social oppression and corruption, Mrs. Bishop declared she thought that Persia is worse even than Turkey. Persia is one seething mass of corruption, political, social and moral, from the highest officials downwards, and the peasants are ground down to the very limit of starvation. Enlightened Mohammedans admit that their country is perishing through sheer corruption. As to the preponderating influences of the false faiths of those countries where she had traveled, her conviction is that it is no exaggeration to say that they are "sensual and devilish."

In her travels the paucity of missionary workers had impressed itself on her as a terrible fact. From the frontiers of China proper to the waters of Babylon, she had not found a single witness for Jesus Christ. Central Asia is without a missionary. Arabia is almost in the same destitute condition. Persia is without missionaries, except at the northwestern corner. A great part of Turkey is without workers. As for Thibet, even that part of it which can be freely entered is virtually without a witness for Christ.

Revisiting Old Fields.

Evangelist Harrison Tells of his Summer Experiences in Gospel Work.

WRITING to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Springfield, Ills., under recent date, Rev. Thomas Harrison, the wellknown evangelist, tells of visits lately paid to a number of points at which in former years his spiritual ministrations were greatly blessed. He says:

"One of the old fields returned to was Wharton Street, Philadelphia, where I worked in 1879, when 1,200 were at the altar. It was a comfort to me to be with my old friend of those other years, the Rev. Dr. Vernon, present pastor of Wharton St. Church. The night I preached for him the Holy Spirit was manifest. After closing there, I visited Washington, and was at Ryland Church, where I labored in 1878. Here I met some of the old Saints, and was refreshed in spirit by the renewal of former friendships. Thence I went to Red Rock, Minnesota. Ten years ago I conducted services at this camp. I found the presiding elders, preachers, and people with me in faith and devotion to the work. The meeting was at times a Pentecost, and there were many happy conversions. Next came St. Paul, Minn. After the camp-meeting, at the request of Rev. F. Doran, Central Park M. E. Church, St. Paul, I remained over to preach Sabbath night for him. The altar and three pews were crowded after the sermon, and it seemed that the entire congregation was seeking religion. It was with this society that I labored in 1882, with the Rev. Dr. Marshall, and it was refreshing to be with these people once more.

"Next Sabbath I spent in Springfield, Ill., where I labored seven years ago, and preached to crowded audiences morning and night, holding reunion services with Rev. Mr. Randle. At the altar of this church in 1887, 2,240 bowed as seekers of religion.

"I have been reminded by this return to former fields, that this is a dying world. About a hundred converts have died since I was last in Springfield. Some of the standard-bearers have laid away the weapons of their warfare, and have gained the victory, but they all died well. I am now on my way to the Des Plaines, Chicago, Ill. Camp-Meeting. We gained a victory in this field years ago, and the indications point to a like glorious time."

THE MARSOVAN PERSECUTION.

Five of the Marsovan prisoners have been executed. The innocence of two of the men of any complicity in the rising and the burning American College was clearly established, and the other three were probably innocent. They were Christians and they suffered for their faith. After Professors Thoumaian and Kayayan had been released, and the sentence of the other twelve persons was commuted to imprisonment no more could be done. All appeals for further clemency were rejected.

Bethlehem Bead-makers.

Skilled Workmen in Mother-of-Pearl, Olive and Oak who, with very Primitive Tools, Produce Articles of Rare Beauty.

FEW travellers visit Palestine without bringing back some pretty souvenir from Bethlehem, which, next to the Sacred City itself, is the greatest centre of interest to the sight-seer in the Holy Land. The artisans of the City of David are famous throughout the East for their skill in carving, and specimens of their handiwork in olive, oak, and mother-of-pearl — which they carve into beautiful crosses, paper-knives, decorative boxes, and prayer-beads,— find their way to the most distant parts of the globe. Our illustration shows a Bethlehem bead-maker at work beside the door of his home, while his wife and child sit by, observing his skilful manipulation of the very primitive bead-turning machine. His principal material is mother-of-pearl, from the Red Sea, which comes to him in small blocks, put up in canvas sacks by agents in Jeddah, and which sells at about $10 per Egyptian cantar, equal to thirty-five pounds. He can purchase bone very cheaply, and olive-wood is even cheaper; indeed, bead-makers and carvers usually own small groves of olive trees, the wood of which they use in their business. If other woods, such as oak, are needed, a walk of an hour or two in almost any direction will bring the worker to forest lands, where he can readily obtain all he requires, for the mere cost of cutting.

Economy and frugality are characteristics of Eastern homes of the humbler sort; hence, a bead-maker reckons that the income from the sale of the prayer-beads manufactured from a single cantar of mother-of-pearl, with the usual quantity of bone and wood included, will be quite enough to support him and his family for a whole year. His tools can hardly be valued at more than $5, and he can thus start in business with a very limited capital. His chief implement is the malzama, or vise, which holds the material, while he pierces it with a peculiar tool, and gradually transforms it into different shapes. It is this part of the operation that is shown in the picture. To the left of the workman is a basin for holding the finished beads, the raw material being on his right. In this attitude the bead-maker will work steadily all day long, pausing only for a few moments to eat his simple meal of mjaddarah, a dish composed of rice, lentils and bread.

Skilled workers from Bethlehem frequently travel to other countries in the pursuit of their calling. Numbers have visited Europe where they have been able to dispose of their wares to better advantage than at home, and those who remain do quite a thriving business in exporting prayer-beads, crosses, and similar trinkets, especially to Catholic countries. In the Holy Land pilgrims of all creeds buy these articles and cherish them solely as pretty specimens of Oriental craftsmanship and as reminders of their visit to the sacred city of the Saviour's nativity. It is said that Peter the Hermit, who conducted one of the great Crusades to the Holy Land, was the first to introduce beads as an adjunct to religious worship. The Saxon word bede signifies "a prayer;" a "bead-roll" was a list of people who were to be prayed for, while a "beadsman" was one who prayed for others. These and similar customs were confined to the Romish Church, and while they may have had their uses in early times, when dense ignorance prevailed among the common people, and their attention and thoughts could only be fixed by visible symbols, they have never been discarded, but are still part and parcel of its mummeries. Every year, thousands of strings of beads, or chaplets, are maufactured by the Bethlehem workers and ultimately find their way into the possession of Romanists who use them as rosaries, holding them as almost sacred things. The poor bead-turner of Palestine, as he drills and polishes his nugget of mother-of-pearl from the Red Sea, would be dazzled were he to know of the high prices his pretty treasures sometimes bring in Europe and America.

Although bead-making may be regarded as the principal industry in Bethlehem, there are many other occupations in which the natives of that city are specially skilled. Masons, weavers, shoemakers, blacksmiths and carpenters abound. Carvers and souvenir-makers drive a profitable trade among visitors, and the ear-rings, necklaces and bracelets made by the silversmiths of Bethlehem are sold widely among the neighboring towns and villages, partly for money and partly in exchange for corn, fruit, and other articles.

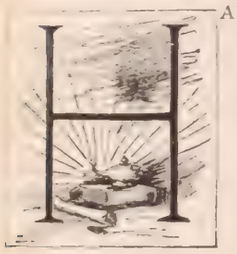
The Tabernacle Pulpit

A BOTTLE OF TEARS.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., Founded on the Text: Psalms 56: 8, "Put thou my tears into thy bottle."



HARDLY a mail has come to me for twenty years that has not contained letters saying that my sermons have comforted the writers of those letters. I have not this summer nor for twenty years spoken on the platform of any out-door meeting, but coming down I have been told by hundreds of people the same thing. So I think I will keep on trying to be a "Son of Consolation."

The prayer of my text was pressed out of David's soul by innumerable calamities; but it is just as appropriate for the distressed of all ages. Within the past century, travellers and antiquarians have explored the ruins of many of the ancient cities, and from the very heart of those buried splendors of other days have been brought up evidences of customs that long ago vanished from the world. From among tombs of those ages have been brought up lachrymatories, or lachrymals, which are vials made of earthenware. It was the custom for the ancients to catch the tears that they wept over their dead in a bottle, and to place that bottle in the graves of the departed; and we have many specimens of the ancient lachrymatories, or tear-bottles, in our museums.

When on the way from the Holy Land our ship touched at Cyprus, we went back into the hills of that island and bought tear-bottles which the natives had dug out of the ruins of the old city. There is nothing more suggestive to me than the tear-bottles which I brought home and put among my curiosities. That was the kind of bottle that my text alludes to, when David cries, "Put thou my tears into thy bottle."

The text intimates that God has an intimate acquaintance and perpetual remembrance of all our griefs, and a vial, or lachrymatory, or bottle, in which he catches and saves our tears; and I bring to you the condolence of this Christian sentiment. Why talk about grief? Alas! the world has its pangs, and now, while I speak, there are thick darknesses of soul that need to be lifted. There are many who are about to break under the assault of temptation, and perchance, if no words appropriate to their case be uttered, they perish. I come on no fool's errand. Put upon your wounds no salve [illegible] pressing straight to the mark, I hail you as a vessel mid-sea cries to a passing craft, "Ship ahoy!" and invite you on board a vessel which has Faith for a rudder, and Prayer for sails, and Christ for Captain, and Heaven for an eternal harbor. Catherine Rheinfeldt, a Prussian, keeps a boat with which she rescues the drowning. When a storm comes on the coast and other people go to their beds to rest, she puts out in her boat for the relief of the distressed, and hundreds of the drowning has she brought safely to the beach. In this life-boat of the Gospel I put out to-day, hoping, by God's help, to bring ashore at least one soul that may now be sinking in the billows of temptation and trouble. The tears that were once caught in the lachrymatories brought up from Herculaneum and Pompeii are all gone, and the bottle is as dry as the scoria of the volcano that submerged them! but not so with the bottle in which God gathers all our tears.

First, I remark that God keeps perpetually the tears of repentance. Many a man has awakened in the morning so wretched from the night's debauch that he has sobbed and wept. Pains in the head, aching in the eyes, sick at heart, and unfit to step into the light. He grieves, not about his misdoing, but only about its consequences. God makes no record of such weeping. Of all the million tears that have gushed as the result of such misdemeanor, not one ever got into God's bottle. They dried on the fevered cheek, or were dashed down by the bloated hand, or fell into the red wine cup as it came again to the lips, foaming with still worse intoxication. But when a man is sorry for his past and tries to do better—when he mourns his wasted advantages and bemoans his rejection of God's mercy, and cries amid the lacerations of an aroused conscience for help out of his terrible predicament, then God listens; then heaven bows down; then sceptres of pardon are extended from the throne; then his crying rends the heart of heavenly compassion; then his tears are caught in God's bottle.

You know the story of Paradise and the Peri. I think it might be put to higher adaptation. An angel starts from the throne of God to find what thing it can on the earth worthy of being carried back to heaven. It goes down through the gold and silver mines of earth, but finds nothing worthy of transportation to the Celestial City. It goes down through the depths of the sea, where the pearls lie, and finds nothing worthy of taking back to heaven. But coming to the foot of a mountain it sees a wanderer weeping over his evil ways. The tears of the prodigal start, but do not fall to the ground, for the angel's wing catches them, and with that treasure speeds back to heaven. God sees the angel coming, and says, "Behold the brightest gem of earth, and the brightest jewel of heaven—the tear of a sinner's repentance."

Oh! when I see the Heavenly Shepherd bringing a lamb from the wilderness; when I hear the quick tread of the prodigal hastening home to find his father; when I see a sailor-boy coming on the wharf, and hurrying away to beg his mother's pardon for long neglect and unkindness; when I see the houseless coming to God for shelter, and the wretched and the vile, and the sin burned, and the passion-blasted appealing for mercy to a compassionate God, I exclaim in ecstacy and triumph: "More tears for God's bottle!"

Again, God keeps a tender remembrance of all your sicknesses. How many of you are thoroughly sound in body? Not one out of ten! I do not exaggerate. The vast majority of the race are constant subjects of ailments. There is some one form of disease that you are particularly subject to. You have a weak side, or back, or are subject to headaches, or faintnesses, or lungs easily distressed. It would not take a very strong blow to shiver the golden bowl of life, or break the pitcher at the fountain. Many of you have kept on in life through sheer force of will. You think no one can understand your distresses. Perhaps you look strong, and it is supposed that you are a hypochondriac. They say you are nervous—as if that were nothing! God have mercy upon any man or woman that is nervous! At times you sit alone in your room. Friends do not come. You feel an indescribable loneliness in your sufferings: but God knows; God feels; God compassionates. He counts the sleepless nights; he regards the acuteness of the pain; he estimates the hardness of the breathing. While you pour out the medicine from the bottle, and count the drops, God counts all your falling tears. As you look at the vials, filled with nauseous draughts, and at the bottles of distasteful tonic that stand on the shelf, remember that there is a larger bottle than these, which is filled with no mixture by earthly apothecaries, but it is God's bottle, in which he hath gathered all our tears.

Again: God remembers all the sorrows of poverty. There is much want that never comes to inspection. The deacons of the church never see it. The comptrollers of almshouses never report it. It comes not to church, for it has no appropriate apparel. It makes no appeal for help, but chooses rather to suffer than expose its bitterness. Fathers who fail to gain a livelihood, so that they and their children submit to constant privation; sewing-women, who cannot ply the needle quick enough to earn them shelter and bread. But whether reported or uncomplaining, whether in seemingly comfortable parlor, or in damp cellar, or in hot garret, God's angels of mercy are on the watch. This moment those griefs are being collected. Down on the back streets, in all the alleys, amid shanties and log-cabins, the work goes on. Tears of want—seething in summer's heat, or freezing in winter's cold—they fall not unheeded. They are jewels for heaven's casket. They are pledges of Divine sympathy. They are tears for God's bottle.

Again: the Lord preserves the remembrance of all paternal anxieties. You see a man from the most infamous surroundings step out into the kingdom of God. He has heard no sermon. He has received no startling providential warning. What brought him to this new mind? This is the secret: God looked over the bottle in which he gathers the tears of his people, and he saw a parental tear in that bottle which has been for forty years unanswered. He said "Go to, now; and let me answer that tear!" and forthwith the wanderer is brought home to God. Oh, this work of training children for God! It is a tremendous work. Some people think it easy. They have never tried it. A child is placed in the arms of the young parent. It is a beautiful plaything. You look into the laughing eyes. You examine the dimples in the feet. You wonder at its exquisite organism. Beautiful plaything! But on some nightfall, as you sit rocking that little one, a voice seems to fall straight from the throne of God, saying, "That child is immortal! The stars shall die, but that is an immortal! Suns shall grow old with age and perish, but that is an immortal!"

Now I know with many of you this is the chief anxiety. You earnestly wish your children to grow up rightly, but you find it hard work to make them do as you wish. You check their temper. You correct their waywardness: in the midnight your pillow is wet with weeping. You have wrestled with God in agony for the salvation of your children. You ask me if all that anxiety has been ineffectual. I answer: No. God understands your heart. He understands how hard you have tried to make that daughter do right, though she is so very petulant and reckless; and what pains you have bestowed in teaching that son to walk in the path of uprightness, though he has such strong proclivities for dissipation. I speak a cheering word. God heard every counsel you ever offered him. God has known all the sleepless nights you have ever passed. God has seen every sinking of your distressed spirit. God remembers your prayers. He keeps eternal record of your anxieties; and in his lachrymatory, not such as stood in ancient tomb, but in one that glows and glitters beside the throne of God, he holds all those exhausting tears. The grass may be rank upon your graves and the letters upon your tombstone defaced with the elements before the Divine response will come; but he who hath declared, "I will be a God to thee, and to thy seed after thee," will not forget; and some day, in heaven, while you are ranging the fields of light, the gates of pearl will swing back, and garlanded with glory, that long wayward one will rush into your outstretched arms of welcome and triumph. The hills may depart and the earth may burn, and the stars fall and time perish, but God will break his oath and trample upon his promises—never! never!

Again, God keeps a perpetual remembrance of all bereavements. These are the trials that cleave the soul, and throw the red hearts of men to be crushed in the wine-press. Troubles at the store you may leave at the store. Misrepresentation and abuse of the world you may leave on the street where you found them. The law-suit that would swallow your honest accumulations may be left in the court-room. But bereavements are home troubles, and there is no escape from them. You will see that vacant chair. Your eye will catch at the suggestive picture. You cannot fly the presence of such ills. You go to Switzerland to get clear of them, but more sure-footed than the mule that takes you up the Alps, your troubles climb to the tip-top, and sit shivering on the glaciers. You may cross the seas, but they can outsail the swiftest steamer. You may take caravan, and put out across the Arabian desert but they follow you like a simoom, armed with suffocation. You plunge into the Mammoth Cave, but they hang like stalactites from the roof of the great cavern. They stand behind with skeleton fingers to push you ahead. They stand before you to throw you back. They run upon you like reckless horsemen. They charge upon you with gleaming spear. They seem to come hap-hazard, scattering shots from the gun of a careless sportsman. But not so. It is good aim that sends them just right; for God is the archer. This summer many of you will especially feel your grief as you go to places where once you were accompanied by those who are gone now. Your troubles will follow you to the seashore, and will keep up with the lighting express in which you speed away. Or, tarrying at home, they will sit beside you by day, and whisper over your pillow night after night. I want to assure you that you are not left alone; and that your weeping is heard in heaven. You will wander among the hills and say, "Up this hill, last year, our boy climbed with great glee, and waved his cap from the top;" or, "This is the place where our little girl put flowers in her hair, and looked up in her mother's face," until every drop of blood in your heart tingled with gladness, and you thanked God with a thrill of rapture; and you look around as much as to say: "Who dashed out that light? Who filled this cup with gall? What blast froze up these fountains of the heart?" Some of you have lost your parents within the last twelve months. Their prayers for you are ended. You take up their picture, and try to call back the kindness that once looked out from those old, wrinkled faces, and spoke in such a tremulous voice; and you say it is a good picture, but all the while you feel that, after all, it does not do justice; and you would give almost anything—you would cross the sea, you would walk the earth over—to hear just one word from those lips that a few months ago used to call you by your first name, though so long you yourself have been a parent. Now, you have done your best to hide your grief. You smile when you do not feel like it. But though you may deceive the world, God knows. He looks down upon the empty cradle, upon the desolated nursery, upon the stricken home, and upon the broken heart, and says: "This is the way I thresh the wheat; this is the way I scour my jewels! Cast thy burden on my arm and I will sustain you. All those tears I have gathered into my bottle!"

But what is the use of having so many tears in God's lachrymatory? In that great casket or vase, why does God preserve all your troubles? Through all the ages of eternity, what use of a great collection of tears? I do not know that they will be kept there for ever. I do not know but that in some distant age of heaven an angel of God may look into the bottle and find it as empty of tears as the lachrymals of earthenware dug up from the ancient city. Where have the tears gone to? What sprite of hell hath been invading God's palace, and hath robbed the lachrymatories? None. These were sanctified sorrows, and those tears were changed into pearls that are now set in the crowns and robes of the ransomed. I walk up to examine this heavenly coronet, gleaming brighter than the sun, and cry, "From what river-depths of heaven were those gems gathered?" and a thousand voices reply, "These are transmuted tears from God's bottle." I see sceptres of light stretched down from the throne of those who on earth were trod on of men; and in every sceptre-point, and inlaid in every ivory stair of golden throne, I behold an indescribable richness and lustre, and cry, "From whence this streaming light—these flashing pearls?" and the voices of the elders before the throne, and of the martyrs under the altar, and of the hundred and forty and four thousand radiant on the glassy sea, exclaim, "Transmuted tears from God's bottle."

Let the ages of heaven roll on — the story of earth's pomp and pride long ago ended; the Koh-i-noor diamonds that make kings proud, the precious stones that adorned Persian tiara and flamed in the robes of Babylonian processions, forgotten; the Golconda mines charred in the last conflagration; but firm as the everlasting hills, and pure as the light that streams from the throne, and bright as the river that flows from the eternal rock, shall gleam, shall sparkle, shall flame for ever these transmuted tears of God's bottle.

Meanwhile, let the empty lachrymatory of heaven stand for ever. Let no hand touch it. Let no wing strike it. Let no collision crack it. Purer than beryl or chrysoprasus. Let it stand on the step of Jehovah's throne and under the arch of the unfading rainbow. Passing down the corridors of the palace, the redeemed of earth shall glance at it, and think of all the earthly troubles from which they were delivered, and say, each to each, "That is what we heard of on earth." "That is what the Psalmist spoke of." "There once were put our tears." "That is God's bottle." And while standing there inspecting this richest inlaid vase of heaven, the towers of the palace dome strike up this silvery chime: "God hath wiped away all tears from all faces. Wherefore comfort one another with these words."

TREASURED TEARS

In some districts of the Tyrol a quaint custom prevails which is singularly like the ancient Oriental custom of collecting the tears of mourners in bottles and preserving them, to which allusion is made in Psalms 56: 8, where David prays, "Put thou my tears into thy bottle." A traveller who has spent some months among the peasantry in that lovely district between Austria and Italy says that when a Tyrolean girl is about to be married and before she leaves her home to go to church, her mother hands her a handkerchief, which is called a tear-kerchief.

It is always made of newly-spun linen, and has never been used. It is with this kerchief that she dries her tears when she leaves her father's house, and while she stands at the altar. After the marriage is over, and the bride has gone with her husband to their new home, she folds up the kerchief and places it unwashed in her linen-closet, where it remains untouched. The tear-kerchief has only performed half its mission. Children are born, grow up, marry and move away from the old home. Each daughter receives from the mother a new tear-kerchief.

Her own kerchief still remains where it was placed in the linen-closet on the day of the marriage. Generations come and go. The young, rosy bride has become a wrinkled old lady. She may have survived her husband and all her children. All her friends may have died off, and still that last present which she received from her mother has not fulfilled its object. But it comes at last. At last the weary eyes close for a long, long sleep, and the tired wrinkled hands are folded over the pulseless heart. Then the tear-kerchief is put to the use for which it has been saved all those years. It is taken from its place and spread over the placid features of the dead before being laid away in the tomb.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people

Japan Waiting.

Dr. Davis's Tour through the Unevangelized Districts of Japan—Buddhist Opposition.

IN the current number of the Missionary Herald, Dr. Davis of the American Board gives the following description of Japanese society as he observed it during a recent tour: My journey through the province of Eichigo has impressed me deeply with the fact that "there remaineth yet very much land to be possessed" in Japan. This is one of the largest and richest provinces in the empire, and its fertile, level, alluvial plains are about seventy miles long and twenty miles wide, besides its rich mountain valleys. It contains a population of a million and a half. Niigata, one of the five open ports of Japan, is near the centre of its coast, and missionaries are free to tour throughout nearly the whole province without passports. The Kumi-ai churches have an evangelist in Kashiwazaki, toward the northern end of the province, a city of 15,000; another in Nagaoka, forty miles south of Niigata, a city of 30,000; one in Shibata, twenty miles east of Niigata, a town of 20,000 people; one at Nakaojo, ten miles farther away; and one at Gosen, also inland; while in Niigata is a church without a pastor at the present time. The Presbyterians have an evangelist in the extreme southwest, one at Nagaoka, and one in Niigata; this is all the Protestant force there is at work in the province. We have two families and one unmarried lady located at Niigata. There are cities of 10,000 people and hundreds of towns and villages where nothing is being done.

Thus it is all over the empire; Christianity has, as yet, only touched Japan in spots. There is room for ten times the number of workers, and even then it would take many decades to evangelize the land. My tours during the past four months from Hiuga, on the west, to Echigo, on the northeast, convince me also that the people are everywhere ready to listen to the truth. They are not all ready to embrace it, but earnest listeners are found everywhere. It is a great delight to preach the Word to such audiences and hear and answer their questions at the close.

"One other encouragement I have found everywhere: the majority of the Christians up and down through the land are hungering and thirsting after spiritual truth — soul-food; and it has been one of the keenest pleasures of my life to meet these little companies of Christians and give to them, as well as I was able, the Bread of Life. Two or three years ago the most of the questions asked were philosophical or theological, but now they are practical, spiritual questions which affect the individual life and work. This is a hopeful sign, and if this spirit can be fed and fostered, and, above all, if the Holy Spirit can be poured out upon the infant Church in Japan in great measure, then its speedy evangelization will be assured.

An incident occurred in Kurayoshi that shows the quality of the half-score of believers there. A Buddhist priest from Okayama advertises to lecture; subject, "Buddhist and Christian Heaven and Hell;" "Opportunity given for asking questions." Two of the young Christians go. The Buddhist's explanation of the Christian doctrine seems inaccurate. One young man questions the speaker; The speaker is silent. The young Christian expounds his views. The chairman of the meeting, probably not expecting his invitation would be acccepted, invites him to come forward if he wishes to speak. He proceeds to the platform, and there for a few minutes, in a Buddhist temple, in the presence of a Buddhist audience met to hear a Buddhist sermon, won the hearty applause of the meeting by the straightforward exposition of the Christian doctrine of the future.

Another incident that occurred in Tajima shows Buddhist opposition. One day some 200 or 300 opposers, incited by Buddhists from a neighboring village, gathered about Mr. Hama's lodgings to argue and intimidate and drive him out of town. After taking every precaution, he went to bed at night and slept. But he learned next morning that the police and some others, alarmed for his safety, had watched the whole night. Next day they besieged him till he consented to a discussion, to be limited to ninety minutes. So, sending his wife and child to another part of the house for safety, Mr. Hama stood alone for the truth in the presence of about one hundred Buddhists. Their spokesman cited Christ's words, 'I came not to send peace but a sword,' etc., and loudly decried such a religion (much is made of this passage in some quarters.) In many other ways they tried to stop his work, but in vain. A few days later we held quiet public meetings there, at which three of us spoke. Now there are earnest inquirers there."

In one of the out-places from Kobe a young physician and his wife became Christians and were baptized. After a while the physician lost income because of his religion. His wife's parents heard of the various changes, and while they might perhaps have borne the change of religion, the loss of income and esteem was too much. They threatened to take their daughter back home again unless the husband and she too gave up Christianity!

The man's father, who was an official in another part of the country, a landowner and receiving a good salary, next sent word to the son that unless he gave up Christianity he would deprive him of his position and rights of the eldest son! The young man held quietly to his faith and life, notwithstanding the pressure from his own and his wife's parents. Finally his wife succumbed to the outside pressure and began to torment her husband. He bore this also. At length the wife broke away from his home, leaving the two young children she had borne to him behind her. The last report from the evangelist says that the woman has been cut off from membership, but that the husband holds steadfastly to his Christian life and his duties.

This is indeed a hard case, and it is far from being a solitary one. Family and neighborhood persecution still abound, and probably will for a long time.

PAUL AT ROME.

S S. Lesson for Sep. 10. Acts 28: 11-31 Golden Text, Rom. 1: 16. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

AFTER three months stay, three blessed months in the then barbarous island of Melita (Malta), the ship's company which had been saved of God in answer to Paul's prayer, took ship in an Alexandrian vessel, bound for Rome. Touching at Syracuse, in the island of Sicily, they next stopped at Rhegium, the first port in Italy where they stopped, thence to Puteoli, where Paul's heart was gladdened by finding disciples, and, unhindered by Julius, the centurion, who had probably by this time become a Christian, he and his companions remained with them seven days. Then, as now, the meeting together of those who had renounced "this present evil world" for the sake of him who died for them and who were looking for his coming, was a great source of glory to God and of strength and comfort to the Church; and Paul himself was not beyond the need of such encouragements.

God had prepared for his servant's arrival in Rome. Unlike the other prisoners he against whom "no certain thing" could be laid, and who on his voyage had won, through the pleasure of his Master in him, the respect and confidence of the centurion and of all on board—was suffered to dwell by himself with a soldier that kept him. And great liberty was allowed him. Prisoner as he was, he knew from God himself that the purpose of his journey was to bear witness for his God in Rome (Acts 23: 11), and, without let or hindrance he sent probably by Luke or Aristarchus to call the chief of the Jews together. The name of Paul had obtained a very wide repute, and it seemed necessary to account to the Jews for his presence in Rome as a prisoner waiting for his trial; especially as his great object was to testify for his Master. Therefore he summed up his position thus: "Men and brethren, though I have committed nothing against the people or custom of our fathers, yet was I delivered prisoner from Jerusalem into the hands of the Romans: who when they had examined me, would have let me go, because there was no cause of death in me. But when the Jews spake against it, I was constrained to appeal unto Cæsar: not that I had aught to accuse my nation of. For this cause therefore, have I called for you, and to speak with you: because that for the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain." Thus tersely, guided by the Spirit of God, the old man led up to the subject which lay upon his heart. He only spoke the few words about himself in order to make the way for the Lord.

And the Jews took it so; they said: "We neither received letters out of Judea concerning thee, neither any of the brethren that came shewed or spake any harm of thee. But we desire to hear thee what thou thinkest, for as concerning this sect, we know that Everywhere it is Spoken Against."

Such was the repute of Christianity in those early times, everywhere spoken against. "The world knoweth us not because it knew him not." What can the followers of him expect who was himself despised and rejected of men but to be as he was, everywhere spoken against? Let us not wonder or count it a marvel if the world treats us as our Master was treated. How can it be otherwise if we are really faithful to him? Paul would not be cast down at such an assertion; he had long known that he had nothing to gain and nothing to expect from the world and the worldly Jews.

They appointed him a day (a day for which he and his friends would of course be much in prayer), there came many to him into his lodging, to whom he expounded and testified the kingdom of God, persuading them concerning Jesus both out of the law and out of the prophets from morning until evening. Paul knew it was an occasion which might occur once only in a lifetime, he would not waste the time of his hearers with his own words. Like the apostle Peter he believed in the incorruptible seed of "the Word of God which liveth and abideth forever," and in which, like the prophets of old, he searched diligently. Paul believed that God's Word came with God's authority, and thus he did not preach what he thought or what others thought but what God said. This is the kind of preaching that has a grip on hearts and consciences, and which pierces to the dividing of soul and spirit, of both joints and marrow, and is quick to discern the thoughts and intents of the heart."

The day wore away, but the untired student of God's Word was in his element. This was what he lived for; to have this opportunity in great imperial Rome, where the pulses of the world's life at that time had their centre, Paul had willingly endured his unrighteous imprisonment. From morning till evening, not with a little pocket Bible such as we have, but with the fragments in large parchment rolls which he had succeeded in bringing with him, and his richly stored mind, for the Word dwelt in him richly in all wisdom, he quoted the Word of his God. He "expounded" one Scripture by another, and "testified" from his own vast experience. Something must happen. After such light those Jews of Rome could never say they had not heard. Here as elsewhere the Spirit of God through Paul

Brought About a Division.

"Some believed the things which were spoken and some believed not." Under such light, neutrality ceased to exist: either this Jesus of Nazareth must be everything to them, or they must reject him. It was Paul's last testimony by worth of mouth to an exclusively Jewish assembly. He knew, better than they did, how much hung on their decision. Perhaps he knew already that in ten years time the temple, and Jerusalem itself, would be destroyed and laid desolate. He must give them a word of solemn warning. When they agreed not among themselves, they departed, after that Paul had spoken one word: "Well spake the Holy Ghost by Isaias the prophet unto our fathers saying: Go unto this people, and say: Hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and not perceive; for the heart of this people is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing and thine eyes have they closed; lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and should be converted and I should heal them." What it must have cost Paul with all his intense love for his people to speak thus we cannot know. He saw all that was involved and with prophetic eye he discerned God's position toward them and theirs toward him as a people, and God would not let him off from his position as the instrument of the Holy Ghost to convince them. Thus he added to his Jewish brethren: "Be it known therefore unto you, that the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and that they will hear it." There was no bitterness but unfeigned grief in the faithful old heart which wept over those whom he could not save against their will, but in it all Paul could be at rest in his God and trust his unerring purposes. The "apostle of the Gentiles having thus borne his testimony "to the Jew first" now finished his ministry "also to the Gentile." The same superiority to circumstances, the same divine nobility at all times which had distinguished Paul on board ship and commanded the respect and reverence of the centurion and all the company, made Paul also in Rome. For two years he had liberty to dwell in his own hired house and to preach Christ to all who came to him. Here as elsewhere this man of God led his life of faith, recognizing God in all which happened. He wrote during this time of imprisonment to the church at Philippi, not like one smarting under the injustice of man. On the contrary, he was so free in his God that he would cheer others who might be in sorrow on his account. "I would ye should understand, brethren, that the things which happened unto me have fallen out rather unto the furtherance of the Gospel; so that my bonds in Christ are manifest in all the palace and in all other places."

How wonderfully God works! Had Paul traveled to Rome simply as a preacher of Jesus of Nazareth, it is probable that the contempt in which the Christians were held would have made it impossible for him to come in contact with the court. Brought, however, as a prisoner, against whom neither Felix, Festus, nor yet Agrippa had been able to prefer a charge, the very singularity of the case, with the prisoner's own appeal to Cæsar, made it absolutely necessary that the Roman emperor himself should give Paul a hearing. Thus his bonds were known in all the palace, everybody had heard of Paul the prisoner; his trial was the talk of Rome, and thus the name of his Master was published, and Paul could pray believingly and could recognize God's working.

PAUL'S PRISON IN ROME.

PAUL was wrecked on the Island of Malta early in November 60. He remained there three months preaching and healing. Thence he and his fellow prisoners and their guard sailed at the beginning of the following February for Syracuse in the Island of Sicily, eighty miles distant. Luke, with his usual minuteness of description, records the name of the ship. After a stay there of three days, they sailed for the straits of Messina, another eighty miles. Rhegium, where they stayed one day, is on the straits. Passing through the straits, they sailed direct to Puteoli where the eventful voyage terminated. Brethren were found there, which showed how, even at that early day, about twenty-seven years after the crucifixion, the Gospel had spread. Paul stayed a week with them, his guard probably being glad of the rest after the voyage. They then began their land journey of 140 miles to Rome. The news of Paul's arrival had gone ahead of him, and some more brethren came from Rome to meet him and escort him to the city. On his arrival there, he was treated with consideration, possibly on account of his Roman citizenship, to which the favorable report of Julius, the centurion would be added. Even the most considerate treatment, however, involved his being chained to the soldier who kept him. The passage, which forms the subject of the lesson, covers the next two years of Paul's life. Luke closes his narrative abruptly. The only clues we have to subsequent events are supplied by incidental references in Paul's epistles. We gather from a remark in it. Timothy 4: 16, 17, that at his first hearing he was acquitted. Tradition has it that, being set at liberty, he made another missionary journey westward and eastward, penetrating as far as Spain. Returning, he went again through Asia Minor, was arrested at Ephesus and sent back to Rome, where he was beheaded in the summer of 66. It thus appears that from May 58 until June 63 Paul was a prisoner. To a superficial observer it would seem a sad interruption to his work. That five years of a life so active and so useful should be spent in prison does at first sight seem a mystery, but we can understand the mystery better than Paul's companions could. During his imprisonment, Paul wrote his letters to the Ephesians, the Colossians, and the Philippians, beside the personal letters to Timothy and Philemon. They have reached a wider field, have helped more Christians and done more permanent good than Paul could have done by his utmost effort. Like Bunyan in Bedford jail, Paul was shut up that by the work he did in enforced retirement future generations might share in the benefit of his labors.

Bound with this chain. Paul felt that being chained, or handcuffed as we should say, was a disgrace. He was anxious that the Jews should understand that he was not a criminal. His spirit was sustained by a clear conscience which enables men to bear many things which would otherwise be unbearable. A lady who visited Guy de Brez, the French Protesant minister, while he was in prison at Tournay, expressed her surprise that he could eat, or sleep while he was manacled. "Madam," he said, "my chains do not terrify or agitate me. The rattling of them is like music from a sweet instrument, because I am bound therewith for maintaing the liberty of the Gospel."

Expounded and testified. Both duties are necessary for the spread of the Gospel. There are many who cannot expound, but all who have felt the power of Christ can testify and so every one may help, however unlearned they may be. Many years ago a New Zealand Maori girl was brought home by a missionary to be educated. She took a deep interest in the civilization which she saw for the first time and her teachers were astonished by the quickness with which she adapted herself to the new surroundings. It seemed a pity that she should return to her native land. "Why do you wish to go?" she was asked. "You love this country, you enjoy its institutions, it suits your health. Besides, you may be shipwrecked on the ocean. You may be killed and eaten by your own people. Everybody will have forgotten you." "What!" she said: "Do you think I could keep the good news to myself? Do you think that I could be content with having got pardon, and peace, and eternal life for myself, and not go and tell my dear father and mother how they can get it, too? I would go if I had to swim there!"

Their ears are dull of hearing. There is a willfulness about this dullness that runs through the whole passage. It is not that the man is deaf, but he has voluntarily closed his ears. We often see this intentional deafness exhibited by people who are quick to hear what pleases them. If the process could be reversed and the ears be closed to temptation and evil and open to good, many a sin would be avoided. The best way to do it is to have the mind so full of good things that the evil cannot enter. When Ulysses sailed past the enchanted island where dwelt the Sirens, who had the power by their sorcerous symphonies, to charm all who heard their music, he took the precaution to fill the ears of his crew with wax, and binding himself to the mast, the alluring strains were without effect, and his barque held safely on her course. Thus, according to the subtle Grecian story, he was enabled to pass the fatal island without landing. But when Orpheus on his way to the Golden Fleece had to pass the dangerous shore, he, being a good musician, set up better music than that of the sea-nymphs, and enchanted his crew, who were therefore insensible to the alluring melodies of the Sirens. Thus, without resorting to the devices of Ulysses, he was able to pass the treacherous shore—not only safely, but with disdain. To be insensible to the voice of temptation is good: to out-sing it is better.

It is possible to resist the pleadings of affection so long that the ears seem deaf to all appeals. A letter from a wife to her husband was published a short time ago, so pathetic that it is a wonder that anyone could resist it; yet the man to whom it was addressed was heedless of it and went through drink to his death. The letter was found in the pocket of a man who, while intoxicated, fell over the railing of a balcony in a hotel in an Illinois town into the basement, fracturing his skull so that the physicians at once pronounced his injuries fatal. The following were the contents of the letter which was found in his pocket: "My Darling Husband: Remember, wherever you are, that you have a home, and a wife who devotedly loves you. If you are in trouble, and sick, you know where to come. Carry this in your pocket; and remember it is written by your dead baby's mother." How sad to think, with such a message of love in his pocket this man persisted in wickedness unto his death. And how truly he represents every sinner that perishes.

Salvation is sent unto the Gentiles . . . they will hear it. It is strange that the Jews should have rejected this Saviour of their own nation whom the Gentiles accepted; yet the same phenomenon is repeated to-day. People in Christian nations reject Christianity, while the heathen accept. A well-known English earl who was an infidel made a stay in the Fiji islands during a tour around the world. He was entertained by a Christian chief who in his youth had been a cannibal. The Englishman said to the old chief, "It is really a pity you have been so foolish as to listen to these missionaries. No one nowadays believes in the Bible, nor in the story of Jesus Christ and his Kingdom." The chief's eyes flashed, and he answered, "It is well for you that I accepted Christianity. If you had come here before we listened to the missionaries you would have been on the table in the form of roasted meat instead of sitting at it as an honored guest. Do you see that stone yonder? There we killed our victims. Do you see that native oven? There we roasted the bodies for our feasts. If it had not been for the missionaries, for the Bible, and the love of Christ, you would have met the same fate."

A Unique Evangelical Experiment in New York City and its Results—Preaching the Gospel to the East-Side Masses.

LIKE a vast bee hive, with its countless swarm of drones and workers, its infinite variety of occupation and its ever-ebbing and flowing tide of life, the Eastside of New York is ceaseless in its activity. Many nationalities, colors and creeds mingle there, and there are, alas! thousands in this human hive whose daily routine of drudgery and toil is unrelieved by any hope of the life to come. Their absorbing and pitiful struggle for daily bread leaves little opportunity for the development of their moral natures, and consequently there are many among them whose ideas of God, heaven and eternity are well-nigh as crude as those of the semi-civilized tribes of half-barbarian nations.

One of the most densely populated sections of New York is the Seventeenth Ward, which contains 107,733 souls. Poles, Germans, Hebrews, Norwegians, Irish, Spanish, Italians and Americans live there. To a stranger, who might casually find himself in this quarter, it might seem as though he had dropped suddenly into some far-off city, where people from all parts of the world were congregated. Some of the blocks in the Ward shelter over 3,000 persons. Hundreds huddle together in a single tenement. In one typical domicile of this class, twelve families were found living on one floor of less than a dozen rooms. In one room, four families were packed, each occupying a corner of the same apartment. One family had a boarder! Densely crowded as they were, they still contrived to find room for some poor, homeless one. The rooms and halls literally swarm with human beings of all sizes and ages, from the infantile toddler, to the bent and decrepit crone leaning on her staff. In midsummer, the noisome odors and torrid atmosphere drive them to the roofs, the fire-escapes and the sidewalks. No bee-hive was ever so uncomfortably crowded as one of those East-side tenements.

For some time past, a unique evangelical work has been conducted in the heart of this populous district, in connection with the Eleventh Street M. E. Church. This church, which is on East Eleventh Street near Avenue B., is only a few minutes' walk from Broadway, yet it is surrounded by an immediate population of at least fifty thousand persons of the class already described. Their moral and social condition is still more degraded by a superabundance of saloons, low wages (for those who really work), and exacting landlords who seemingly think it a futile task to clean or repair the foul tenements. It is a polyglot population, speaking nearly every known modern tongue, and revelling in ignorance and dirt. To interest this class and awaken their moral natures was the difficult task undertaken by Rev. Ernest L. Fox, Pastor of the Eleventh Street Church and his assistant, Rev. James N. Cox. After duly considering the best method of beginning work, and in view of the difficulty in persuading these people to attend any regular service, it was decided to establish an Open-Air Pulpit outdoors, with simple evangelical services and plenty of good music. In this project the two young workers had the active assistance and co-operation of the Rev. Joseph C. Thomas, one of the stanchest supporters and most generous helpers of the church. Mr. Thomas is a member of the New York Conference and has his Quarterly Conference relations with the Eleventh Street Church, with whose interests and progress he has been closely identified. Miss Valliers, a young city missionary, graduate of Rev. A. B. Simpson's Missionary College, undertook to aid the project by a misssion canvass of the district, in order to awaken interest among the women and children.

MISS VALLIERS, City Missionary.

The next step was the erection of a platform in front of the church and inside the railing. This was built last summer, and here services are held on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday evenings at 7-30 o'clock, and on Sunday evenings at 7:15, during the warm weather, and indeed as long as the temperature will permit. The services are simple gospel talks rather than sermons, and have proved effective in bringing many hearers to a deep conviction of sin and ultimately to salvation. The Open-Air Pulpit has demonstrated its efficacy as a means of reaching and interesting the masses of the East Side. The attendance at the services is invariably large and has steadily increased since these meetings were begun in July of last year. Some of the individual results may be briefly mentioned: One young man and his wife who lived almost opposite the church and who, at first, made a mock of the services, were induced to listen. Soon the husband came regularly and was an earnest hearer. He has since declared for Christ, with his household. Another young man who, through drink, had lost his situation, came to the meetings. He was induced to quit the drinking habit, and has begun a new life under hopeful auspices—a thorough Christian. An artist attended the open-air meetings. He had been an unbeliever, but the simple truths he heard there sunk into his soul. During the summer he became sick, and soon found himself facing death, unconverted. He has been mercifully spared and has now given himself to the Lord. He is one of the most regular attendants at the Open-Air Pulpit services. Incidents of this character might be multiplied. Many of the foreigners in the district who have acquired a sufficient knowledge of English to listen understandingly, have been brought under the influence of the Spirit through these gatherings.

Open-air preaching is not without its discomforts; in a district such as that described, the work of the evangelist is not always a bed of roses. Rowdyism occasionally breaks out to the annoyance of speaker and audience, and on more than one occasion missiles have been thrown at the speakers on the platform, fortunately without inflicting serious injury to any one. Despite all obstacles, however, the experiment is producing a marked effect in the neighborhood—working a genuine transformation. Disturbers are no longer numerous, as was the case at the beginning, and the audiences are as well behaved and orderly as those of any regularly organized house of worship. Occasionally, some Christian woman speaks from the platform. A great attraction is the singing, which Pastor Fox has taken special pains to keep up to a high standard.

The 11th Street M. E. Church was organized in 1866, and the church building was erected the following year. For several years it was under the charge of East Side City Missionaries of the Methodist Church. From the first, the mission work from that quarter has been productive of good results. In 1883 the church became voluntarily self-supporting. For many years it has been a mighty power for the propagation of the Gospel and the conversion of souls in one of the most densely populated parts of the metropolis.

The present pastor, Rev. Ernest L. Fox is a graduate of the Central New York University of Syracuse. He has had pastoral experience in Nebraska and came East several years ago, his first appointment in New York being that of Assistant Pastor of the Asbury M. E. Church, Washington Square. A year ago he was appointed Pastor of the 11th Street Church. Rev J. N. Cox, his assistant, is a native of Ontario, Can., and a graduate of the Brantford Collegiate Institute. He was a local preacher in Canada for some time, before coming to the United States where he took up regular pastoral work. In addition to his duties at the 11th Street Church, he is studying with a view to taking a regular theological course. Both men are still quite young, and have brought vigor, ability, and enthusiasm into their new field of Christian usefulness.

BURNING THEIR IDOLS.

Mrs. Hudson Broomhall, a missionary worker, in speaking of her first visit to China six years ago, says: "An old lady came to visit us at Ta-ning, in Shan-si. We got some little instruction into her head, but as far as we knew, nothing had gone into her heart about the Lord Jesus. After she had gone, my friend Mrs. Orr Ewing, and I knelt down, and asked that the Lord might give us her and others amongst the people. Well, we had not finished our dinner on that day before this old lady came back again, bringing her daughter-in-law, asking us to tell her what we had said. Our language was limited, but she went away with a few clear ideas, that idolatry was sin, that there was only one true God and that opium-smoking was also a sin. Some weeks after, this old lady came to ask us to go to her house to destroy her idols, saying that she had never, since the day she first called, worshipped them. This was the first time we had the great joy of destroying idols in China or seeing them destroyed. Then we also saw a great number of opium smokers brought to the Lord." Miss Sarah Jones, speaking of her journey to Wan-hien, says: "As I was staying at an inn, three women came in, and one of them said, 'Now, teach us a prayer, teach us something to say when you are gone.' I tried to teach them a prayer; and the three together said, 'Let us kneel down, and you teach us again how to pray on our knees.' I think that was the only time I was ever asked by Chinese women to kneel down with them. We all knelt down and prayed. When they were going away they looked at me, and said, 'What is the use of your coming like this, one after another, teaching us a few words, and then going and leaving us? When will you come back again?'"

ABOUT MINISTERS.

MANY Christians are left in hot water because they believe everything they read about ministers. It was said that Rowland Hill advertised he would on the following Sabbath make a pair of shoes in his pulpit, in the presence of his audience, and that he came into the pulpit with a pair of boots and a knife, and having cut off the top of the boots, presented the pair of shoes. It was said that Whitefield was preaching one summer day, and a fly buzzed around his head, and he said, "The sinner will be destroyed as certainly as I catch that fly." He clutched at the fly and missed it. The story goes that then he said that after all perhaps the sinner might escape through salvation! Thirty years ago the pictorials of London were full of pictures of Charles Spurgeon, astride the rail of the pulpit, riding down in the presence of the audience to show how easy it was to go into sin; and then the pictorials represented him as climbing up the railing of the pulpit to show how hard it was to get to heaven. Mr. Beecher is said to have entered his pulpit one warm day, and, wiping the perspiration from his forehead, to have said, "Its hot!" with an expletive more emphatiic than devotional! Lies! All of them lies. No minister of the Gospel escapes. One week night in our chapel, at a Christmas festival, amid six or eight hundred children roaring happy, with candies and oranges and corn-balls, and with the representation of a star in Christmas greens right before me, I said: "Boys, I feel like a morning star." It so happened that that phrase was to be found in a negro song, and two days afterwards it appeared over the name of a man who said he was "a member of a neighboring church," that I had the previous Sunday night, in my pulpit, quoted two or three verses from "Shoo Fly!" And, moreover, it went on to say that we sang that every Sunday in our Sunday School! And as it was supposed that "a member of a neighboring church" would not lie, grave editorials appeared in prominent newspapers deploring the fact that the pulpit should be so desecrated and that the Sabbath-schools of this country seemed to be going to ruin.

Years ago, I wrote an article denouncing the exclusiveness of churches, and making a plea for the working classes. In the midst of that article there were two ironical sentences, in which I expressed the disgust which some people have for anybody that works for a living. Some enemy took those two ironical sentences and sent them all around the world as my sentiments of disgust with the working classes, and a popular magazine of the country, taking those two ironical sentences as a text, went on to say that I preached every Sunday with kid gloves and swallowtail coat (!), and that I ought to remember that if I ever got to heaven I should have to be associated with the working classes, and be with the fishermen apostles, and Paul, the tent-maker. To this very day, I get letters from all parts of the earth containing little newspaper scraps, saying, "Did you really say that? How is it possible you can so hate the working classes? How can you make that accord with the words of sympathy you recently have been uttering in behalf of their sorrows?" A few years ago I preached a series of sermons on good and bad amusements. There appeared a sermon as mine, denouncing all amusements, representing that all actors, play-actors, and actresses were dissolute without any exception, and that all theatrical places were indecent, and that every man who went to a theatre lost his soul, and that it was wrong even to go to a zoological garden, and a sin to look at a zebra. I never preached one word of that sermon. In the State of Maine, a religious paper had a letter from a clergyman who said that I came into my pulpit on Sabbath morning with Indian dress, feathers on my head, and scalping-knife in my hand, and that the pulpit was appropriately adorned with arrows, and Indian blankets, and buffalo-skins; and the clergyman, in that letter, went on, with tears, to ask, "What is the world coming to?" and asked if ecclesiastical authority somehow cannot be evoked to stop such an outrage. Why do I state these things? To stop them? Oh, no. But for public information, and as literary curiosities.

HUMAN NATURE.

PEOPLE go to all sorts of corrupt places for the purpose of studying human nature. But there are plenty of opportunities of learning all about the heart and character without exposing ourselves to any kind of peril. What advantage is it for any one to sit down in an audience, and look upon the impersonation of knavery, of libertinism, of unrelenting revenge, that looks out from behind the curtain upon sleeping innocence, and the knife that the murderer lifts, all dripping with the blood of the victim? If you want to see knavery, go look at it in prison chains. If you want to see uncleanness, go to the hospital, and look at the pile of agony and putrefaction. Do you want to see revenge? Before you get through with life, some one will take after you, abusing you, slandering you, persecuting you, even unto death, and you will find out fully what revenge is. If men must study these things, let them take a police officer and go down through the dens of the metropolis, and see at midnight, vice, and loathsome bestiality and festering abomination, and breathe the sickening stench that comes up from the cellar where humanity wriggles in filth, and rots alive, and rends out its heart in torture, and blasphemes God, and dies. By the time you get through life you know more about human nature than you want to. There are multitudes of people who understand the world, its passions, its ambitions, its trickeries, its sources of power, its misfortunes, and who can touch the key of any emotion, and at will play the high notes of gladness, or the deep tones of woe, without ever having gone to any questionable school. But remember that hundreds of men are ruined by city exploration. They go to see for themselves. A man hears that lions are very dangerous. He says, "Is that so?" He opens the cage; and the monster with one stroke fells him, and with one crunch grinds up his skull. The lion never imagined that the man had come in to study natural history. Oh! the devil is mean. He says, "Come in and see." The man goes in to look for himself: the roaring lion grabs him, and he is gone. He learns human nature dearly who learns it at the risk of his immortal nature.

L. L. Sowles, West Rosendale, Wis. What is the Associated Press and what is its address?

It has been consolidated with the United Press. Address the latter at Western Union Building, New York City.

Answers to the inquiry of "Reader, Centre Point, Tex.," have been received from L. L. Sowles, West Rosendale, Wis.; L. E. Thompson, Evansville, Ind.; C. E., Denver, Colo.; Mrs. George M. Powers, Leominster; M. E. Cravath, Audubon, Minn.; M. B. Freeman, Dover, N. J.

Reader, Ailsa Craig, Ont. "In reference to the sermon of the 30th of July on 'Jephthah's Vow,' the vow was that whatsoever came forth from his house to meet him, should surely be the Lord's, and he would offer it up. The margin gives 'or' in place of 'and'. The vow might thus read: "Whatsoever cometh forth from my house to meet me shall surely be the Lord's; or, if suitable, I will offer it up as a burnt-offering."

J. Mickle, Fort Scott, Kan., writes: "Will you kindly correct a misstatement in an article entitled 'Typical Western Sunday Schools' in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for July 19. The statement is made that 'the school house at Fort Scott is a log hut without windows,' etc. Fort Scott has half a dozen large brick school houses, besides the high school, and the Kansas Normal College, an ample, well equipped institution and we also have thirteen churches and several missions."

Chaplain Bateman, U. S. Army, Ft. Assiniboine, Mont., writes: "I desire to thank the kind friends, whose names I do not know, for the numerous extra subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD which have made it possible for me to distribute each week many copies of this useful journal among the soldiers of this garrison. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is the most helpful religious paper for hospital, guard-house and barracks with which I am acquainted. The clear-cut illustrations reinforce the lessons of sermons, editorials and stories in a most wholesome and striking way. You will confer a favor by presenting my thanks to the soldiers' unknown benefactors."

Francis Cuvler, Syracuse, N. Y. What are the seven wonders of Korea?

1. A hot mineral spring near Kin Shantao, which cures diseases. 2. Two wells, one at each end of the peninsula, one full the other empty; the water of one bitter, that of the other sweet. 3. A cold cave from which issues an ice-cold wind which a strong man is unable to stand up against. 4. A pine forest which cannot be destroyed. 5. A hovering stone in front of a palace; two men can draw a cord underneath it without encountering any obstacle. 6. A stone on the summit of a hill, which evolves a glowing heat. 7. A "sweating Buddha" in a great temple, in whose court no grass grows.

Edward Crump, Erie, Pa. 1. What classes of mankind did the rich man and Lazarus respectively represent? (Luke 15: 19.) The account does not say the rich man was a wicked man, or that Lazarus was a godly man, the only logical conclusion to be drawn from a liberal interpretation it seems, would be this: that if a person dresses well and has enough to eat in this world eternal torment will be his doom in the next; that in order to gain an entrance into heaven, he must be destitute and full of sores. 2. What is meant by the impassable gulf?

1. The premises being misinterpreted, the wrong conclusion is unavoidable. In the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, the object was to illustrate the result of neglect of duty in commiserating and relieving the sufferings of others; to show how wealth hardens the heart, shuts up the springs of human sympathy and makes the possessor selfish and indifferent to the wants of his fellowmen. Riches that are used only for our own aggrandisement and gratification become a curse, while the man who employs his wealth in dispensing aid and comfort to those around him and relieving the distressed is a blessing to the land in which he lives. This was the distinction which the Saviour drew in his parable of the division of the sheep and the goats, when the King repudiated those that stood on his left hand with the words: "Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these ye did it not to me." (Matt. 25: 45.) Nothing can be clearer than that it was the Saviour's intention to emphasize by these parables the divine law of love and sympathy which he came to teach the children of men by his own example. 2. The "impassable gulf," is a figure employed by the Saviour in describing the eternal separation of the good and the evil in the future life. In his parables and discourses, in order to impress upon the minds of his hearers the central objects of the lessons, he invested them with such natural and harmonious surroundings as the subject and the occasion demanded; and to interpret such surroundings literally would be as futile as to translate literally any of the multitudinous passages, full of similar imagery, that abound in oriental oratory.

Reader, Bayfield, Ont. Will there be more than one resurrection? In 1 Thess. 4: 16, 17, the resurrection of the dead in Christ and the rapture of living believers are spoken of. What will become of the wicked dead?

There are to be two resurrections. The fact is stated explicitly in Rev. 20: 6, 7. They are to be a thousand years apart, separated by the millennium. Paul alludes to the same fact when he speaks (Phil. 3: 11) of his hope that he may attain to the resurrection from among the dead. The wicked dead are raised at the end of the millennium for the final judgment.

Inquirer, Akron, O. If a wife gives her husband cause to secure a divorce on the Scriptural ground and he does not avail himself of it, but leaves her and she subsequently obtains a divorce from him for desertion, and marries again, is he justified in marrying again?

We do not know what the husband's position would be under the laws of Ohio. A lawyer could tell you. From a Scriptural and moral standpoint we believe that the husband would be perfectly justified in marrying. His wife's crime and her divorce combined, set him free of his former marriage.

S. L. C., Columbia, Ky. What is the best way of leading an inquiring Jew to Christ?

If he is an Orthodox Jew, there is no better way than by showing him how completely Christ fulfilled the prophecies. If he belongs to the Reformed Jews, you may deal with him as you would if he were not a Jew at all, showing him his need of a Saviour and the power of Christ to save. If you address a letter to Rev. Jacob Freshman, St Mark's Place, New York, who has had an extensive experience in evangelistic work among Jews, he would doubtless give you advice dealing with any difficulties the Jew may raise and suggest to you books especially adapted to his case.

H. E. Dell, Quakertown, Pa. Why did Christ object to the man mentioned in Matt 8: 21, 22, going to bury his father?

Let us ask you a question. If Christ were here now and you were privileged to be in his company for a short time, how would you answer any one who invited you to a funeral, or to any other ceremony which would take you away from Christ? Would you not feel that nothing was so important as for you to hear all he said and see all he did? You would feel that such ceremonies as funerals might be left to people who were still in the world, who had not been enlightened and who were as dead spiritually as a coprse is naturally. That was what Christ expected his disciples to feel.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

RELIGIOUS RIOTS IN INDIA.

REPORTS of a dreadful riot and massacre come from Bombay, the second city of India. Two religious festivals, one Hindoo and the other Mohammedan occurred in the same week, and the rural processions came into collision and there was a fierce fight in which a large number on both sides were killed. Efforts were made by the police and soldiery to suppress the disorder, but they failed; several mosques were sacked and burned and the whole city was for a time in the control of the rioters. The soldiers protected the public buildings; stores and factories were closed and the European residents kept within doors. Order was not restored until troops arrived from Poonah and marines from the gunboats in the harbor and preparations had been made to shell the native quarters. This trouble is of periodical occurrence. Usually the Hindoo and the Mohammedan regard each other's religious observances with contemptuous tolerance, but when, owing to the fact that the Mohammedan ecclesiastical year is shorter than that of the Hindoos, the festivals of the two religions occur at the same time, the latent hatred and animosity burst into flame. The Hindoos of the city number about half a million, while the Mohammedans are only a third of that number, but are more fierce and bigoted. The latter exasperated the Hindoos by publicly slaughtering a cow, which the Hindoos regard as a sacred animal, and the Hindoos retaliated by defiling a mosque, by throwing a dead hog into it. The government in order to prevent further disorder compelled the processions to proceed by different routes and planted cannon in front of the mosques to overawe the Hindoos who were organizing for their destruction. It is hoped that these measures will prevent further bloodshed. The government can do nothing more than meet force with force. The real and only effectual cure is that which the missionaries preach, the grace of God which can change the heart, replacing hate with love. (1. Cor. 15:9, 10.)

Sailors' Food for an Emperor.

The descriptions of the recent regatta at Cowes on the English coast, which were cabled here, mention a suggestive incident of the visit of Emperor William of Germany. It appears that when the sailors on board his vessel were about to sit down to their mid-day meal, a man went to the bridge, where the Emperor was. He carried a bowl of soup, which he offered to his majesty with due solemnity. The Emperor ate some of it and the man retired. This ceremony, it is stated, takes place on board all ships in the navy. A specimen of the food furnished to the sailors is always taken to the captain of the ship, or in his absence to the chief officer on deck who tastes it to test its quality. As the Emperor was for the time the captain of his vessel, he performed the duty himself. The object, of course, is to ensure the sailors being supplied with proper food, properly cooked, and even the Emperor did not disdain to adopt the personal means of testing it. The courtiers of the European monarchial press who are lavishing praise on him for his condescension, perhaps have not heard of or have forgotten the act of One infinitely higher than he, who "by the grace of God tasted death for every man." (Heb. 2: 9)

Compensation for Marriage.

A curious suit has been set for trial in a New York Court. The plaintiff sues her mother-in-law for damages resulting from her marriage. She states that when the man who is her husband proposed marriage she refused him. She was in business as a dressmaker and was earning a fair income. The young man was persistent in his suit and assured her that he could support her in comfort. She had some doubts of his ability to do so, but he told her that he was earning sufficient for their needs and that in addition his mother would give them a seven-thousand-dollar house, furnish it, and give them ten dollars a week toward their expenses. The lady asserts that she asked the young man's mother if she would do all these things and that she promised that she would. On that understanding she gave up her business and married her suitor. She says that her mother-in-law has not given them the house nor assisted them in any way, that her husband is incapable of earning an income and she has to work for their joint support. After waiting vainly for the fulfilment of the mother-in-law's promises she left her husband and brought suit for damages. The mother-in-law denies that she did more than promise to leave the young couple her house, in her will and states that she understood the lady was marrying her son because she loved him. That ought to have been her motive, but by her own confession it would appear that she was chiefly attracted by the sordid considerations. Marriage, like religion, ought to be based on pure motives and when people take up the one or the other for the sake of gain they deserve to be disappointed. (1. Tim. 6: 5.)

Stole His Own Goods.

A strange charge is made against a dealer in dry-goods at Toledo, O. The general depression in business combined with the difficulty in negotiating loans has caused embarrassment to many merchants through the country and in the case of this man resulted in failure. He made an assignment to one of his creditors, and the assignee finding that there was no hope of the debtor resuming business, sold the estate. But when the purchaser went to take possession he was surprised to see a large shrinkage in the stock. Only old-fashioned, shop-worn and faded materials were on the shelves and all the saleable goods had disappeared. A search was made and some of the goods were found in the debtor's private house and the remainder had been sold by him to various customers. The debtor was accordingly arrested on the charge of stealing the goods. The situation is a novel one, as the goods he is charged with stealing were formerly his own property. When he removed or sold them he ignored the fact of his assignment, as by that deed they were no longer his own to dispose of. The Christian who has given himself to Christ should be careful never to make a similar mistake. Judging by the way some spend their time and labor and withhold their money from Christ's cause, there is ground for suspecting that they have forgotten the terms of their self-surrender. (1. Cor. 6: 19, 20.)

A Snake in a Cradle.

The wife of a lumberman living near Lake Charles, La., had a thrilling experience recently. She was busy one morning about her domestic affairs, while her babe, six months old, slept in a cradle near the open door. Happening to pass near the cradle she stopped to look lovingly on her sleeping child. To her horror she saw a line of mottled green and black nestled close to the infant and the ugly head of a rattlesnake resting on the soft flesh of the baby's arm. Its eyes were open and were drowsily watching the child. Her natural impulse was to scream, but the fear of disturbing the snake restrained her. She ran to the drawer where her husband kept a loaded pistol and securing the weapon returned immediately to the cradle. The snake had not moved, but she knew that it was on the alert and the slightest motion would cause it to bury its fangs in the child's arm. Nerving herself for the effort she clutched the snake by the tail and with a quick jerk landed it on the floor. The snake made at her, sounding its dreadful rattles and rearing at her. She sent a bullet through its body, but without killing it. She fired again and again and at last, struck its head and the snake lay dead. When her husband returned to the house, he found her in a swoon on the floor with the dead snake beside her, while the child lay in its cradle, unharmed, but terrified by the pistol-shots and crying bitterly. It may be hoped that as the child grows older its mother will exercise similar vigilance and courage. She will need to do so, for her child will be assailed by enemies as dangerous to its moral nature as the snake was to its physical nature. Unhappily these enemies are not so easily recognized and the wine glass, the theatre, the pernicious book or some other deadly evil works mischief unobserved. (1. Sam. 3: 13.)

The Celestial Elements.

A recent communication from Prof. Campbell of the Lick Observatory to the San Francisco Chronicle, shows that the great telescope, with its lens, thirty-six inches in diameter, and its spectroscopic attachment is revealing secrets relating to the celestial bodies hitherto unknown. Referring to the comet visible a few weeks ago, the professor says that since its appearance and examination through the spectrocope facts as to the composition of the comets have for the first time became known with certainty to the scientific world. It is now definitely known that a comet is composed of incandescent carbon and nitrogen, and that it shines by its own light. Another discovery relates to the new star discovered about two years ago in the constella-Auriga. The spectroscope on the telescope disproves the theory that it is a true star, and proves that the Russian astronomer, who pronounced it a nebula, is right. It appears that with this instrument the elements composing even the distant stars can be ascertained. When the rays of the star pass through the spectrum a series of bands of color as in the rainbow are produced. These are intersected by lines which according to their position among the colors indicate the presence and preponderance of some element, one result showing hydrogen to be the most important element, another, iron, another shows tin, and so on with other elements. It has thus become possible to learn from the light given by any heavenly body what metals and gases it contains, and the proportions of each. The same fact applies to human character. Christ intended each of his people to shine as lights in the world, and it is possible to know by the quantity and character of the light they give whether love and faith and peace exist in them. (Matt. 5: 16.)

KALBADEVIE ROAD, BOMBAY, INDIA, THE SCENE OF THE RIOTS.

In Peril of Starvation.

A schooner left San Francisco on August 18 to rescue two men, who are on a lonely coral reef near the equator. Sometime ago, a company dealing in phosphates, acquired possession of Cliperton Island, a coral reef which is covered with rich deposits of guano. They sent two men to take possession of the place, on their behalf, but the men found that there was nothing that they could eat on the island. It was an absolute desert and they refused to stay unless provisions were left with them. They were supplied with enough food to last them ninety days and were promised that before the end of that time a ship would be sent to their relief. One of the men seems to have had some doubt of the company keeping its promise, for he wrote a letter to a friend in San Francisco, which he sent back by the ship that took him to the island, telling him of the circumstances and asking him to see that a vessel was dispatched to their relief in time. This friend finding that no relief was being sent, published the letter and called public attention to the men's peril. A schooner was then hastily provisioned and dispatched to the island. The ninety days will, however, have expired before it can reach the place and it is feared that the men must suffer hunger if they do not starve to death. The company had evidently forgotten them and the man who provided for such a contingency was justified in his fear. That can never be said of those who trust God for their souls, as these men trusted the company for their bodies. We have abundant evidence that they who believe on him "shall never be put to shame." (1. Peter 2: 6.)

BRIEF NOTES.

To any one of our readers who will send us the names and full addresses of twenty-five church officers, church members, or Sunday School workers, we will send a beautiful section of Olive-Wood cut from the Mount of Olives, polished by native workmen in Jerusalem and bearing on its face in English and Hebrew characters the name of the Holy City.

The odium and loss of money he has incurred have disgusted him.

The appointment of Rev. William H. Noyes as missionary to Japan, has been revoked by the Prudential Committee of the American Board, Mr. Noyes has already done four years' valuable work in Japan, and his appointment was unanimously requested by his associates in that country. THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

THE FORMIDABLE WEAPON.

Sermon Preached last Sunday, Aug. 27, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.

Text: "For the word of God is quick, and powerful and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of the soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart." Heb. 4: 12.

THE Bible is now in the furnace of trial, and the furnace is heated seven times hotter than it is wont to be heated. We have no fear, however, for the divine Word. The Bible is quite used to harsh treatment. It has been overthrown in the minds of its hostile critics, so often that their judgment is not to be taken as conclusive in this regard. Some one has said that the Bible is a cube, and so is always of the same height, however often it be overturned. The intellectual giants in the past attempted in vain to destroy the truth of God; the pigmies of the present shall certainly not accomplish what they failed to achieve. It is interesting, amid the Babel of modern criticism, to know what inspired writers thought and said of the inspired Word. We have in this text an admirable statement of a Bible writer's opinion of the Bible, to whose perfection under the divine Spirit he contributed his part. What does the Bible think of itself? We have heard what the critics think of Moses and Isaiah. It would be instructive to know what Moses and Isaiah think of their critics. It is certain that when Moses was living, neither in Pharaoh's palace nor on the field of battle, were men ready to attack him. If he were now living some of his critics might be more modest in their assertions and less forward in their attacks.

Destructive Criticism.

Mere destructive criticism is worthy of but little respect. In no other sphere can the minimum of talent so certainly secure the maximum of notice. A child or an idiot with a knife or a hammer let loose in a gallery of paintings or a hall of statuary, can destroy more in an hour than Angelo or Raphael could create in a lifetime. Destructive criticism requires but little ability and has but little utility. At times it may have a brief mission. It may awaken curiosity; it may evoke inquiry. Many a minister can attract no attention by earnestly expounding the Gospel; but the same man by attacking the Gospel and denouncing recognized beliefs, will have a brief notoriety in the secular and religious press. By once hurling a hymn-book from his pulpit at the windows of the church, some pastors would attract more notice than by their ordinary preaching for a score of years. But mere destruction is unworthy the ambition of a noble man and the attainments of a broad scholar. God often rules destructive work, however, for the establishment of his truth. The opposition of Porphyry in his day called into the arena many defenders of Christ and his Gospel. The attacks upon Christianity in our day have only served to show the solidity of its deep foundations. Let no believer be alarmed; let no one feel obliged to steady the ark of God; God will care for his word and his work. The business of the pulpit is to preach the truth and not to apologize for God and the Bible. A pastor is engaged in a sorry labor when he is simply unsettling the beliefs of men, and robbing the Bible of its authority and beauty. A man of this character may have some sphere of usefulness, but it is certainly not in the pulpit or Church of God.

The Sharp Instrument.

Whoever the author of the epistle to the Hebrews was he had an exalted conception of the character and influence of the Word of God; and that conception he has expressed in language as beautiful as it is forceful, and as lofty in its rhetoric as it is logical in its reasoning. His purpose in this text is to show that God knows every act of our lives and every thought of our hearts. All forms of untruth- [illegible] taught, will be exposed to God's piercing sight. It is impossible for men to deceive the Almighty. His gaze is all-penetrating; his knowledge goes to the bottom of the soul; he will uncover men to themselves and to the sight of an assembled universe. Only as our sins are covered by the righteousness of Christ, or washed away in his precious blood, can they be hidden from the sight of God. His omniscience is a truth as sublime as it is solemn.

What are we to understand by the phrase "the Word of God" in the text? Does it mean the threatening referred to in the previous verse? So some have said. Does it mean the gospel as a whole? So some have said. Does it mean the whole range of divine revelation; does it mean the Lord Jesus, the essential and eternal Word? Although this title is not given to him in this connection, he is in the highest, the fullest and the Word of God. The meaning here will include all these truths. The Word of God is whatever God has spoken, whether in promise or prophecy, whether in threatening or in doctrine. God's truth goes to the depths of the soul; it uncovers the secrets of every life. What are the characteristics of this Word as here given? The first characteristic named is that it is "quick." This word is a translation of a Greek word which literally means "living." This now almost obsolete Saxon word retains its natural meaning in the expression, "cut to the quick" and in similar uses still current in daily speech. It suggests here that the Word of God is alive with vital energy. This characteristic certainly belongs to the Word of God. It is living in itself, and not cold, formal and dead. It is the active, energetic and living truth which God evermore speaks. Speech is sacred; speech possesses individuality; speech is immortal; language is a living original; language grows and is not made. Humbolt considers language not as a dead product, but as an animate creature. He affirms that man is differentiated from the animal kingdom by the faculty of speech. Men and God alike use words. Language stands related to thought as the body does to the soul. There is a moral quality in words. There never can be pure speech except it come from a pure heart. Language wraps up histories and prophecies. Language give us fossil poetry and verbal ethics. If these things be true of human speech, how much more significant is the speech of the Almighty! Not only are God's words quick but they are quickening; they are not only living but they give life. The word of the living God is a living and enlivening word. His word lives forevermore. Whatever may die the Word of God must live. His truth is possessed of an immortal life. All other literature may perish but God's word shall endure forevermore. "All flesh is grass, and all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of the field. The grass withereth, the flower fadeth; but the Word of our God shall stand forever."

The Mighty Utterance.

We learn also that the Word of God is "powerful:" that it is energetic, instinct with force. It lays bare the secret feelings of the heart; it awakens the fears of the most careless of men; it sternly arouses the conscience; and at times it lifts up its voice until the awful scenes of the judgment day pass in review before the eyes of guilty men. It causes the sinner to see the great white throne and to hear the awful words of the eternal Judge. God's truth is now controlling all the great events in the political and moral world. God's word is girdling the world. His truth makes thrones tremble and totter; it makes tyrants quake and fear; it gives freedom to the slave, and makes earth a training school for heaven. Believe me, men and women, when the Spirit of God takes the Sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, then that word is powerful [illegible] to comfort saints. It is so powerful that it can pull down the strongholds of sin; that it can make the lame to walk, the deaf to hear, the dumb to sing, the blind to see, and the dead to live. The hammer of God's truth can break in pieces the most flinty heart; it can shatter the refuges of lies behind which men seek protection; it can batter down the walls of Satan's kingdom, and on the ruins thereof erect the everlasting kingdom of God's dear Son. This word comes down as the rain and snow from heaven but returns not thither. It never goes forth out of God's mouth in vain; it ever accomplishes that which he pleases and prospers in the thing whereunto he hath sent it. When Christ spoke one word the centurion's servant was healed. God's word hath penetrating, healing, illumining and illimitable power to-day. Let us believe in the omnipotence of divine truth; let us possess our souls in patience. God will magnify his word above all his name.

A Devouring Flame.

The third characteristic is thus stated — "Sharper than any two-edged sword." Commentators call attention to the fact that the word translated two-edged literally means a two-mouthed sword. It is easy to understand how this idea is associated with the word sword; the sword is thought of as devouring all before it, and thus its edge comes to be spoken of as a mouth. The sword was conceived of as a terrible beast which destroyed all antagonists. The power of God's Word is thus set forth by this striking figure. Similar language is elsewhere used in Scripture concerning the Word of God. In Isaiah 49: 2, we read, "He hath made my mouth like a sharp sword;" and in Rev. 1 :16, "Out of his mouth went a sharp two-edged sword." Similar language is found in still other portions of the Bible regarding the penetrating and irresistible power of God's Word. It cuts both ways; it enters where no other sword can enter; it dissects as is not possible to any other instrument. It will cut the hand of the man who uses it unskilfully; it is a dangerous weapon to have used against us. By this Word we are to be judged, and by it justified or condemned. If it be on our side, no weapon formed by man can prosper against us; if it be against us, no weapon formed by man can protect us. What the two-edged Roman sword did to the bodies of the foes of Rome that this sword does to the foes of Jesus Christ and his kingdom—"piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow." God's Word will go straight to the heart, to the very centre of motive and action.

When soul is distinguished from spirit as here, we understand by the former word the lower faculty while by spirit a superior power. The word soul means the animal life as distinguished from the immortal life; the word spirit refers to the element in our complex being. We have in Scripture the threefold classification, "your whole spirit, soul and body." This threefold distinction we now constantly make. These three are mysteriously united in life, and to separate them is surely to cause death. The Word of God, the sword of the Spirit, penetrates the very heart of the sinner and slays him. The apostle Paul tells us that when the commandment came sin revived and he died; the law slew him; he was cut down under conviction, and fell pierced to the heart, and lay dying at Jesus' feet. The figure of the sword is still retained, and it is represented as reaching the joints and marrow and as discerning the thoughts and intents of the heart. God's truth will uncover every hypocrite. It enters irresistibly into the soul. Some have supposed that the apostle was arguing from some tremendous punishment which came upon the ancient Israelites, that he is speaking of the Word of God as producing effects like lightning of fire from heaven.

Not only does this wonderful Word discern the thoughts but it reaches even to the half-formed intentions of the soul. It strikes below the sphere of our conscious thoughts into the realm of half-formed intentions, and we are judged in the sight of God according to our

Character and Purposes.

Many men have been conscious of this property of God's Word. When it has been faithfully preached, and they have been deeply convicted, they have often charged the preacher with having knowledge of the most private events in their lives. Some have supposed that their neighbors gave information to the preacher. Frequently in my own ministry have I had experience of the power of God's Word in these respects. These results were due to the energy of the divine Spirit using the holy Word as its two-mouthed sword. Every true Gospel ministry has witnessed similar effects from the faithful declaration of God's truth. God's Word is a hammer and a sword; and the preacher needs skill and strength for its right use. The hammer will not break the rock in pieces nor the sword pierce to the joints and marrow unless both hammer and sword are directed by a trained hand, a skilful mind, and a consecrated heart. God help us to know how aright to use these divine instruments! Wonderful language is here employed. When a man is so pierced by this sword he dies. Oh, blessed truth! Oh, divine sword! God grant that the slain of the Lord may be many this day! God grant that the divine breath may then come to the slain that they may live, as a great army of witnesses and soldiers for God!

The last characteristic of the Word of God is that it "is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart." This thought I have already touched upon, but it is worthy of fuller presentation. Here the Word is represented as going through the chambers of the soul as with a lighted candle, or more strictly speaking, the thoughts and intents of the heart come forth into conspicuous view by the Word of God. God's truths in their true character; it brings to light their forgotten sins. They see themselves more nearly as God sees them; and their motives now appear in all their sinfulness. Evils whose presence they did not suspect are now seen in all their vileness. God's Word, like the sun at noonday, floods their souls with its heavenly light, and men are then startled at the Satanic hostility to God which they discover in their own hearts.

There are lessons which we may learn from this discussion. Unconverted men and women, let God's Word have its perfect work in your hearts. Remember that the day of revelation is coming. This world's acts will then stand out as stout witnesses against you. All that we have thought and felt will then be known to God and to the world. We are distinctly informed that by our words shall we be justified or condemned. No man could endure to have his neighbor know him for an hour as God has known him for his lifetime. Did men know themselves as God knows them they would be ready to condemn themselves as guilty in the light of their own conscience. We ought all to let God's Word have its perfect work in us as fire to consume the dross, as a light to guide our steps, and as the voice of God summon us to duty.

Students of God's Word, appreciate its worth as never before. It is clamoring for recognition in the colleges of the country. It is securing its place as in many of the most honored colleges. Shall men study Homer for his poetry, and refuse to study the inspired Psalmist? Sophocles for his dramas, and refuse to study the mysterious and sublime Job? Shall men study Plato for his philosophy, and not the Apostle Paul? Shall men study Herodotus for his history, and pass over the matchless histories of this unique book? Believe in your deepest souls that the Word of God is adapted to convict, to convert and to sanctify the soul. Remember that at its bar the race shall be judged; remember that when all its critics are forgotten it will still remain as the sublimest and divinest book the world has ever known. The names of some of its fiercest critics in the past would never have been heard by the people of to-day, but for their association with its immortal life, and with that of its divine Lord.

Teachers and preachers, learn the importance of knowing of the Spirit." You must know the qualities of this divine sword. It is the choicest sort of a blade. You must be quick of eye and supple of wrist. The sword needs a trained and courageous soldier to wield it. The soldier ought to know enough of anatomy to know the vulnerable parts of his foe. The surgeon must not cut at random; the farmer must not cast the seed on fallow ground if he expects a harvest. The physician must not prescribe medicine without making a careful diagnosis. So you must study the needs of men, you must believe their great need, their fearful hunger and their lost condition; then you can apply God's Word to supply their want, to feed their hunger and to reveal Christ as the Saviour of their souls. God in heaven, make us wise in winning souls for Jesus Christ!

How to Use "the Sword

Many men have entered the arena to tilt against the Bible, and lately especially against the Pentateuch. Pharaoh strove against Moses and he sank like lead into the Red Sea. Jannes and Jambres, the Egyptian magicians, "withstood Moses," and they are named only to show their defeat and humiliation. Lucian, Celsus, Porphyry and Julian the Apostate were the leaders of the opposition to Christ and his Church in their respective generations. Prophyry was, without doubt, one of the most brilliant opponents which Christianity has ever had. He was a peerless heathen polemic. He moved boldly into the arena; he was resolved to dethrone Jesus Christ. He anticipated many of the critical methods which are common in our day; but these men would be utterly forgotten were it not that they linked their names even in opposition, with that Name which is above every name. Jesus Christ is King. From his watch-tower in the heavens he rules this world. His pierced hand is on the helm of the universe. Men have, in their own opinion, been constantly engaged in overthrowing the Bibles; but the work has to be constantly repeated. Never did any other book have such vitality. It constantlp confronts its foes with new elements of power. It never was mightier than it is to-day. It has overthrown many forms of heathenism, and is now moving forward, with head erect and step triumphant, to the conquest of the world. Let ns rejoice in its glorious characteristics, living, energetic, piercing and discerning. God help us to use, obey and love this immortal book!

THE RESULT OF A BROKEN PROMISE.

At a recent Gospel meeting in London, a Mr. Kirkpatrick said: "It is now about thirty years ago since I was converted in the City of Dublin. Immediately after my conversion I made a vow to God that I should devote £500 a year to his service. I was making a good income at the time, and could have done so easily, but I did not keep my vow. I gave to the Lord's work as I have always done even before my conversion, but I fell short of what I had promised my Lord to give. What was the result? When I would not render to God a part of what he had given me, he stretched out his hand and my business withered; less and less grew my income until I could not have paid my vow even if I had wished. I am now making a comparatively small income, and I put it all down to my unfulfilled vow. God asks no one to bind himself with a vow, but if a vow be made, God insists upon its payment."

A MOSLEM CONVERT'S FAITH.

Some time ago an old Mohammedan Moulvie, an Afghan who was accounted a saint by the men of his village, was brought to believe in Christ by a long train of circumstances. After his conversion, Dr. Martyn Clark asked him one day if he had ever heard the gospel before he came to Amritsar. "Yes, once," he replied, "about forty years ago, I had a friend called Dilawar Khan. I heard he had become a Christian, and I went five days' journey to curse him, and I did. Now Dilawar Khan before his conversion, was a man who would have cut your head off on the slightest provocation, and yet he sat still and said nothing. At last I shook him, and said, 'Why don't you say anything?' He said, 'I act as a Christian.' Then he told me of Christ, and I cursed him till I could curse no more, and all he said was 'Lad, I have a beard, thou hast none. The Lord will yet have mercy on thee, though it may be when thy beard is not only as long as mine, but white;' and this day, is that saying of Dilawar Kahn's fulfilled, the Lord had mercy on me."

SOWING AND REAPING.

WOULD you reap in harvest time
Sheaves of golden grain?
Plant good grain in planting time,
'Twill all come back again.
Seeds are like their harvest,
Rain and heat and cold
Will show what you have planted,
Increased a hundred-fold.

Would you reap in harvest-time
Sorrow, pain and snares?
Sow wild oats in sowing time,
Briers, thorns and tares.
Seeds of much or little worth
You are free to choose;
Fruits of heaven or fruits of earth
You may win or lose.

Plant the Gospel far and wide,
Faith and hope and love;
Then rich harvests that abide
You will reap above.
Seeds are like their harvest,
Rain and heat and cold
Will show what you have planted,
Increased a hundred-fold.

WAITING FOR HIS COMING.

ARE you waiting for the coming
Of the blessed Son of God,
He who once a weary wanderer
Through this vale of sorrow trod?
Are you listening for his footsteps
In the distance drawing near?
Have you oil within your vessels—
Lamps well trimmed and burning clear?

Are you waiting for his coming?
Listening for the midnight cry?
Does your light shine clearer, brighter,
As your absent Lord draws nigh?
While you're waiting for his coming,
Are you telling all around
Of that blessed peace and pardon
That alone in Christ are found?

Are you waiting for his coming,
Ready to be caught away,
In the costly robes he gave you
Shining for the perfect day?
If you're waiting for his coming,
Work and watch, and wait and pray,
Looking for him, though he tarry,
With glad heart from day to day.

The Lord's Warnings.*

Two Predictions Referring to Two Distinct Events Which are Often Misunderstood.

WE have three important discourses on future events, which were given by our Lord recorded in Matthew 24, Mark 13, and Luke 21. Some Christian students believe that they all refer to the siege of Jerusalem which took place in A. D. 70; others believe they refer to the time of the end when Christ will appear. A close examination of the subject has led the writer to the conclusion that it is a mistake to apply any part of Christ's prophecy, as related by Matthew and Mark, to the overthrow of Jerusalem. If this can be established the prophecy becomes relieved of difficulties which may be said never satisfactorily to have been cleared up. Let it be, therefore, supposed that only Luke records those words of Christ which relate to the Roman siege. It is believed that the setting up of the Abomination of Desolation and the warning to flee (as given by Matthew and Mark), and unparalleled tribulation, cannot any of them have been fulfilled at the fall of Jerusalem, and, on the other hand, that the leading sign, that which determines the time of the rest, viz., the standing of the Abomination of Desolation in the Holy Place, is, by our Saviour himself, distinctly connected with his Second Advent, It is a noteworthy circumstance that Luke does not give as a sign to flee the setting up of the Abomination of Desolation but gives another: "When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies." History allows of no doubt as to this sign, that it was both observed and acted on by the Christians of Judea; but there is a great difference of opinion, even among those who maintain that the Abomination of Desolation was set up at that time as to what particular act might be regarded as the setting up.

We must not lose sight of the condition that it was to be a sign to flee; and that, therefore, it must have been exhibited (if at all) in some significant and striking manner before the city of Jerusalem was so surrounded by the armies of Titus as to render escape impossible. This consideration disposes of the supposition that this setting up was fulfilled when, after the city was taken, the standard of the Roman army was planted on the temple site; for a sign to flee then would be but a mockery to those who had already undergone the horrors of the siege.

It will not be out of place to inquire what was the idea attached by the Jews themselves to the phrase, "Abomination of Desolation," and what they regarded as a planting of it in their holy place. In 1. Maccabees, we find an account of the placing of an idol on the altar of God by Antiochus Epiphanes, and it is called the setting up of the Abomination of Desolation (1: 54), and it is generally supposed also that this was a fulfilment of Dan. 11: 31. In narrating the same events, Josephus says: "And when the king had built an idol altar upon God's altar, he slew swine upon it" (Ant.: Bk. 12, chap. 5). We thus see that the Jews regarded the building of an idol altar upon God's altar as a setting up the Abomination of Desolation. We may gather also that they did not so regard a mere desecration, let it have been ever so violent and unwarrantable. All which leads to the conclusion that no event took place at the siege of Jerusalem which can be regarded in the twofold character of a sign to flee, and a standing of the Abomination of Desolation in the Holy Place.

This conclusion will be strengthened when we come to compare the warnings to flee, as given by Matthew and Mark, and by Luke, and note their difference. The encompassing Jerusalem with armies was to be a sign to the disciples, first, "that the desolation thereof was nigh." We know how literally exact was the accomplishment of this prophecy; and are we not justified in expecting an accomplishment as exact of the prediction in Matthew and Mark! It was to be, secondly, a warning to persons in three different circumstances. Those in the midst of the city, that they should depart out; those in Judea, that they should flee to the mountains; those that are in the countries, that they should not enter thereinto. Let us now look at the standing of the Abomination of Desolation in the holy place as a sign, and at the warnings associated with it, and remark their dissimilarity to those in Luke, and in some particulars, their inapplicability to the circumstances attendant on the Roman siege of Jerusalem.

THE GREAT APOSTLE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Sept. 10. Acts 28: 30-31; 1 Cor. 9: 16-27

APART from the direct teaching of the great Apostle to the Gentiles, there is much in the personality of the man to arrest the attention and incite to study. A more extraordinary man the Church has never produced in all its history. Everything he did was unique and original; and Christian theology to this day bears the impress of his mind more conspicuously than of any other. Although he never saw Christ in the flesh, he caught his spirit more perfectly than those who had been with him and listened to his teaching. Until Paul arose, Christianity was a mere Jewish sect and so it might have remained had he not emancipated it and given it a world-wide application. The earlier Apostles clung to Judaism to the last; but Paul perceived that the old bottles could not hold the new wine and he ruthlessly tore them to pieces and flung them aside as things that had served their purpose, but were now obsolete. Judaism had been only the schoolmaster to the generations to bring them to Christ. In the new light of Christ the heir had come of age and needed the schoolmaster no longer. We know how his boldness shocked the older Apostles. He never had their full confidence. James wrote against him and Peter contented himself with saying that Paul's epistles contained "things hard to be understood." The simple, honest fisherman was bewildered by the problems in which Paul's cultured and subtle intellect delighted. And then Paul did not show the Apostles the respect to which they might naturally have thought themselves entitled. After his conversion he, sought no instruction from them, but worked out in solitude his own system of theology. After three years he went to Jerusalem but he stayed with the Apostles only fourteen days and he maintains a significant silence about the value of what they imparted to him. In his preaching and his epistles he plainly shows that he attached little importance to Christ's outward life and teaching. He seldom quotes Jesus, or refers to his miracles, even when he might have done so relevantly and with confirmation to his argument. He seizes on the facts of the incarnation and the vicarious death and triumphant resurrection of Christ and around and upon them he built his theological system. It was Christ himself that he preached, Christ the Son of God, the Saviour of the world. He conceived of him as the head of a spiritual kingdom in which men of every race and clime might become citizens. It was Christ's own conception and Paul harmonized it with the ancient traditions. The sacrifices had been good, but here was a Sacrifice which superseded them all. The law had been valuable and might still serve a useful purpose antecedent to conversion; but afterward the law was only a fetter. Types and ceremonies were mere shadows; Christ was the substance. The initiatory and [illegible] in Christ's kingdom was faith in him. All else might be left to the working of that faith. If the inward change had taken place the outward life would be right. That was Paul's conception and the Church has vindicated it.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

A convention of the Chapters of Penfield, Litchfield and Belden in the Cleveland District was held recently at Penfield, O. An excellent series of reports from the various Chapters represented showed that the organization was thorough and in vigorous operation. Several papers were read and then the Convention adjourned to the grove near the church for refreshments. The afternoon session was occupied by the Juniors, and in the evening Dr. J. E. Stubbs preached. A consecration service closed the proceedings.——The Epworth Herald announces that the constitution of the "Epworth Guards" will be ready for distribution in a few days. Although the organization is semi-military in character, it is not proposed to prescribe expensive uniforms and arms. The necessary equipment will be simply a regulation cap and cane. The pledge insists upon total abstinence from liquor and tobacco and absolute purity of speech and life. The organization, rightly conducted, will interest an army of Methodist boys, and assist in promoting pure Christian manliness.——The annual State Convention of Iowa Epworth League is to be held at Webster City, November 1-3. Rev. Francis J. Norton of Rockford, Ia., is in charge and is expecting a large attendance of delegates.——At Hebron, Neb., the League has fifty members enrolled and the effect produced on the church work by the efforts of these consecrated young people is plainly visible. The meetings have been continued through the summer.——One of the most successful of the State Conventions held this year was that held recently at Ocean Grove by the Conference League of New Jersey. The early meetings were held in the Young People's Temple and in the evening the League had possession of the great Auditorium. The many eloquent speakers gathered at Ocean Grove this summer were present in force and charmed the delegates with their oratory. The musical exercises were in charge of Rev J.C. Westwood of Long Branch. Miss Marsh of Paterson presided at the organ and solos were sung by Mrs Howard of Matteawan and other friends. A reception was held at the Arlington Hotel at the close of the Convention.

A CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR SETTLEMENT

The University settlement idea is not copyrighted and the devoted men and women who are working with it in many of our great cities are the kind of people who will be glad to hear of its extension. That extension has been attained through a Christian Endeavor Society in Baltimore and as its principles are in harmony with the principles of the Society the Baltimore example is likely to be followed in other cities. Rev. E. A. Lawrence, whose church has taken the imative in the matter says in describing the effort, that the young people of the C. E. Society in his church had grown discontented with the work they were doing at long distance and wanted to engage in missionary work nearer home. They went into the tenement-house district and organized a special Endeavor Society under the charge of a "tenement committee." The Endeavorers were warmly welcomed, and mission rooms given them free of rent. The pastor took up rooms in the tenement district, and, with a university student, established there the beginning of a Christian Endeavor settlement. He took charge of their meeting once a week. Crowded classes for sewing and drawing were organized. Every evening was music, and pleasant social chats. There was soon a wide-awake boys' club. Later came the beginning of a girls' club. A night school sprang up. The children gave access to the parents. Twenty-five or thirty persons were engaged in this work, each giving usually one evening a week. A most hopeful beginning has been made, which will undoubtedly grow into greater things. Christian Endeavor Societies which are looking around for new spheres of work would do well to make a note of this Baltimore experiment, for it is full of hope and will yield rich fruit.

THE B. Y. P. U. VICE-PRESIDENTS.

The recent International Convention of Baptist Young People's Societies at Indianapolis followed the example of its predecessor at Detroit, Mich. in electing three vice-presidents, representing the various sections. These gentlemen, whose portraits appear on this page, are Mr. Frank Harvey Field of New York, Rev. George B. Eager, D.D., of Montgomery, Ala., and Mr. A. A. Ayer of Montreal, P. Q. They have all been prominent in the movement from the beginning and Mr. Field has already held the office a year, having been elected at Detroit in 1892. If the Union continues growing a the rate it has hitherto maintained the Convention of 1894 will need to extend its list and elect vice-presidents represent the Northwest and Southwest. Although there was no regular organization of the Union until 1891, when after a year's work the first Convention assembled at Detroit, there is now a State organization in every Northern State except Maine, and in the four Southern States of Arkansas, Maryland, Missouri and Texas, beside the Canadian Unions of Ontario and Quebec. These States are represented respectively on the Board of Managers and the movement has been started to have each State elect, or at least nominate, its representative on that Board. So far they have been nominated by a committee at the annual Convention and elected by the Convention, but as the Founding Fund is now growing to considerable proportions, it is felt that a more satisfactory course would be for each State to choose its representative.

GROWTH AND WORK.

At the recent gathering of King's Daughters at Chicago a graphic and vivid sketch of the growth and labors of the Order was given by Mrs. M. L. Dickinson the General Secretary. In the course of her address she spoke of the origin of the "sisterhood of service, founded by an original "Ten," who sought thereby to "develop spiritual life, and to stimulate Christian activities;" of the wish of its founders that it might be an organization whose motto should be "Much work and little talk." She said: "We began in 1886 with ten members. Before the end of the year we were fifteen hundred. November, 1891, showed a list of 170, 642, and its seventh birthday saw the new, strange army 200,000 strong. It would only be possible to give any adequate record of the Order's efforts by inviting the Recording Angel into this Congress and extending his time beyond the tap of the warning bell. We can give but a glimpse of the character and strength of the Order, and its great place among the regenerative influence of our day, with a glance at the activities through which it seeks to develop its ideal."

Mrs. Dickinson spoke of the various Chapters of the Order, of its three fields of Home Life, of Individual Character, and of strengthening and Supporting the Churches. In all, the Order has done a widely extended and noble work, entirely apart from its field of outside philanthropies. Within not much more than the last two years, it has either founded, entirely supported or materially aided, more than two hundred institutions, including Hospitals, Day Nurseries, Infirmaries, Boys' Homes, Old Ladies' Homes, Orphan Asylums, Seamen's Homes, Seaside Shelters for Children and many others.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The Women's Christian Association of Philadelphia has received $13,862 toward the cost of its new building.

The total membership in the Young Men's Christian Associations of London, England, is 11,684, as against 10,770 for last year.

A Young men's Christian Association has been organized at Great Barrington, Mass. Ten thousand dollars have been raised for the first year's work and a general secretary will soon be employed.

The Railroad Y. M. C. A. of Port Henry, N.Y., has been the scene of some very successful Evangelistic meetings. The work has been under the charge of Donald MacColl, who was formerly Assistant State Secretary of New York. He has been assisted by two Princeton Students and the Bliss Quartet of Princeton College.

The Midsummer Rally of the Christian Endeavor Union of Brooklyn, N. Y., was held August 19, at the Gravesend Reformed Church. An address was delivered by Rev. B. Kerr Tupper of Denver, Colo.

By the invitation of Mr. Frank H. Field, the B. Y. P. U. of the Hudson River Association assembled at Round Lake for a general conference. The delegates received a fraternal welcome from the Methodiststs who make Round Lake their meeting place in the summer months.

The B. Y. P. U. of Brockton, Ill., has a list of non-church goers in the town and sends them at regular intervals through the mail invitations to attend the services at the church and has some of its members on hand to greet those who accept the invitations, and show them to seats and furnish them with hymn-books.

The Brooklyn, N. Y., Union of King's Daughters holds a prayer-meeting at the Wayside Home in Bridge Street on the third Saturday in every month at 3 P. M.

On a recent Sunday, two hundred and twenty young men with their relatives were present in the new building of the Paris Young Men's Christian Association. Addresses were delivered by Pastors G. Appia, Cordey, Theodore Monod, and others.

During the past year the Christian Endeavor Societies in Queensland have increased from seven to twenty-six, and the membership from 330 to 920. Denominationally they are divided into Presbyterian, 8; Congregational, 7; Baptist, 5; Primitive Methodist, 4; Wesleyan Methodist, 1; undenominational, 1.

The Christian Endeavor Societies of the Reformed Churches, have furnished sufficient money to build a Christian Endeavor Church at Edgerton, Minn., and are now asked to unite in building a "Christian Endeavor Church No. 2." The Rev. Wm. I. Chamberlain and his wife, at Chittoor, India, are to be the Christian Endeavor missionaries in the foreign field representing the Reformed Church. Mr. Chamberlain organized one of the first Endeavor Societies in India.

LITTLE DAMES AND MEN.

WE must all remember when
We were little dames and men,
When each sorrow tugged away with all its might
At our little hearts and eyes,
Till the air was full of sighs,
And the brightest day was turned to darkest night.
How we'd weep,
How we'd creep
To our little beds to sleep,
With wet lashes on flushed faces; even then
Not a soul would ever know
Half our agony; and so
We would sympathize with little dames and men.

We must remember when
We were little dames and men,
When we meet the little ones from day to day.
A kind word is just as cheap,
And it sinks to depths as deep
As the harsh one you were sending down their way.
If you knew
How a few
Gracious words and acts from you
Were planted in their souls, to blossom when Golden days of childhood seem
To be shadows of a dream,
You would love and cherish little dames and men.

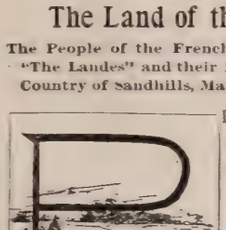
The Land of the Stilts.

The People of the French Department of "The Landes" and their Peculiar Ways—A Country of Sandhills, Marshes and Bogs.



PERHAPS no part of Europe is so little known or visited as that section of France which was once the old English province of Aquitaine, but is now known as the Department of the Landes, on the margin of the Bay of Biscay. Its very name furnishes the reason for its isolation and neglect, for Landes means "waste land,"—approximately, marsh, moor, or desert. It is little better than a Sahara, consisting chiefly of long lines of sand dunes or low hills covered with a growth of stunted pines, with great valleys of soft sand lying between, and with heather-covered marshes and bogs. Every tempest carries with it great clouds of sand which fall upon the scattered villages, the woods and the tree-topped dunes, making the region still more of a wilderness. And so, every succeding generation witnesses this once populous and prosperous part of western Europe made less capable of supporting human life, and brings it nearer to the time when it must be abandoned to the sand, the wind and the waves.

Nowhere on the continent does the student or the tourist find more striking examples of primitive manners than in the Landes. It is a desolate region whose people wage a continuous warware against adverse natural conditions. It is not an uncommon experience for them to find after a storm, that their little gardens are all sandblown, and their grazing grounds obliterated. To feed their flocks they have to keep constantly moving about, frequently going long distances in the yielding sand or through marshes to secure good grazing ground. Pine trees have been planted in every available spot with a view to arresting the process of destruction, but though these have succeeded to some extent, there are still immense barren tracts of level land, where little grazing can be found. It is a common sight in the Landes to see a shepherd mounted on wooden stilts, tending his flock, and guiding them from one grazing ground to another. The Landais shepherd is a picturesque figure Dressed in homespun, with the broad, flat cap of the French and Spanish peasant of a century ago, and with an outer garment of goatskin, the shepherd stalks through the marshes "like a giant flamingo." He can dance upon his stilts, run races on them, and with the aid of his long staff, he can even go safely to sleep on his mid-air perch. He usually spends his time in knitting or working at some rude piece of carving. His lunch basket and water bottle slung at either side, he is proof against hunger and thirst for many hours. Although his stilts may go deep into the marshes, he finds little difficulty in extricating them, and his altitude keeps him free from malaria.

To an expert on stilts, distances that would appal the pedestrian are trifling. His leisurely walk is faster than a footman can run. Indeed, his wooden legs become a second nature to him, as he learns to use them in childhood. He is postman, herdsman, or hunter, as occasion requires, and his wife and daughters are equally expert on the stilts. The pose to an artistic taste, cannot be accounted a graceful one; but it is picturesque nevertheless.

Our illustration shows one of the Landais with his flock of sheep. In the distance is a woman approaching, also on stilts. The peasantry are very simple people, free from vice, law-abiding and deeply religious. They are musical, as a rule, and no more charming entertainment can be listened to by the traveler than the singing of a choir of Landais peasants, at evening, after the herds have come home and the work of the day is ended.

Spiritual Interest for Relatives.

Rev. L. F. Jones, a missionary at Killisnoo, Alaska, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: "There is at least one important lesson the civilized may learn from the barbarous or semi-civilized. And that is a concern for the spiritual welfare of relatives and friends. Speaking now more particularly of my own people—Americans, the members of families among the civilized seem to take little interest in one another's spiritual welfare. A man will speak to a stranger sooner than to his brother about his soul's salvation. Now with the barbarous and semi-civilized there is a deep religious concern manifested among members of a family for one another. At least this is so with the aborigines of Alaska. As soon as a native finds the way of eternal life, he longs and labors for the salvation of all his immediate relatives and friends. If he changes his religion, his utmost desire is that they should change theirs. So much so is this the case, that if you win a man to Christ or your religion, you will soon have all the members of his immediate family. He will plead with tears till he wins them.

"What a lesson there is here for our more highly civilized and refined people! How heathenish indeed is the lack of interest in the eternal welfare of our own flesh and blood!"

Korean Women.

Girlhood and womanhood in Korea, as in all other semi-barbarous countries, are surrounded by many restrictions and limitations. Girls seem to enjoy a pleasant childhood, but after the tenth or twelfth year they begin their life of seclusion. They must marry before the age of seventeen if they would avoid reproach. The young lady does not see her future husband until after the ceremony, the whole affair having been arranged by a professional "go-between" an old woman whose income depends upon her reputation for making successful matches. A native of Korea said to Dr. Underwood, a missionary, "You should make greater efforts to reach the women. I do not know how it is in other countries, but in Korea, get the women and you have the land." The women of Korea need the Gospel if ever the women of any land did. They have little to make life worth living, shut up as they are in their homes, with but few acquaintances, and almost never going beyond their own narrow women's quarter. Men cannot reach them, but to the women of America the door is open. There is no such word as 'home' in the Korean language, and there is no home life as we know it. The houses are merely living places. They are heated from beneath, flues being made under the floor, the fire-place and chimney being outside the house. The Koreans sleep on the floor, and in the cold season fuel is used to keep the sleeper warm through the night.

Origin of a Wedding Custom.

THROWING rice at weddings is a custom that reaches back beyond the oldest history. Like many other customs now followed by the Caucasian races, it had its origin in China. The Chinese Times gives this pretty story of its introduction: In the days of the Shang dynasty, 1500 B.C. there lived in the province of Shansi a sorcerer called Chao. One day a Mr. P'ang came to consult the oracle, and Chao, having divined by means of the tortoise diagram, informed the trembling P'ang that he had but six days to live. P'ang called in another doctor to make sure there was no mistake. The new adviser was Peachblossom, a lady sorceress. Her divination yielded the same as Chao's; in six days P'ang should die, unless, by the exercise of her magical powers, she could avert the catastrophe. Her efforts were successful, and on the seventh day great was Chao's astonishment, mortification and rage, when he met P'ang taking his evening stroll, and learned that there lived a greater magician than he. So Chao plotted against the life of Peachblossom. He sent a friend to her parents and he befooled them into believing that he had a son who was seeking a wife, and ultimately he induced them to engage Peachblossom to him. The marriage cards were duly interchanged; but Chao had chosen the most unlucky day he could select for the wedding; the day when the "Golden Pheasant" was in the ascendant. Surely as the bride entered the red chair, the spirit bird would destroy her with his powerful beak. But Peachblossom knew all these things. When the wedding morning came she gave direction to have rice thrown out at the door, which the spirit bird seeing, made haste to devour, and while his attention was thus occupied, Peachblossom stepped into the red bridal chair and passed on her way unharmed. And this is why all people now throw rice after a bride.

WOMAN, BEWARE!

IT is easier for a man to find a good wife than for a woman to find a good husband. This is a matter of arithmetic. There are very many more women than men. Statistics show that in Massachusetts and New York States women have a majority of hundreds of thousands. Why this is we leave others to surmise. It would seem that woman is a favorite with the Lord, and that therefore he has made more of that kind. From the order of the creation in Paradise it is evident that woman is an improved edition of man. But whatever be the reason for it, the fact is certain that she who selects a husband has a smaller number of people to select from than he who selects a wife. Therefore woman ought to be especially careful in her choice of life-time companionship. She cannot afford to make a mistake. If she make a bad job of marital selection the possibility is nothing but a funeral can relieve it. Divorce cases in court may interest the public, but the love letters of a married couple are poor reading except for those who write them.

A dog and a cat were once married. But they had lived in wedlock only a little while when they began to scratch and bite each other until all the dogs and cats of the neighborhood felt scandalized. The cat was advised by some of her friends, convened, we might say, on the roof of a neighboring wood-house, to sue for a divorce in the law courts. Three dogs were on the judges' bench—a Newfoundland, a shepherd dog, and a rat-terrier, but the Newfoundland presided. The case was called up. The galleries were crowded. It seemed that the family difficulty arose about what is the chief aim in life; the dog thought the hunting of foxes, and the cat the hunting of rats. While the trial was going on all the dogs and cats of the community neglected their work, and the foxes destroyed the chickens, and the rats despoiled the pantries.

A large amount of correspondence between the two litigants was produced and read. Private matters became public property. The daily papers had extra sale. The whole town laughed, and were demoralized. Both cat and dog were ruined in reputation. The jury, made up of six dogs and six cats who had not expressed any opinion on the subject previous to the trial, were charged by the great Newfoundland that if they found the dog guilty they must bring in a verdict for the cat; but if, on the other hand, they found the cat guilty they must bring in a verdict for the dog. After being in a room together, in which the jury fought like cats and dogs, they brought in a verdict that because of disparity in temper and incompatibility of disposition, cats and dogs ought never to be married.

CHAPTER V.

DANGERFIELD PARK.

THE family returned to Dangerfield Park [illegible] its loveliest. After dinner Guy, who had never seen it before, strolled out on one of its terraces to look at the old home of his ancestors, where his father had spent his boyhood.

"Well, old fellow, is it anything like what you expected?"

Guy turned quickly and in the fading light saw the tall, stalwart figure of his cousin Monk approaching, looking taller than its wont in the silver moonlight that was beginning to overpower the long afterglow lingering in the western sky.

"It is a beautiful old place, Monk. I do not think you said half enough about it."

"You see we were such children when we left, and I do not think we were fond of it as one would fancy, seeing we were born and brought up there. Our grandfather's presence was somewhat overpowering—it made life rather like that one might be supposed to lead in an ogre castle. I think we were all glad to get away to the stir and bustle of London: but it certainly is, as you say, a very fine old house. I did not do it justice in my memoirs."

The cousins, standing with their backs against the wide balustrade of the terrace looked at the long pile of mellow red brick building, standing out well in the soft glamor of the moonlight, and it was not strange that they looked with admiration and pleasure.

It was not a lofty building—indeed there was but one story over the ground-floor rooms along the main front, but what it lacked it lacked in height it made up in length, and the oriel windows and quaint little doors opening upon the wide gravelled terrace without, were too numerous to be counted upon a casual inspection, and the tangle of climbing plants that clambered over the old building very much at their own will, scented the air with a strong, sweet perfume. There were flower-beds, too, all ablaze with their summer bravery, and here and there a stately old cedar or a quaintly clipped yew reared its head, affording pleasant shadow from the noonday heat to anyone who cared to seek its friendly shelter.

"I'm glad you have got such a home, old fellow," said Guy after a long look. "I almost wonder you have kept away from it so long."

"You see my mother thought it better to let it during my minority. I believe it really was the best thing to do, for we were lucky in our tenants, and the property has been very fairly looked after in our absence. Anyway she has contrived very well for me from a pecuniary standpoint. I was very much surprised when I came of age to find out what a [illegible] I was."

"I think your mother must be a very able woman. I knew I was to have ten thousand pounds, but when I had my portion handed over, it was a great deal more than that. She had hardly made any deduction for what I had cost her all these years except my allowance at Oxford. She has been most wonderfully good to me."

"O, you are one of us, Guy: of course she would treat you the same as the rest of us. [illegible] have done, it is you and not I who should be master here. Sometimes I'm not clear what I ought to do. I don't see why you should suffer for what your father did."

Guy laughed in his insouciant way. "My dear fellow, don't talk rubbish. I've not the [illegible] and for nothing [illegible] self your own way. As for me, I should never settle down as contentedly as you will do. [illegible] yourself somewhere, which I shall never do," answered Monk, with a glance of honest admiration into the keen sensitive face of his cousin, "but all the same—"

"All the same you need not make a fool of yourself by talking nonsense. Ah, and here is Yolante—I think her ladyship will enjoy the change in our surroundings if nobody else does."

A tall, graceful girl, had stepped out upon the terrace and was bearing down upon them as they stood clearly revealed in the moonlight. "Her ladyship" was the not altogether inappropriate name which Guy had bestowed long ago upon his cousin Yolante, and the sobriquet had stuck to her as names will do when it is felt that they fit their object.

"Are you here, boys? Ah, you are wise. It is better out of doors than in such a night as this. Monk—how I have looked forward to this day—when I should see you in your own house—master of your own at last."

Monk laughed in his easy-going way. He was a great contrast to his ardent, fiery sister, yet she loved him with all the strength of her heart, and would fain have infused a little of her own spirit into him. She was far more ambitious for him than he was for himself, and was half irritated with Guy for carrying off all the prizes with such ease, whilst her hero plodded on contentedly in his wake, always doing respectably—more than respectably, actually well—but not evincing the slightest brilliancy, and only succeeding through the power of dogged application and steady hard work. Guy was a worker, too, but he could get up in a hour what it would take Monk a couple of days to master, and he read all kinds of things, not confining himself to the needful examination work alone, whilst Monk had all his work to get through that, and had not opened a book for years that was not in his regular course of reading.

He was a fine-looking youth, with a pleasant, open face, a fine figure, and plenty of strength and manliness, as well as abundant good nature. He was never known to be out of temper, or to speak a really unkind word to anyone, so that he made friends wherever he went, and enjoyed life in a wholesome unquestioning fashion that many of his associates found refreshing. If he did not trouble his head about difficult problems, it was not because he was shallow or careless: but he had not reached the speculative stage as yet. Life had always looked a simple and easy thing to him so far, and it was possible with such a nature as his it might so appear to the end of the chapter.

Guy was framed on a pattern altogether different. He was not so tall by a couple of inches as his six-foot cousin, and slightly, though very gracefully built, with a wiry muscularity and toughness that surprised himself and others more than once when they had been put to the test. He was light and agile in his movements, tennis-playing rather than boating and foot-ball having been his main relaxation, and his face was in keeping with his frame—quick, sensitive and varying in expression with every varying thought, the eyes ever alight with eager thirst for information, the keenest sense of humor glancing out of their liquid depths. The features were irregular, yet very attractive, and he had inherited the rich coloring of his mother, which sometimes suggested the idea that he might also have inherited the germs of the fatal malady that had wrought such havoc to her family and had carried her off to an early grave. Yet so far the lad had been strong and healthy, and had never known a day's illness, and there seemed no reasonable cause for anxiety on his account.

Yolante resembled neither brother nor cousin, nor indeed any other member of her family. Love of power was still as strong within her as it had promised to be in the days of her childhood, and her heart swelled with pride as she looked around her, on stately dwelling house and ground, and over the dark woods behind, in the thought that it was all theirs—all Monk's—and she laid her hand upon his arm and spoke with a subdued exultation.

"Do you remember it, Monk? I do—but O, how different it looks now. I never loved it in old days, but I shall love it now, because it is all yours—all yours."

But Monk was always prosaic in proportion as his sister grew exalted and "tall"—as he called it—on any subject. "Well, I suppose so, but as I was saying to Guy just now, I have a feeling that it ought all to be his. I wonder if there is any rational way of making it over to him."

It was spoken more in jest than earnest, and Guy laughed as he had laughed before: but Yolante's eyes flashed, and she turned upon him a look that was almost fierce in its gleaming intensity. "If you ever do anything half so mad, I will never forgive you," she cried. "Guy, why do you put such wicked thoughts in his head? They would never come there of their own accord. It is you who suggest everything."

Guy was too well used to these flashes on the part of Yolante to pay any great heed. He looked at her with provoking calmness, and as he did so he laughed again in the sudden, irrepressible way which often annoyed her, for she knew that he was laughing in part at herself, and at a train of thought which she could not follow.

"Monk," she said, turning her back upon Guy deliberately, "mamma's old friend, Dr. Northesk, has just dropped in to give her a word of welcome. I think she would like you to show up. Do you remember him? I knew him directly. He has hardly changed a bit."

"I've a vague idea that I shall know him when I see him. But you have a better memory than I, Yolante. Well, we'll go in and do the civil—come along, Guy."

"I shan't be wanted, shall I?"

"O, yes, you will. Old Northesk must have known your father. Besides you are one of us you know. Come on."

So Guy followed in the wake of his cousins, amused and interested in the life of this new home, which nevertheless he had an instinct he should not share in the same matter-of-course way that he had shared the old life in London.

The long drawing-room was lighted by many shaded lamps and a soft ruddy and golden glow pervaded it, lighting up its quaint elf-fashioned furniture and antique draperies, and illuminating very clearly the faces of the group assembled there.

Mrs. Dangerfield had changed but little from the day we saw her last. The handsome face with its clear dark eyes and firm determination of expression was hardly marked by a single fresh line, and the chief alteration visible was that the hair had turned very grey, and was crowned by a very becoming cap, that did not suggest the idea of widowhood.

There were three other occupants of the room besides the seniors. A dark-faced, studious-looking youth was buried in a book near to one of the lamps. He resembled Yolante in coloring, but had none of her beauty, being in fact the only plain member of the family, and the most intellectual of Mrs. Dangerfield's children. This was Fulk the second son. He was between eighteen and nineteen years of age, and was studying for the medical profession, for which he had always evinced a strong bent.

On a couch beside one open window lay Humphrey, a very delicate-looking lad of sixteen, and at his side sat his fair-faced twin sister, Cissy — his veritable shadow. Those two had never been separated since their childhood, and were wrapped up in each other. Humphrey suffered from a rather obscure spinal malady which had developed itself after a seemingly slight accident at foot-ball when he had been a small boy. He did not suffer much pain, but was obliged to keep a good deal to his sofa. Luckily his feeble strength was not the trial to him that it would have been to some boys. He had never cared very much for games and sports, and had preferred Cissy's society at home. They studied, played games, and read aloud together with perfect contentment. It never occurred to either to want other friends or playmates, and all the variety they ever craved they found in the periodic returns from school or college of Guy and Monk, to both of whom they were devotedly attached.

Dr. Northesk turned at the sound made by the entrance of the two cousins Yolante had been bidden to fetch, and he greeted Monk with heartiness and fatherly good-will, as an old man does a youth he has known from infancy: but Mrs. Dangerfield noted that his eye rested with more interest upon Guy, and even when the greetings had been exchanged and the party had seated themselves anew, that he could not keep his eyes for long from the bright interesting face of her nephew. And presently he turned and addressed him point-blank.

"You do not seem like a stranger to us—I think you will find many friends here. Do you know how like you are to your father? He was a very popular man here once."

"I suppose he must be almost forgotten by this time."

"Forgotten? Not a bit of it. He was not the kind of young man to be forgotten. I know one humble home where you will be almost worshipped from the first moment. Mrs. Dangerfield, do you remember the Stapleton family?"

Mrs Dangerfield's face put on rather a stern look. "I remember no good of them."

"Troublesome customers, eh? I have a sort of recollection that it was so. You could not do with them as tenants if I remember right? But they are still in the place, owning a small freehold property of their own. They at least will have a warm welcome for Guy. They are not made of the stuff that forgets."

Guy looked up with a bright inquiring glance, but Mrs. Dangerfield's face was more stern than was its wont. Dr. Northesk proceeded to explain his words. "Young Stapleton, as he was in your father's time, was the scape-grace of the place, and no one could do anything with him until Guy Dangerfield declared that there was good in the fellow, and took him on as his own groom. Well, he broke him in somehow—to the immense delight and gratitude of the parents, and on one occasion he saved his life, too—your father did—which added to the load of obligation. Stapleton's devotion became a sort of by-word in the place: but when your father left it he had to leave him behind, and with the rather irrational vehemence that is often found is people of his class, he espoused his master's quarrel, and the whole family turned against old Mr. Dangerfield and behaved so violently and badly that they had to be ousted from their little farm, and they have not been near the place since so far as I know. Stapleton, however, still lives in the village, and I am certain he will be delighted to get a sight of you. He may not be a very amiable character, but he is as faithful as a bull-dog or blood-hound—if that is any recommendation—and was a true friend to your father."

"I will go and see him," said Guy promptly.

"I will not have him about this place," remarked Mrs. Dangerfield with unwonted acerbity. "I have had enough of the Stapletons' insolence."

"I should not think he would be insolent now," said Guy with one of his bright looks of gratitude. "If he cares the least for me, Aunt Clare, he must care for you also. I owe everything to you, and I shall tell him so."

"It will not make the least difference. Prejudice is never overcome in those natures. You must do as you choose about encouraging him. I should recommend your having nothing to do with him—but you are your own master now."

Guy said nothing. He was not accustomed to this tone in his aunt, and he did not wish to commit himself either way.

Monk broke in with a question about Geoffrey, Cicely and Lucy, and the talk became general. Fulk put down his book and drew near to listen. "If there is a decent hospital in Fordringham," he said, "I might stay on here for a bit and study there and in this library. I shall go over and talk to Geoffrey one of these days."

But Yolante was more interested in other people, and asked after the Conways, and other friends.

"There is only Joyce left of the girls," answered the doctor. "The other sisters are married—Mabel to Edgar Wyndham, the eldest son of the Wyndhams of the Mire House. He came into a small fortune from his uncle, and is our county member now. They often come down here in recess. Geraldine is still at home. She will be glad to have some more neighbors."

"I never cared for Geraldine as a child," remarked Yolante. "She was such a little frightened silly thing."

"Nine years make changes in people," remarked the doctor smiling. "Little Geraldine Wyndham is rather a pet of mine."

And then after a little more desultory talk the visitor left, and the three lads walked with him as far as the park gate, liking the genial old man better than their mother seemed to do, for her face was unwontedly grave and stern as she went slowly up to the handsome room she remembered so well, and stood for several moments looking out into the moonlit world beyond the uncurtained window.

"Why did he ask so pointedly into Guy's age? And why did he seem so curious to know whether the grandfather had ever been aware of the existence of the boy? Is it—can it be possible that he knows anything—suspects anything? No, no, certainly not—it is out of the question. He would have spoken at the time if he had. Besides—what am I talking about? There is nothing to know."

An Apostle of Her Race.

Amanda Smith's Remarkable Career — Her Life a Spiritual Tempest—The Story of Her Gospel Work at Home and Abroad.

BORN in slavery, but doubly enfranchised, the noble woman whose portrait is given on this page has stood for wellnigh a generation as the spiritual apostle of her race, known and loved in many parts of the globe. Amanda Smith first saw the light of day at Long Green, Md., on January 23d, 1837. Her father, Samuel Berry, and her mother, Mariam, were slaves belonging to different masters, the father's master being Darby Insor, and the mother's Shadrach Green. They lived on adjoining farms and the masters and mistresses were kind people, who allowed the negroes a good deal of liberty. Amanda's father was a trusted servant, and his mistress reposed so much confidence in him that she allowed him to make articles on his own account and take them to market along with the farm products. Thus, by toiling day and night for years, he was enabled to buy his own freedom, and he then prepared to purchase that of his wife and children, five of the latter being born in slavery.

Miss Celie, the young mistress of the farm where Amanda's mother lived, was converted at a Methodist camp-meeting, and shortly afterward, while she lay dying, she made her parents promise that they would release Mariam and the children. To this the parents assented shortly before her spirit passed away, and thus the enfranchisement of Samuel Berry's family, for which he had so long toiled, was completed through Divine aid.

In her recent book, entitled: "Amanda Smith's Own Story," the writer relates with interesting detail the events of her long and active Christian life. The family left Maryland for Pennsylvania, where the children were sent to school. Her childhood was spent pleasantly enough amid the usual struggles incident to poverty, but the Lord was with the family and they steadily prospered. They were instrumental in aiding many run-away slaves who were hunted by tyrannical masters.

From a very early age, Amanda seems to have had deep religious convictions. Many good Christian people used to visit the humble home on the Pennsylvania farm, and it was a pleasure for the young girl to hear about the grand work that was being done by Christian heroes in different parts of the world, in bringing the nations to Jesus. In 1855, during a severe illness, she had a vision which she tells thus in her own language: "I saw on the foot of my bed a most beautiful angel. It stood with wings spread, looking me in the face and motioning me with the hand; it said, 'Go back,' three times, 'Go back! Go back! Go back!' Then, it seemed, I went to a great camp-meeting and there seemed to be thousands of people, and I was to preach and the platform I had to stand on was high above the people. It seemed it was erected between two trees, but near the tops. How I got on I don't know, but I was on this platform with a large Bible opened, and I was preaching from these words: 'And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me.' O, how I preached; and the people were slain right and left. I suppose I was in this vision about two hours. When I came out of it, I was decidedly better. When the doctor called in and looked at me he was astonished, but so glad. In a few days I was able to sit up, and in about a week or ten days to walk about. Then I made up my mind to pray and lead a Christian life. I thought God had spared me for a purpose.

This call—for so she construed it—seems to have affected her whole after life. Her chief pleasure was now in the service of the Master, and there was no one more energetic or enthusiastic at revivals and similar gatherings than the young girl. Her life was a daily life of prayer for increase of faith and freedom from sin.

She was twice married, her first husband being C. Devine, and her second husband, James Smith, a local preacher in Philadelphia. Both are dead, the latter having died in 1869. "Since then," she writes, "I have been a widow, and have traveled half way round the world, and God has ever been faithful. He has never left me a moment; but in all these years I have proved the word true, 'Lo! I am with you always, even to the end.'

> Sometimes 'mid scenes of deepest gloom,
> Sometimes where Eden's bowers bloom,
> By waters still, o'er troubled sea,
> Still, 'tis my God that leadeth me.

Impressionable and emotional to an extraordinary degree, Amanda Smith has experienced more turmoil and temptation than usually falls to the lot of women. Indeed, her life may be likened to a spiritual tempest for many years; but out of every trial, she came forth with increased faith and brighter assurance, more than ever eager to be useful in the work of the Lord. In November, 1860 she had a remarkable experience and was impressed with the conviction that she was called to go out to preach the Gospel. Since that time she has labored in many cities at home and abroad, in a multitude of churches in different parts of the Union, and at camp-meetings and similar gatherings.

MRS. AMANDA SMITH.

Amanda's stirring exhortations, her impassioned, characteristic singing, and the deep fervor of her prayers, soon made her a prominent personality at Gospel gatherings and the spiritual influence she exerted over her audiences proved that the Lord was blessing her work. She had frequently heard her parents and their friends discussing with great earnestness the Gospel needs of Africa, and now that she had reached mature womanhood, her interest in that field was so great that she decided to visit Monrovia, and to consecrate her daughter Mazie to the work of a missionary. Mrs. Smith went to England, where she received a most cordial welcome from Methodist friends. After taking an active part in evangelistic meetings in different parts of the United Kingdom, she set sail in 1879 for India, via Paris, Rome, Florence, Naples, and Egypt, and reached Bombay on November 12. Her evangelical experiences in India were exceedingly pleasant and she was listened to by large and attentive audiences at Bombay, Calcutta, Bangalore, Colah, and other places, and in her quaint, warm-hearted eloquence, she imparted to them, with great effect, the living truths of the Gospel.

Then came the much-longed-for trip to Africa. She landed at Monrovia in January, 1882, and made a very thorough tour of a large portion of the Liberian Republic, speaking to numerous audiences, and being everywhere cordially received by whites, Afro-Americans and natives. Sierra Leone, Grand Canary, Old Calabar, Bassa, and many other places were visited, and altogether Mrs. Smith regards her African experience as one of the most pleasant of her eventful life.

In a brief sketch of this character, it is impossible to do more than merely outline the work of this remarkable servant of Christ, whose life is crowded with instances of rare Christian devotion and self-sacrifice, and whose strong and enduring faith has carried her over every obstacle to success as an evangelist, especially among people of her own race and color. Amanda Smith commands the love and esteem of thousands on both continents, who have listened to her simple, straightforward, earnest invitation to take up the Christian life, and it is unquestioned that multitudes have been benefited and many souls brought to know the Saviour through her humble instrumentality.

COURAGE RECOGNIZED.

An African evangelist named Mzimba, who has been laboring at Lovedale in Livingstonia, recently told an English audience that a dispute over a common cooking vessel was the means of opening the way of the Gospel in his district. He said: The first missionary had among his few belongings a three-legged pot, which he found very useful. A chief of that place coveted that pot, and after throwing out various hints, ended by plainly asking the missionary to give it to him; for he saw how easy it was with such a pot to boil meat and to cook food. But the missionary, who had already given the chief beads, and cloth, and other presents, would not give up his pot, as it was his only cooking utensil. The chief tried to persuade him to part with his treasure, but he was firm. The missionary perceived that it would be necessary to make a stand somewhere and the sooner it was made the better. Then changing his tactics, the chief said, "I must have that pot. If you will not give it to me, then sell it to me, for I must have it." Alone as the missionary was, he would not yield, but held his ground. Becoming exasperated, the chief exclaimed, "I go, but I will return to-morrow. See that you have made up your mind to give me the pot." Next day he duly made his appearance, accompanied by all his councillors, and all fully armed. Stalking into the place, the chief exclaimed, "Now, give me the pot, or I will kill you." The missionary felt that he was completely in the power of the heathen, but knowing that if he once yielded to threatening he would have no peace, and confident that God would uphold him, he would not give way, but replied, "No, you may kill me, but I will not give up my property. I am not afraid to die." The chief looked at the intrepid speaker and saw that he was not afraid to die. Astonished, he hesitated, then said, "I will let you go, but you must tell me how it is that you do fear to die, for with one thrust of my assegai I could kill you." The missionary told him that he had no fear, because he was trusting in God, and for him to die was only to go to a better state. The wonder of the heathen warrior was increased, and he wished to know more of that God who made a man fearless of death. Prior to that incident the natives had regarded the preacher with a kind of contempt, but after that had become noised abroad, they came to see and to hear the words of the man who was not afraid to die.

CONVERTED BY A BIBLE LEAF.

A YOUNG shopman once took up the leaf of the Bible, and was about to tear it in pieces and use it for packing up some small parcel in the shop, when a pious friend said, "Do not tear it; it contains the word of eternal life." The young man, though he did not relish the reproof, folded up the leaf and put it in his pocket. Shortly after this he said within himself, "Now I will see what kind of life it is of which this leaf speaks." On unfolding the leaf the first thing that caught his eye were the last in the book of Daniel: "But go thou thy way till the end be: for thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of thy days." He began immediately to inquire what his lot would be at the end of the days, and the train of thought thus awakened led to the formation in him of a religious character.

AN EVANGELIST IN EXILE.

A Russian, who had endured one term of exile in Siberia, on his return was required by the police to sign a certificate which said, "I bind myself to preach no more." He refused to sign, and was at once sent back to Siberia. He went, and after a short time God gave him an awakening in his exile, and he wrote quite overjoyed to his friends, "I have now fifty persons who serve the Lord with me. Hallelujah!" Here is a man who went "bound in spirit" to Siberia: not holding his life "of any account," so that he might accomplish his course and the ministry which he "received from the Lord Jesus, to testify the Grace of God."

Columbus and Jamaica.*

N the 25th of Sept. 1493, Columbus left the Bay of Cadiz on his second voyage of discovery, and on the 3d of May, 1494, while sailing in a southerly direction from Cuba, he came in sight of "the blue summit of a vast and loftly island at a great distance, which began to arise like clouds above the horizon." Two days later—or possibly on the following day—he anchored in the harbor off the town, now known as Port Maria, on the northern coast of Jamaica. Some slight resistance was threatened by the native Indians who flocked in their canoes around the strange Spanish ship, but they were soon appeased and Columbus anchored in the harbor, which he thought the most beautiful of all he had seen and to which he gave the name of Santa Gloria, a name which can hardly be said to have survived its bestowal. Leaving his anchorage to seek more sheltered waters, Columbus put out to sea and sailed a few miles in a westerly direction to Ora Cabecca, now written Oracabezza. The landing was not effected without opposition and protest on the part of the natives, who were treated to a shower of arrows from the Spanish cross-bows, and terrified into confused flight by a huge bloodhound, keen to scent human blood. On reaching the shore, Columbus, in the name of Ferdinand and Isabella, took formal possession of his new discovery, which he called Santiago, though it has always been known by its Indian name of Xaymaca, modernized in spelling and pronunciation into Jamaica. A few days sufficed to repair his ships and to establish friendly intercourse with the Indians, and again the voyage was continued as far as Montego Bay, called by Columbus Buentiempo (i. e. Fair Weather) Bay, because the wind was favorable for his return to Cuba. Two months later he sailed leisurely along the southern coast of Jamaica, receiving kindness and hospitality, but making no attempt to explore the country. At Old Harbor Bay the chief, or cacique, boarded his ship accompanied by many members of his family and staff, and, in the course of an interesting interview, proposed that he himself and all his family should return with Columbus to Spain. The offer was courteously declined, and the journey was continued till on the 19th of August, 1494. Columbus passed out of sight of Jamaica, to the southeastern extremity of which, now known as Morant Point, he gave the name of Cape Farol. Thus ended the first visit of Columbus to Jamaica; his second visit was paid under very different circumstances. . . .

Columbus started on his fourth and last voyage, with a fleet of four ships and crews of 150 men in all, on the 9th of May, 1502. He was then sixty-six years of age, and bore in his body traces of the toil and trouble of a hard life. But more trouble was to come, and Jamaica was to be the scene of its patient endurance. With the details of the earlier portion of the voyage we are not here concerned, and pass to the 22d of June, 1503, when, as he himself wrote, with "his people dismayed and down hearted, almost all his anchors lost and his vessels bored as full of holes as a honey-comb," driven by opposing winds and currents, Columbus put into Puerto Bueno (Dry Harbor).

On the following day, failing to find either sufficient food or fresh water, he sailed eastward to another harbor, since known as Don Christopher's Cove. His forlorn and desperate condition is thus described by his greatest historian: "His ships, reduced to mere wrecks, could no longer keep the sea, and were ready to sink even in port. He ordered them, therefore, to be run aground within bow-shot of the shore, and fastened together, side by side. They soon filled with water to the decks. Thatched cabins were then erected at the prow and stern for the accommodation of the crews, and the wreck was placed in the best possible state of defence. Thus castled in the sea, he wished to be able to repel any sudden attack of the natives, and at the same time to keep his men from roving about the neighborhood and indulging in their usual excesses. No one was allowed to go on shore without especial license, and the utmost precaution was taken to prevent any offence being given to the Indians. Any exasperation of them might be fatal to the Spaniards in their present forlorn condition. A firebrand thrown into their wooden fortress might wrap it in flames and leave them defenceless amid hostile thousands."

Fortunately the natives turned out to be well-disposed to their visitors, and for a time there was little difficulty in obtaining, by exchange of ornaments and other trifles of European manufacture, sufficient food to support the shipwrecked crews. But the supply was not inexhaustible. The country, indeed, was fertile, but on the other hand, the population was large, and Columbus's men were both hungry and fastidious. Dreading the time when the supplies of the district should be exhausted and his followers reduced to famine, Columbus determined on what we may consider the first exploration of Jamaica. Diego Mendez, one of the bravest and most loyal of his officers, was sent on a foraging expedition with three other men. They traveled along the coast and a few miles inland through the present parishes of St. Ann, Trelawny, St. James and Hanover. Friendly terms were made with different chiefs—the names of two of these, Huarco and Ameyro, are preserved—and a regular supply of food was guaranteed, in exchange for fish-hooks, knives, beads, combs and such-like articles. The food to be obtained would largely consist of cassava bread, fish, birds and small animals somewhat resembling rabbits.

Mendez returned from his mission, only to be called upon for more important services. The supply of provisions was of course an immediate necessity, but the greatest need was that of means to get back to Spain, or at any rate to get into communication with Spaniards who could send ships to the rescue of the wrecked mariners. Accordingly, with a small mixed crew of Spaniards and Indians, Mendez was sent in a canoe to Hispaniola to seek assistance from Ovando and to continue his journey to Spain with despatches from Columbus. The first attempt to accomplish his hazardous undertaking was a failure. Mendez was captured by Indians and barely escaped with his life, his companions being put to death. . . . .

On the 28th of June, 1504, after a visit which was almost an imprisonment of upwards of twelve months, Columbus left Jamaica. It is extremely doubtful whether Columbus ever left the shelter of his stranded ships. He was an old man when he came; toil, injustice, anxiety, disappointment had intensified the natural infirmities of old age; gout kept him crippled in his cabin, and leaving Jamaica, he went home to die.

HEAVEN BEGINS HERE*

The kingdom of heaven begins here. It must have its starting-point and its first experience in this world. Our Saviour strove to make this very plain; but the great truth, in a sense has been missed. The disciples even never saw it clearly; then the Church missed it all together, and so from Church to people and from parent to child has grown an idea of heaven, missing the first and greatest truth. Heaven has usually been the other side of death, mysteriously and dreadfully beautiful; so that we wondered and dreamed about it until it grew dim and very far away, if not unreal. No description was ever given by our Saviour of heaven after death; but of heaven before death he never wearied speaking. He left the curtain drawn against human eyes to the one, but to the other he opened wide the door.

It required the drama of a life on Earth to reveal the life of Heaven in human nature. Some one from heaven must come on earth and live. Jesus our Saviour came, his life unfolding, as he lived with his disciples and loved them. He started them mentally and spiritually along in heaven's way, and kept with them until they began at least feebly to feel his life. The Spirit of his life flowed into their spirit until they lived less from the world about them and from themselves, and more for him. Then when he left them, he helped them to remember his spirit, his words, his commands, his love, until they realized in some degree that although gone from them he still perceptibly, personally controlled their life. They found themselves moving toward his ways. In their community they said, "This is what Jesus did;" "This is what Jesus told us to do;" "This is what Jesus would do if he were with us now as he once was." Thus they were largely subject to Jesus. They thought about it and tried to preserve the spirit in which he kept them while he was the centre of their circle. In time the Holy Spirit came to create and effectively preserve in them the Spirit of Jesus. Thus they were able to keep on in that new life, begun while he was with them. They lived somewhat in the spirit of heaven, though under very different circumstances, and in very trying times. Their relation to each other, to those with whom they did business buying or selling, to their temple and priests, to the Sanhedrim, and to the Roman Government,—all was controlled by the teaching and spirit of their ascended Master. Jesus was their King, though now an unseen King returned to his Father, living again in heaven, but still strong for them and in them, as they kept on trying to tell abroad that which he had told them. Thus there came to them, and through them down to us, the fact that Jesus Christ is a spiritual King, ruling his part of the kingdom of heaven by what he taught, and by the Holy Spirit, who is active in all whom he causes to be born again. This is the kingdom of heaven on earth,—the realm of the human heart subject to the forces of heaven,—Jesus Christ enthroned with the Father, but touching and ruling spiritually the subjects of his kingdom who begin their life on earth.

A BUDDHIST PRIEST CONVERTED.

"There have been several conversions through simply reading the Word of God," writes a missionary from China." The Gospel of Mark got into the hands of the native pastor at Ta-ning, when he was a Buddhist priest; and he dwelt upon it for many months. I believe that for years he was reading that Gospel of Mark. After a time he got a copy of the New Testament, and he and his friends gradually came into the light, merely through reading the Word of God. Since I have left the district I have heard of another case of a man in a city some three days' journey away, who has also been brought to the Lord (and is showing to his neighbors that he is truly a saved man), through reading another Gospel. God has made the Word a great blessing to many souls in China."

Spurgeon's Own Words.

"DEAR MR. CONGREVE—As a rule I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since first I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your remedy. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally, I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation.

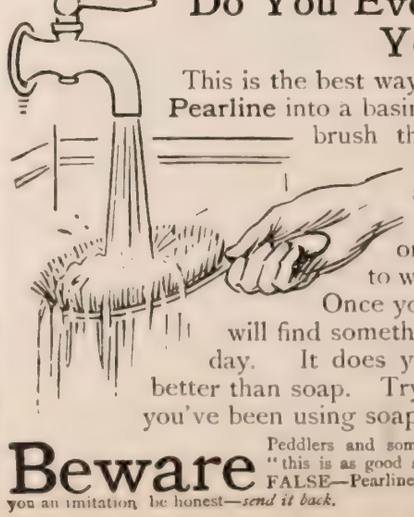
Do You Ever Wash Your Hair Brush?



This is the best way: Put one teaspoonful of Pearline into a basin of warm water; wash the brush thoroughly in it; rinse in clean water, and set it aside, bristles down, to dry. This is only one—a small one—of the numberless uses to which you can put Pearline. Once you have it in the house, you will find something new for it to do, every day. A LIFE YIELDED FOR AFRICA.

Mrs. William Snape of the Bishop Taylor Congo Mission, Dies on the Voyage Home from Her Missionary Station.

THE sad news comes from the Congo of the death of another of Bishop Taylor's missionaries. Mrs. William Snape, who, with her husband, was in charge of the station at Isangila has passed from her labors into rest. She had been on the field scarcely a year when the effects of the terrible climate became perceptible in her constitution and she reluctantly left her work to seek recuperation in a voyage home. The fatal seed had, however, been sown. Hœmaturic fever developed soon after she went on board the steamer and before she saw the shores of her native land she peacefully breathed her last. Her death was singularly beautiful. Loving friends were at her side, skilful physicians were doing all that science could suggest for her recovery and she, herself, was anxious to live that she might return to her husband to share his labors and continue the work among the African children in which she had been blessed. But when the physicians told her that there was no hope, she cheerfully yielded to the will of the God whom she had served and, declaring that she was sure that he knew best, she died without a murmur, strong in her faith of a meeting in the better land with her husband and those whom she loved. The friends who had watched beside her in her illness made a coffin for the beloved remains and they were solemnly committed to the deep.

THE LATE MRS. W. SNAPE, CONGO MISSIONARY.

This was no accidental termination of a life, but its culmination and crown. She went to Africa with a full knowledge of the dangers she must encounter and fully prepared to lay down her life in her Master's cause, if that was the will of God. From her early girlhood when she gave her heart to Christ and began to work for him in Sunday School and in the factory where she was employed, her thoughts turned longingly to the foreign mission field as the sphere of highest service. She spoke to her pastor on the subject, but he had enjoyed the pleasure of receiving into his church already more than a score of young people, whom she had led to the Saviour; and he urged her to remain in a sphere in which God was blessing her. She stayed; but the thought of the perishing millions to whom no one was telling the good news of salvation weighed upon her soul. She coveted the privilege of going to them and leading them to Christ. The arduous nature of the work was explained to her, the hardships she would have to endure and the possibility of her dying from the club of the savage, the paw of a wild beast, or the no less deadly climate. Her answer was that she had given herself to Christ and her life to his service. The post of danger was, to her mind, the post of honor, and with the ardor of a consecrated heart she longed to occupy it.

The way was unexpectedly opened for her entrance into a training institution in Philadelphia. There the defects of her early education in her native town in Maryland were speedily remedied. She applied herself diligently to study and occupied her leisure moments in visiting the members of the large infant class which had been placed under her care in the Sunday School. Her warm sympathetic nature made her very successful in this work and when she subsequently removed to Brooklyn to complete her studies she took up a similar duty there. Her Brooklyn pastor, Rev. Lemuel Richardson, of the York Street M. E. Church, speaks in glowing terms of her work among the children of his congregation and of the energy and watchfulness, which characterized her in finding opportunities, while visiting her child friends, to speak of Christ to their parents and relatives.

In the course of her work she made the acquaintance of Mr. Wm. Snape, who was preparing to go to Africa under Bishop Taylor's charge. The hopes and purposes which they had in common drew them together and a warm affection sprang up between them which grew closer as time passed. They found that they loved each other and finally they were united in marriage. Three months afterward, in March, 1892, they were on board a steamer bound for the Congo. She arrived at the receiving station at Vivi in good health and spirits, and, during her stay there, her hopes of a long useful life in Africa were very bright. During the three days' march, however, to Isangila, where they were to labor, alarming symptoms daveloped. She made light of them, and on settling in her new home, they apparently disappeared. She was spedily at work, teaching school, visiting among the people ministering to the sick, and encouraging her husband in his new work. For a few months she was the light of the station, making her way into all hearts. Then her health failed, and suffering which she could no longer conceal, completely prostrated her. She hoped for a speedy recovery, but those, whom a sad experience of African sickness had made wiser, told her that only in a prompt return to her native land lay any hope of prolonging her life. The recollection of the invigorating results of a sea voyage, which she had experienced on the way out, encouraged her to accept their advice, in the hope of an early return to her labor. She bade a tender adieu to her husband, cheering him in the parting by the promise of rejoining him in restored health after a brief separation, and went on board the steamer. Only twelve days later, days of suffering, of sadness, but of unwavering faith, the flickering light of her natural life went out, and with loving messages of consolation to her husband, she closed her eyes forever in this world. One more life had been laid down in the effort to tell to the benighted people of Africa the story of him who died that they might have eternal life.

A CONGRESS OF RELIGIONS.

Chicago to Witness one of the most Remarkable Assemblies ever Convened—The Personnel and Programme.

RAPID as has been the progress of science and art during the last few decades of the world's history, religious thought has fully kept pace with it. While science has been unfolding her mysteries and art revealing the infinite variety of her resources, the spirit of true religion, like the sun in the heavens, has been penetrating and dispersing the clouds of superstition, ignorance, bigotry and prejudice that enveloped a great part of the human race like a pall. Individuals, communities, nations and races, touched by this spirit, have learned to love their fellowmen, regardless of all existing distinctions of creed or race, and to recognize a universal brotherhood, with one Father and one destiny.

It is this common belief that now draws together in fraternal bonds what is probably the most unique assemblage the world has ever witnessed. Christianity, Judaism, Mohammedanism, Buddhism, Confucianism, and Shintoism with many other religions, will meet on a common platform in International Congress at Chicago. While Christianity will naturally have the largest representation, it is almost certain that all the non-Christian faiths will be represented. Differences in creed, dogma, and church standards will, for the time, be set aside to permit the free and untrammeled discussion of topics that are vital to man: the duties toward his fellows, which an enlightened age and an enlarged humanity render incumbent upon him, and the attitude of reverent and obedient faith and confidence he should hold toward the Creator. The programme of the Congress is as follows:

From "Harper's Weekly."

PROMINENT DELEGATES TO THE CONGRESS OF RELIGIONS

1. Hon. Pung Kwang Yu, Confucian. 2. Purushottam Joshi, Hindoo. 3. R. Nagarkar, Theist, India. 4. Nasarvanji Bilimoria, Parsee, India. 5. Chief Rabbi Adler, England. 6. Rev. Zitzuzen Ashitsu, Buddhist. 7. Wuni Atmaramji, Jain, India. 8. Prof. Dozdes of Utrecht. 9. Prince Chandradat Chudhadharin, Buddhist, Siam. 10. Justice Ameer Ali, Moslem, India. 11. Rt. Rev. R. Shibata, Shinto, China. 12. Prof. Hoffmeyr, South Africa.

After the addresses of welcome and responses by the authorities of the World's Congress Auxiliary and the visiting delegates, the subjects to be taken up and discussed will be: 1. God. 2. Man. 3 Religion essentially characteristic of humanity. 4. Systems of religion. 5. Sacred books of the world. 6. Religion and the family. 7. The religious leaders of mankind. 8. Religion in its relations to the natural sciences and to arts and letters. 9. Religion in its relations to morals. 10. Religion and social problems. 11. Religion and civil society. 12. Religion and the love of mankind. 13. The present religious condition of Christendom. 14. Religious reunion and Christendom. 15. The religious union of the whole human family. 16. Elements of perfect religion as recognized and set forth in the different historic faiths.

From the foregoing, it will be observed that the work of the Congress will take a range sufficiently wide to permit of the utmost freedom of treatment. In every religious system there are cardinal points of belief closely resembling those in other systems, and while the religious unity of the race is not to be realized in a single generation—nor even until many generations have passed—this initial step, taken at the instance and with the co-operation of the most distinguished leaders in modern religious thought, cannot fail to produce a marked impression. It should help, more than anything that has preceded it, to soften and eradicate the hatred and bigotry of rival creeds among the children of men. As this is in the direct line of Christian effort and does not involve the sacrifice of any principle of the religion of Jesus, the Congress is deserving of the sincere support and approval of all Christendom. Beginning September 11, the sessions will continue until September 27, closing with the afternoon or evening of that day. The plan of holding a World's Congress of Religions was first proposed by members of the World's Fair Auxiliary, of which Hon. C. C. Bonney is President, nearly two years ago, and the details were arranged by Rev. John Henry Barrows, D.D., of the First Presbyterian Church of Chicago, who entered into correspondence on the subject with leaders of religious thought in many countries, including celebrated Christian divines of every denomination, foremost apostles of almost every known creed, professors in colleges, distinguished authors, and others. The result has been a multitude of responses.

Among those who will be present and who will represent non-Christian faiths, are Hon. Justice Ameer Ali, of Calcutta, and Said Ali Bilgrami, of Hyderabad, Mohammedans; Rt. Rev. Reichi Shibata, of the Shinto religion; Marilal Dvevidi, of India, representing Hinduism; H Dharmape, of the Buddhist Society of India; J. Modi, of Bombay, Zoroastrianism; Pung Kwang Yu, Confucianism; Rabbis Wise, of Cincinnatti, Berkowitz, of Philadelphia, and Silverman, Kohut and Kohler, of New York, Judaism; with Parsees, WEEK-DAY RELIGION.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., Founded on the Text: Proverbs 3: 6: "In all thy ways acknowledge him."

THERE has been a tendency in all lands and ages to set apart certain days, places, and occasions for especial religious service, and to think that they formed the realm in which religion was chiefly to act. Now, while holy days and holy places have their use, they can never be a substitute for continuous exercise of faith and prayer. In other words, a man cannot be so good a Christian on Sabbath that he can afford to be a worldling all the week. If a steamer start for Southampton, and sail one day in that direction, and the other six days sail in other directions, how long before the steamer will get to Southampton? Just as soon as a man will get to heaven who sails on the Sabbath day toward that which is good, and the other six days of the week sails toward the world, the flesh and the devil. You cannot eat so much at the Sabbath banquet that you can afford religious abstinence all the rest of the week.

Genuine religion is not spasmodic, does not go by fits and starts, is not an attack of chills and fever—now cold until your teeth chatter, now hot until your bones ache. Genuine religion marches on steadily, up steep hills, and along dangerous declivities, its eye ever on the everlasting hills crowned with the castles of the blessed.

I propose, so far as God may help me, to show you how we may bring our religion into ordinary life, and practise it in common things—yesterday, to-day, to-morrow.

And in the first place, I remark: We ought to bring religion into our ordinary conversation. A dam breaks and two or three villages are submerged, a South American earthquake swallows a city, and people begin to talk about the uncertainty of human life, and in that conversation think they are engaging in religious service, when there may be no religion at all. I have noticed that in proportion as Christian experience is shallow, men talk about funerals and deathbeds, and hearses, and tombstones, and epitaphs. If a man have the religion of the Gospel in its full power in his soul, he will talk chiefly about this world and the eternal world, and very little comparatively about the insignificant pass between this and that. Yet how seldom it is that the religion of Christ is a welcome theme? Now, if we have the religion of Christ in our soul, we will talk about it in an exhilarant mood. It is more refreshing than the waters, it is brighter than the sunshine, it gives a man joy [illegible] happiness before the throne of God. And yet, if the theme of religion be introduced into a circle, everything is [illegible] aged Christian man in the corner of the room, feeling that something ought to be said, puts one foot over the other, and sighs heavily, and says, "Oh yes; that's so!" My friends! the religion of Jesus Christ is not something to be groaned about, but something to talk about and sing about, your face irradiated. The trouble is that men professing the faith of the Gospel are often so inconsistent that they are afraid their conversation will not harmonize with their life. We cannot talk the Gospel unless we live the Gospel. If a man have the grace of God in his heart dominant, he can talk religion and it will seem natural, and men, instead of being repulsed by it, will be attracted by it.

"In all Thy Ways Acknowledge Him."

But I remark again: We ought to bring the religion of Jesus Christ into our ordinary [illegible]. "Oh!" you say, "that's a very good theory for a man who manages a large business, who has great traffic, who holds a great estate; it is a grand thing for bankers and for shippers, but in my thread and needle store, in my trimming establishment, in my insignificant work of life, you cannot apply those grand Gospel principles." My brother, you cannot be called to do anything so insignificant but God will help you in it. If you are a fisherman, Christ will stand by you as he did by Simon when he dragged Gennesaret. Are you a drawer of water?—he will be with you as at the well curb, when talking with the Samaritan woman. Are you a custom-house officer?—Christ will call you as he did Matthew at the receipt of custom. The man who has only a day's wages in his pocket as certainly needs religion as he who rattles the keys of a bank and could abscond with a hundred thousand hard dollars. And yet there are men who profess the religion of Jesus Christ who do not bring the religion of the Gospel into their ordinary occupations and employments. There are in the churches of this day men who seem very devout on the Sabbath who are far from that during the week. A country merchant arrives in this city, and he goes into the store to buy goods of a man who professes religion, but has no grace in his heart. The country merchant is swindled. He is too exhausted to go home that week; he tarries in town. On Sabbath he goes to some church for consolation, and what is his amazement to find that the man who carries around the poor box is the very one who swindled him. But never mind—the deacon has his black coat on now, and looks solemn, and goes home talking about that blessed sermon! Christians on Sunday. Worldlings during the week.

Suppose you were to go out to fight for your country in some great contest, would you go to do the battling at Troy or at Springfield? No, you would go there to get your swords and muskets. Then you would go out in the face of the enemy and contend for your country. Now, I take the Sabbath day and the church to be only the armory where we are to get equipped for the great battle of life, and that battlefield is Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday. "Antioch," and "St. Martin's," and Old Hundred" are not worth much if we do not sing all the week. A sermon is of little account if we cannot carry it behind the counter and behind the plough. The Sabbath day is of no value if it last only twenty-four hours.

"Oh!" says some one, "if I had a great sphere I would do that; if I could have lived in the time of Martin Luther, if I could have been Paul's traveling companion, if I had some great and resounding work to do—then I should put into application all that you say." I must admit that the romance and knight errantry have gone out of life. There is but very little of it left in the world. The groves where the gods used to dwell have been cut up for firewood, and the man who is looking for great spheres and great scenes for action will not find them. And yet there are Alps to scale and there are Hellesponts to swim, and they are in common life. It is absurd for you to say that you would serve God if you had a great sphere. If you do not serve him on a small scale, you would not on a large scale. If you cannot stand the bite of a midge, how could you endure the breath of a basilisk?

Our National Government does not think it belittling to put a tax on pins, and a tax on buckles, and a tax on shoes The individual taxes do not amount to much, but in the aggregate to millions and millions of dollars. And I would have you, O Christian man, put a high tariff on every annoyance and vexation that comes through your soul. This might not amount to much, in single cases, but in the aggregate it would be a great revenue of spiritual strength and satisfaction. A bee can suck honey even out of a nettle; and if you have the grace of God in your heart, you can get sweetness out of that which would otherwise irritate and annoy.

This brings me to another point. We ought to bring the religion of Jesus Christ into all our trials. If we have a bereavement, if we lose our fortune, if some great trouble blast like the tempest, then we go to God for comfort; but yesterday in the little annoyances of your store or office, or shop, or factory, or banking house, did you go to God for comfort? You did not.

My friends, you need to take the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ into the most ordinary trials of your life. You have your misfortunes, you have your anxieties, you have your vexations. "Oh!" you say, "they don't shape my character. Since I lost my child, since I have lost my property, I have been a very different man from what I was." My brother, it is the little annoyances of your life that are souring your disposition, clipping your moral character, and making you less and less of a man.

You go into an artist's studio. You see him making a piece of sculpture. You say, "Why don't you strike harder?" With his mallet and his chisel he goes click, click, click! and you can hardly see from stroke to stroke that there is any impression made upon the stone, and yet the work is going on. You say, "Why don't you strike harder." "Oh!" he replies, "that would shatter the statue: I must make it in this way stroke by stroke." And he continues on by week and month until after awhile every man that enters the studio is fascinated. Well, I find God dealing with some man. He is shaping him for time, and shaping him for eternity. I say, "O Lord! why not with one tremendous blow of calamity shape that man for the next world?" God says, "That's not the way I deal with this man; it is stroke after stroke, annoyance after annoyance, irritation after irritation; and after awhile he will be done, and a glad spectacle for angels and men."

Not by one great stroke, but by ten thousand little strokes of misfortune are men fitted for heaven. You know that large fortunes can soon be scattered by being paid out in small sums of money, and the largest estate of Christian character is sometimes entirely lost by these small depletions.

We must bring the religion of Jesus Christ to help us in these little annoyances. Do not say that anything is too insignificant to affect your character. Rats may sink a ship. One lucifer match may destroy a temple. A queen got her death by smelling of a poisoned rose. Why, my friends, there is nothing insignificant in your life. How dare you take the responsibility of saying that there is? Do you not know that the whole universe is not ashamed to take care of one violet? I say, "What are you doing down there in the grass, poor little violet? Nobody knows you are here. Are you not afraid nights? You will die with thirst; nobody cares for you; you will suffer, you will perish." "No," says a star, "I'll watch over it to-night." "No," says the cloud, "I'll give it drink." "No," says the sun, "I'll warm it in my bosom." And then the wind rises, and comes bending down the grain, and sounding its psalm through the forest, and I say, "Whither away, O wind! on such swift wing?" and it answers, "I am going to cool the cheek of that violet." And then I see pulleys at work in the sky, and the clouds are drawing water, and I say, "What are you doing there, O clouds?" They say, "We are drawing water for that violet." And then I look down into the grass, and I say, "Can it be that God takes care of a poor thing like you?" and the answer comes up, "Yes, yes; God clothes the grass of the field, and he has never forgotten me, a poor violet." Oh, my friends! if the heavens bend down to such insignificant ministry as that, I tell you God is willing to bend down to your case, since he is just as careful about the construction of a spider's eye as he is in the conformation of flaming galaxies.

Plato had a fable which I have now nearly forgotten, but it ran something like this: he said spirits of the other world came back to this world to find a body and find a sphere of work. One spirit came and took the body of a king, and did his work. Another spirit came and took the body of a poet, and did his work. After awhile Ulysses came, and he said, "Why, all the fine bodies are taken, and all the grand work is taken. There is nothing left for me." And some one replied, "Ah! the best one has been left for you." Ulysses said, "What's that?" And the reply was, "The body of a common man, doing a common work, and for a common reward." A good fable for the world, and just as good fable for the Church.

But I remark again: We ought to bring the religion of Jesus Christ into our ordinary blessings. Every autumn the President of the United States and the governors make proclamation, and we are called together in our churches to give thanks to God for his goodness. But every day ought to be a thanksgiving day. We take most of the blessings of life as a matter of course. We have had ten thousand blessings this morning, for which we have not thanked God. Before the night comes, we will have a thousand more blessings you will never think of mentioning before God.

We must see a blind man led along by his dog before we learn what a grand thing it is to have one's eyesight. We must see a man with St. Vitus' Dance before we learn what a grand thing it is to have the use of our physical energies. We must see some soldier crippled, limping along on his crutch, or his empty coat-sleeve pinned up, before we learn what a grand thing it is to have the use of all our physical faculties. In other words, we are so stupid that nothing but the misfortunes of others can wake us up to an appreciation of common blessings.

We get on board a train and start for Boston, and come to Norwalk bridge, and the "draw" is off and crash! goes the train. Fifty lives dashed out. We escape. We come home in great excitement, and call our friends around us, and they congratulate us; and we all kneel down and thank God for our escape while so many perished. But to-morrow morning you get on a train of cars for Boston. You cross that bridge at Norwalk. You cross all the other bridges. You get to Boston in safety. Then you return home. Not an accident, not an alarm. No thanks. In other words, you seem to be more grateful when fifty people lose their lives and you get off, than you are grateful to God when you all get off, and you have no alarm at all. Now you ought to be thankful when you escape from accident, but more thankful when they all escape. In the one case your gratitude is somewhat selfish; in the other, it is more like what it ought to be.

Oh! these common mercies, these common blessings, how little we appreciate them and how soon we forget them! Like the ox grazing, with the clover up to its eyes, like the bird picking the worm out of the furrow—never thinking to thank God who makes the grass grow, and who gives life to every living thing, from the animalculæ in the sod to the seraph on the throne. Thanksgiving on the 27th of November, in the autumn of the year; but blessings, hour by hour and day by day and no thanks at all. I compared our indifference to the brute; but perhaps I wronged the brute. I do not know but that, among its other instincts, it may have an instinct by which it recognizes the Divine hand that feeds it. I do not know but that God is, through it, holding communication with what we call "irrational creation." The cow that stands under the willow by the water course, chewing its cud, looks very thankful; and who can tell how much a bird means by its song? The aroma of the flowers smells like incense, and the mist arising from the river looks like the smoke of a morning sacrifice. Oh, that we were as responsive!

If you were thirsty and asked me for a drink, and I gave you this glass of water, your common instinct would reply, "Thank you." And yet, how many chalices of mercy we get hour by hour from the hand of the Lord, our Father and our King, and we do not even think to say "Thank you." More just to men than we are just to God.

Who thinks of thanking God for the water gushing up in the well, foaming in the cascade, laughing over the rocks, pattering in the shower, clapping its hands in the sea? Who thinks to thank God for that? Who thinks to thank God for the air, the fountain of life, the bridge of sunbeams, the path of sound, the great fan on a hot summer day? Who thinks to thank God for this wonderful physical organism, this sweep of vision, this chime of harmony struck into the ear, this crimson tide rolling through arteries and veins, this drumming of the heart on the march of immortality?

O, my friends! let us wake up to an appreciation of the common mercies of life. Let every day be a Sabbath, every meal a sacrament, every room a holy of holies. We all have burdens to bear; let us cheerfully bear them. We all have battles to fight; let us courageously fight them.

If we want to die right, we must live right. You go home and attend to your little sphere of duties. I will go home and attend to my little sphere of duties. You cannot do my work; I cannot do your work. Negligence and indolence will win the hiss of everlasting scorn, while faithfulness will gather its garlands, and wave its sceptre, and sit upon its throne long after the world has put on ashes and eternal ages have begun their march.

"The World is their Debtor."

Dr Peters, the Famous African Explorer, Pays a Tribute to the Missionaries—To write for "The Christian Herald" on the Subject.

FEW men who have visited America in recent years have attracted more attention in religious circles than Dr. Karl Peters of Berlin, the celebrated African explorer, geographer and savant. Dr. Peters has spent nearly ten years in the very heart of the Dark Continent, a large part of the time having been engaged by the German Government on important service. In 1888 he conducted the expedition sent out to the relief of Emin Pasha, his route on that occasion being from the Indian Ocean straight to the Equatorial Province. On the way he heard of the troubles in Uganda, and turning south he crossed the Nile and entered that country, where he succeeded in restoring to power the Christian party who with the king had been turned out by the Mohammedans. He then traveled around the western side of Lake Victoria, driving out the Arab slavers and opening up the whole district. Pushing on, he met Emin Pasha, and soon conceived a warm admiration for the learned, courageous, Christian explorer who, for the sake of African enlightenment and civilization, had separated himself from the world absolutely for years. On returning to Germany, honors were heaped upon Dr. Peters by scientific societies and the government appointed him Imperial Commissioner in Africa. In 1891 he explored the Kilima-Njaro district and established order there and last year he was engaged, jointly with a representative of Great Britain, in regulating the Anglo-German frontier boundary line. This task concluded, he again returned to Europe three months ago. His visit to the United States at this time is for the purpose of representing Africa at the Ethnological Congress in Chicago.

Dr. Louis Klopsch, proprietor and publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and Mr. G. H. Sandison, the Business Manager, had a pleasant interview with the distinguished explorer at the Hotel Waldorf, in New York, a few days ago. They were warmly welcomed by Dr. Peters, who is a man hardly yet in the prime of life, athletic and robust, his naturally fair skin bronzed by long exposure to the tropical sun. In the course of a delightful and protracted conversation, Dr. Peters made some interesting remarks concerning African missions.

"I have been a close observer," he said, "of the progress and influence of missionary work, and I consider it one of the greatest factors in bringing about the ultimate civilization of Africa. Yet, while I am a Protestant and naturally in sympathy with Protestant missions, I must admit that the Catholics seem in some respects to have the benefit of better organization. One of the first things a missionary must learn, is to avoid meddling with politics. He should devote himself exclusively to the business of soul-saving. When he undertakes to become a political adviser, as well as a Gospel teacher, the result is generally unfortunate and always unsatisfactory. This came to my attention quite pointedly with regard to the missionaries of the Church of England, whom I found absorbed in politics in some places. I have even heard that some of them have actually put rifles in the hands of the negroes. But that is merely incidental. As a whole, the missionaries are doing a great work — a work that cannot be computed by ordinary means —in helping to bring about the redemption of Africa from ignorance and superstition? Whatever there is of civilization in Africa is largely due to missionary effort. The whole world is greatly indebted to the brave men and women who went there as missionaries, and thus opened up that continent to civilization."

"You have had a wide personal acquaintance with the missionary field and must have met American missionaries, too, have you not, Doctor?" he was asked.

"Yes. I have met them in those parts of Africa where I have traveled, and they are noble men. They are well liked everywhere. Personally, I have a great respect for your American missionaries; although comparatively few in number, they are working very effectively and making great headway in many parts of Africa."

"From your knowledge of the field and the workers, can you suggest any means of improving the present method of missionary operations?"

"Experience has shown," replied the explorer, "that the best plan is to begin with the children and to teach them industrial occupations, cultivating both heart and hand simultaneously. I am quite satisfied of this. In the East Coast Missions, especially at the Catholic stations, industrial training of the young is recognized as a most effective method and of the highest importance."

"And on the West Coast, also, there are similar industrial missions, are there not?"

"Yes, the West Coast missions, too, are adopting this principle. They are doing well, although not so long established as those in the east, of course. Indeed, in all parts of Africa the missionaries are finding out that the true way to bring about ultimate evangelization is to educate the children. Teach industrial work in schools and elsewhere and train the hand and heart together. You have got to get at the children, and mission work conducted on that basis is sure of ultimate success."

"Your general remarks indicate that your are favorable to the extension of missionary work in Africa, then. Have you any suggestions to offer in that connection that would be helpful to gospel workers beginning service there?" asked Dr. Klopsch.

"You are right," responded the explorer enthusiastically. "I am very much in favor of a large extension of missionary effort in Africa. The suggestion you make is one to which I will give consideration and in an article which I will send to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD shortly, I will endeavor to indicate the best means of missionary extension and successful work. I may, at the same time, include some suggestions, the result of a long and varied tropical experience, that will be serviceable to those who contemplate entering the African missionary field."

PERSONAL RESPONSIBILITY.

S.S. Lesson for Sept 17 Rom. 14: 12-23. Golden Text, Rom. 14 : 21 By Mrs. M. Baxter.

ALL which is divine is necessarily in direct contrast to that which is human; and personal responsibility on divine lines is quite another thing from personal responsibility on human lines. The former is not only compatible with, but dependent upon the grace of God; the latter is independent of grace and antagonistic to it. The sense of responsibility which made Paul of Tarsus think with himself that he ought to do many things contrary to Jesus of Nazareth, was quite another thing from that which led him to see that he had a

to him. As the fanatical young Pharisee, filled with a sense of self-importance, he breathed out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of Christ, and taking for granted that he was right and they were wrong, his human sense of responsibility led him to exercise cruel and sanguinary coercion and persecution. As the disciple of Jesus, filled with the Holy Ghost he had quite as strong a sense of responsibility; but O how different was its exercise! he had learned lessons of grace; he knew now that he was the chief of sinners; he had learned that whatever he had become as a Christian it was by grace: "By the grace of God I am that I am." Thus instead of taking the high hand with the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles, as he had done with the believing Christians before his conversion, Paul says: "Though I was free from all men, I brought myself under bondage to all, that I might gain the more." This is personal responsibility, through grace. Oh how like him who said: "I am among you as he that serveth!" There is by which grace, which makes us entirely dependent on God, and responsibility which makes the strongest demands upon us, can be reconciled: it is by keeping our place in the Body of Christ. Let us not forget that things most opposite by nature can meet and become one in God. If we learn of Christ, and carry out in practice, our responsibility of love and interdependence as members of his Body, we cannot but exercise the responsibility of love to a lost world. Therefore we are ever at school in our relations to our fellow Christians. Thus we learn in our chapter (Rom. 14) not to reject one who is weak in faith. We are followers of him who does not break the bruised reed or quench the smoking flax. What we have to avoid is "doubtful disputations." The spirit of argument is all on human ground, God cannot admit and we cannot admit one who cannot take the place of a learner. But where it is a question of eating or of the observance of days, God would have us large enough to leave those things to the individual conscience. It may be a real help to one Christian to observe the days of Christ's birth and death, resurrection and ascension, while to another, equally devoted, it would be a bondage. To one a strong meat diet would be a positive hindrance to prayer, and fasting a real service to God; to another no such thing. Our responsibility here is to be large enough to allow that if "God hath received him" then surely we can receive a brother who does not see with us in these things.

Our rule of life is to be: "None of us liveth to himself, and none dieth to himself, for whether we live, we live unto the Lord; or whether we die, we die unto the Lord; whether we live therefore or die we are the Lord's." It [illegible] another's. As members of the Body of Christ, we are linked one to another by the Head." "Not holding the Head" always brings in difficulty. In all our responsibility one with regard to others, the thing which makes our responsibility divine is to let all our words to others be given us from the Head; to let all our thoughts of others be first told out to our Lord, and purified by him before we venture to express them to others, or even to allow them in our hearts; by this means grace will rule responsibility. Some truly earnest Christians will say a true thing under a deep sense of responsibility to another Christian, but it has not gone through the Head, and the other member is not prepared to receive it; it touches the self life in him, and that which was meant to do good does real harm. We are not to judge our brother or set at naught our brother; but we are to reprove him and not to suffer sin upon him; yet always "speaking truth in love," not only a love which exists in our hearts, and leaves still a rough exterior, but a love which has been at work upon us to conform us to the image of him whom neither little children, publicans and sinners, nor lepers were afraid of. "We shall all stand before the judgment seat of God . . . Let us not therefore judge one another any more." "Judge nothing before the time until the Lord come." The spirit of judgment is a terrible hindrance to the exercise of divine personal responsibility which can only be exercised in the spirit of service not judgment. There is, however, one thing we may judge: "Judge ye this rather, that no man put in his brother's way, or an occasion of falling." "It does me no harm to take a glass of wine," says a Christian man; and he takes it without considering the eyes which are upon him. A young Christian man, the son of parents and grandparents who have died a drunkard's death, and who himself has inherited blood poisoned by alcohol, a young man to whom the temptation to drink is inconceivable, in those who have not the misfortune to be born of such parents, sees the action. The devil says to him: "If such a man take wine, why can't you?" He yields, and perhaps in hell will curse the day he ever saw that Christian man take a glass of wine! The Christian man was living to himself, he did not ask God if his glass of wine was serving the purposes of his kingdom, he had not learned like Paul, to the weak to be as the weak that he might gain the weak, he thought only of how it would affect himself and thus through ignorance of divine responsibility to a member of Christ, he sinned against Christ's body.

Paul, speaking of meat offered to idols, says to the Roman Christians of his day: "I know and am persuaded of the Lord Jesus, that nothing is unclean of itself: save that to him that accounteth anything to be unclean, to him it is unclean. For if because of meat thy brother is grieved, thou walkest no longer in love. Destroy not with thy meat him for whom Christ died." And equally it may be said: Destroy not with thy drink, thy smoking, thy Sunday traveling, thy self-indulgence in any way, him for whom Christ died. Bearing, as we do, the name of Christ, all we do attaches to his name. "Let not then your good be evil spoken of." O, how much more: Let not your Master's name be evil spoken of. In the sight of God, nothing is little, all has importance, every thing is worth praying over, and so praying as to have clear and minute direction from God. He has a will about all we do, and all we do touches other people. Only God can guide as to how far consideration for others shall guide our conduct. There is a slavery to the opinion of others which is of the flesh and which is the greatest bondage; "Be ye not servants of men;" Paul was first free from all men before he could bring himself into bondage to all. Free from selfish bondage to become a slave of love for Christ's sake. Human policy is one thing; divine love is quite another.

Paul gives yet another rule: "Let us follow after things which make for peace, and things whereby we may edify one another." Just as in another epistle he says, "Look not every man on his own things but every man also on the things of others." The point for each of us is, not whether a thing is right in itself, but how it may affect others. The kingdom of God is not meat and drink but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. Therefore for meat destroy not the work of God. The necessity for eating and drinking is only a temporary things. "All things indeed are clean," howbeit it is evil, i. e. even a thing clean in itself becomes evil if he eateth with offence," if he does harm to another. "The faith which thou hast," faith that meat or wine, etc., will not hurt him—have it to thyself before God, but don't hurt other people with it. "Happy is he that judgeth not himself in that which he putteth to the test." "But he that doubteth is condemned if he eat, because he eateth not of faith; and whatsoever is not of faith is sin." If we have not made out with God that what we do is of him, and will of him be blest to others, even though it be right in itself it becomes a sin against Christ.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

THE teacher has an opportunity, in dealing with this lesson, of directly impressing on the minds of the children a principle which should be inculcated as often as possible. It is that of considering and endeavoring to promote the welfare of others. They should be made to realize that if they aspire to be sons of God and followers of Christ it is necessary to form the habit of preferring others to themselves and sacrificing their own pleasure and inclinations, if by doing so they can benefit some one else. Christ did this to the last extremity, of giving up his own life that the human race might have eternal life. He expects his followers to have the same spirit. There is the more need to impress this on the child's mind, because the spirit of society is opposed to it. The vicious spirit of competition pervades our whole social life. In our public schools the child is praised more for reaching a certain standard, if he is the only one of his class who reaches it, than if many reached it, although the achievement would be the same in both cases. Of course, the praise is based on the idea that few reaching the standard is an indication of the difficulty of the task; but the child takes the practical view of the matter and rejoices if his fellow-pupils fail. He is apt to carry the lesson with him through life. He finds competition everywhere and soon learns to regard others, in the same walk of life, as his rivals, whom it is his interest to hinder, rather than help. In struggling to attain any desired object, though it be only the best seat in a car, he will have no compunction in thrusting some weaker person aside and gaining the position for himself, no matter how sorely some other may need it. He will have no hesitation in monopolizing many branches of business, although he may be aware that in doing so he is ruining men who are engaged in them. Men who act so, are not followers of Christ, whatever position in his church they may hold. The principle is so deeply engrafted into our social life that it is hopeless to eradicate it from the minds of grown men; but there is hope for the children and every teacher can do his part in the work. The direct teaching of the lesson is that it is the Christian's duty to abstain from any indulgence and refrain from doing any act which may have an injurious effect on another, even though such act is right in itself.

No man put a stumbling block. We may go further yet and say it is the duty of every one who loves his fellows to remove a stumbling block out of their way if he can do so. The principle of the golden rule demands that of every one. Two persons were on their way home, one a few feet in advance of the other. In their pathway upon the sidewalk, lay a small piece of orange peel, a little thing, but not so small but that it might have—often has—caused a vast amount of mischief. The first one walked over it, passed on—glad that she had escaped a fall—reached her home in safety, not thinking nor caring perhaps, for the many travelers on the same road, liable, if less fortunate than herself, to slip and fall. The other passed over safely, and then, as if by second thought, stepped back and moved the stumbling block out of the way. Which of the two do you think was a follower of Christ and showed most of his spirit?

There is nothing unclean of itself. Parents and teachers are often puzzled by the challenge of young people to show them in what the evil of certain things consists. It is difficult to prove logically that attending races, going to the theatre, card-playing and some other objectionable practices are intrinsically wrong. But that should not be necessary. Experience has proved that there are passions and propensities in human nature which cannot bear contact with certain influences, just as in chemistry two liquids, which are not explosive, become so when they are mixed. Some months ago a disaster occurred at Pittsburg which illustrates the fact. Several boys were on the trestle work of a railroad, beneath which runs a line of gas pipes. For several days, gas had been escaping from these pipes, and had accumulated in large quantities. One of the boys, after lighting his cigarette, threw the lighted match into a crevice. Instantly there was an explosion which seriously if not fatally injured the boy; the flames spread rapidly, burning fifty feet of trestle work, delaying all trains for a considerable time; and a large rolling mill was so injured that it will have to remain idle for some time to come, throwing out of employment a large force of men. All this from carelessly throwing a lighted match.

Let not your good be evil spoken of. Occasions sometimes arise when the doing of a right and harmless thing may be a source of mischief by misconception. In those cases, concern for the welfare of others would lead us to refrain from doing them. It is narrated of two Jewish patriots Pappus and his brother Julian—that, knowing their firm resolve not to drink Pagan wine lest they should seem to sanction idolatry, Rufus, the Roman governor, ordered water to be served to them, but in glasses so colored that it should look to the multitude as though they were drinking wine. Seeing at once the object of the deception, they sternly refused the water, and faced death by terrible martyrdom rather than taste it.

Acceptable to God and approved of men. It is worth noting that the conduct which pleases God is precisely the conduct that wins love and esteem from men. Nothing pleases a true man so much in another as to see him kind and helpful and considerate of other people. A wealthy gentleman who was childless determined to find a friendless boy and educate him and bring him up to be heir of all he possessed. He went to an orphan asylum and asked permission to watch the children at their play. He wanted to choose a boy who was not only intelligent but good. As he watched the children he became interested in two boys whose looks and actions he liked very much. They were both bright and intelligent, and he hardly knew which to choose. As he stood watching them in their play and trying to decide, one of the girls stumbled and fell. She was a cripple and unable to rise at once from the floor, but in a moment one of the two boys was helping her on her feet, as politely and kindly as a boy could. That act decided the gentleman's choice. "I want a boy who has a good heart," he said, and he took him away to a happy home and loving friends. He did not know why he was chosen, or that the gentleman was watching him. He aided the little girl because he had the spirit of Jesus in his heart, and it was the gentle spirit that brought him a home and friends.

The things which make for peace. The principle of a Christian's life which makes him beloved is that he avoids giving pain and annoyance to others and saying or doing anything which might provoke a quarrel. His life, too, if he follows Christ, is of a character which tends to his own peace when he comes to die because he is at peace with God. A lieutenant in an Iowa regiment was brought into the hospital wounded in the shoulder. At first it was thought that he would recover: but after a few days he rapidly declined. Just before his death, a lady-nurse said to him, "Lieutenant, you have but a few moments to live; if you have any word to send to your wife and little ones in Iowa, you must speak it very quickly." He looked up at her, his face shining and said, "Tell my wife that there is not a cloud between me and Jesus."

It is good neither to eat flesh nor drink wine nor do anything whereby thy brother stumbleth. The reference to the eating of flesh probably related to the dispute as to whether it was right to eat the flesh of an animal which had been offered in sacrifice to an idol. The Apostle says that it is better to abstain than imperil the soul of another. The former part of the injunction does not concern us now, but there is a deep concern in the latter part. The drinking of intoxicants does cause the downfall of many therefore it is a duty to set the example of abstinence. An incident is related by a missionary which shows how the drinking habit prejudiced a heathen against Christianity. As they talked two English soldiers reeled by under the influence of liquor. "See," said the native, "do you want me to become like that? As a Mohammedan I could not, as a Christian I might."

PIONEER WORK IN THE NORTHWEST.

The Apostolic Labors of Rev. Thomas Crosby Among the Indians of British Columbia and Alaska—Two Thousand Miles a Year in a Canoe—The Building of a Steamboat.

EARLY thirty years of toil and travel and self-denying effort for the Evangelization of the Indians of the great Northwest, have made the names of Thos. Crosby and wife householdwords throughout a large section of Canada Few people, even among those who know them best, have any idea of the extent of their labors. The change visible in some locality is witnessed, groups of Indians quit their vicious lives, the women and girls become virtuous and decent, a little church is built and the whole settlement is revolutionized. Then the man and his wife whose labors have been blessed of God to this glorious result cease to be residents of the district. They disappear, but they are gratefully remembered, and their frequent visits afterward are festivals to be anticipated, enjoyed and recollected with delight. Where do they go? The people whom they have served so well do not always know, but if inquiry is made, they learn that the work that has been done among them is being done with the same laborious effort and the same joyful results in some other settlement. No less than thirteen hundred persons have in this way been brought into church membership and have joyfully professed their faith in Christ. More than six thousand have heard the Gospel and have been brought under Christian influences in church and Sunday School. This, in a thinly settled country, where means of communication are few and precarious, is a stupendous work for one man to have accomplished, involving almost inconceivable labor and hardship.

The instrument God has used for the achievements of this enormous undertaking seemed to human eyes a very unsuitable one. With little education, no college training and no preparatory study, he took up the work, moved by faith and love; and by simple brotherly affection and quiet unobtrusive helpfulness he won the good-will of the people in one section after another and led them to Christ. The word of call and inspiration was as simple as it was effectual. In the year 1860 there appeared in a Canadian journal a letter signed "Edward White," in which the writer dwelt on the urgent need of the country. "Thousands of young men," he said, "are coming to British Columbia seeking gold; but where are the young men whom we need to consecrate their youth and strength to the preaching of the Gospel to the miners and the Indians?" It was a deplorable picture that he drew of the condition of these people. They were leading lives of practical heathenism, the miners careless, dissolute and depraved and the Indians sacrificing the sacred ties of fatherhood and brotherhood in pandering to the vices of the white settlers, and squandering the poor proceeds in self-indulgence. It was an awful circle of mutual corruption, vice, and degradation. Who was there with faith in God and conviction in his soul of the purifying and elevating power of the Gospel, who would go and preach it and live it among them? It was like asking for volunteers for a forlorn hope, or for missionaries for some benighted island of the South Seas, with the added difficulty that some of those to whom it was proposed to send the Gospel, were backsliders from Christian lands.

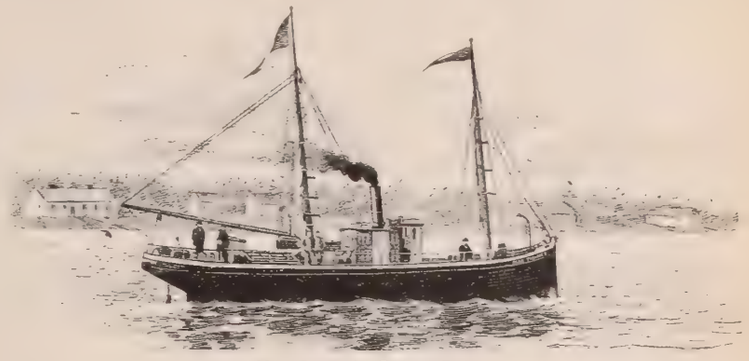
We do not know how many read that appeal from Edward White, but we know that one young man read it and could not forget it. Thomas Crosby was then twenty years old. Four years before, he had come from an English village to Woodstock with his father mother and brothers and had settled here. The family was poor and the father's venture in farming which at first promised a brilliant success ended disastrously. The boy must earn his own living and he took the first opportunity. He went to work in a tannery and was making his way. The inexhaustible energy and industry, which were afterward to be exercised in a far different sphere, characterized him in the tanner's service, winning for him the confidence and esteem of his employers. In his seventeenth year he became a member of the Methodist Church in Woodstock and after a short time was appointed a local preacher. To him, Edward White's letter appeared to be a personal call. He dwelt upon it, reread it, took it to his room and read it on his knees and finally made an offer of himself in solemn consecration to God for the work. That was all he could do; he left the opening of the way to God. Two days later he had an intimation that his offer was accepted. His elder brother, an unconverted man, spontaneously removed the only difficulty in the way by offering him all the money he needed. "Take it as a loan, Tom," he said; "if you can repay it, do; if not, I shall never ask you for it." He took the money and going to his room, he knelt down and thanked God for it, and said that henceforth his whole life was given up to him.

The matter was settled there and then. All attempts to dissuade him from an enterprise that seemed to the worldly mind profitless and foolhardy, failed. His employer was the first to assail him. "What are these people to you?" he asked. "They are savages; they will kill you and eat you. Don't be quixotic; stay with us; you have done well and may do better. Keep on with your work and from today we will double your wages." Tom had but one answer for the kindly tanner, he had promised God and must go. At home the trial was harder. The father could not see the call in the light that Tom saw it; his mother wept over her boy and declared that she could not spare him. There was a midnight scene that is still fresh in his memory, when father and mother both listened to his story of the call and the consecration and lamented over him as one given over to death. "I cannot be happy if I don't go," Tom said. Then his mother answered with a voice broken by sobs, "Well, then, my boy, go and God bless you." Hundreds of times in after years, on storm-tossed seas and lonely desert places, in the solemn night hours, Mr. Crosby declares, the echo of those words fell on his ears encouraging him and stimulating him. The ejaculatory prayer was heard and abundantly answered. God has blessed him.

Setting out alone on his perilous enterprise, with no promise of support from any church or society, he made his way to Victoria, British Columbia, where he arrived April 11, 1862. He was anxious to enter on his work unhampered by an obligation, so he stayed there working with his hands until he had earned enough money to repay his brother's loan. The time was not lost; he gained much knowledge of the field, and he gained strength in lonely communion with God. It was the period of solitude which generally precedes a life of consecrated work. Moses and John the Baptist, and even the Master himself prepared for their labors in retirement from the world.

About a year after his arrival at Victoria, he went to Dr. Evans and told him of his purpose. As a practical preparation, Dr. Evans sent him to Wanaimo, Vancouver's Island to teach the first Indian Mission School that had been established. There he labored and taught and learned. In six months he was able to understand the Indian Flathead language and before the first year was out, he could preach in that tongue. Life began in earnest with that acquisition and Crosby lost no opportunity of exercising it. He journeyed in all directions from his school preaching the gospel, in the Indian huts and tents and in the open air and living with the Indians as one of themselves. Soon it was necessary to build a church at Chilewack. There to his great delight he received a visit from Dr. Punshon, who preached in the new church. Learning that he had not been ordained, Dr. Punshon surprised him by proposing to confer ordination upon him. Crosby had scruples on account of his lack of a college education, of his lack of theological training and general unfitness, but Punshon overcame them, declaring that Crosby had given the best of all proofs of his fitness in his success.

Mr. Crosby remained in that field two years longer and then returned to Victoria to report his success to the church there, in the hope of getting some thoroughly organized work for reaching the Indians commenced. Two of the brethren there, McKay and McMillon were deeply interested in his story and made the experiment of mission services in Victoria itself. They hired a bar-room on the corner of Government and Fitzgerald Streets and Crosby gladly preached in it. There were plenty of Indians there, who had come down from the North with their squaws and daughters to engage in their loathsome traffic. A great work began in that bar-room and many of the people converted during those services, more than twenty years ago, are still living and are leading earnest, faithful Christian lives. Their rescue from the horrible life they were living and from the degrading purpose for which they went to Victoria was a marvel to them, and they begged the man who had been instrumental in effecting it, to return with them to Fort Simpson that their relatives and neighbors might hear the good tidings, too. He was unable to comply, but promised to visit them soon. During the next few months, Mr. Crosby went through Ontario arousing the churches to the need of the work and awakening them by his story of what had already been accomplished, and by his testimony as to the readiness of the Indian to listen to the Gospel, to the duty of supporting missionaries among them. During that tour he incidentally awakened in one of his hearers another kind of interest which finally became a very close and personal one. He was married to the daughter of Rev. John Dewse and henceforth had a valuable helper in his work.



MR. CROSBY'S GOSPEL BOAT.

On the conclusion of his tour, Mr. Crosby kept his promise to the Indians whom he had served at Victoria. A Hudson's Bay ship, sailing to Alaska, carried the missionary and his wife to Fort Simpson, which proved to be about seventy miles from Mr. Duncan's station at Metlakahtla. The converts of the Victoria work had prepared the way for his coming and Mr. Crosby was received with open arms. After a short time, a church was organized and a building commenced. Mr. Crosby with his own hands cut the timber and the the Indians labored hard at the building. The skilled labor was paid for chiefly by the Indians, themselves, who although they had no money brought furs, finger-rings, ear-rings, and surplus blankets, and gave them freely for the building fund. The completion of the church was the beginning of a wonderful work of grace which spread to distant places. The people who came to Fort Simpson and heard the Gospel went home and soon messages came from them to Mr. Crosby begging him to visit them. He went to Queen Charlotte Sound, where there was a similar ingathering of souls. Thence to Bella Bella, to Bella Coolee and to many other places. In each settlement he remained preaching and teaching until a church was organized and he could safely proceed to a new field.

The extremities of this chain of missionary stations were two hundred miles apart and this distance was covered by Mr. Crosby in his journeyings to and fro by canoe. For more than ten years he kept up this laborious and often perilous mode of travel, rowing on an average two thousand miles in a year. But in 1882 he realized that some better mode of locomotion could no longer be dispensed with. He must have a steamboat, which would save time and labor. Remembering his former success in Ontario he returned there and lecturing and appealing to the churches he succeeded in raising a small fund for the purpose. With the aid of a sailor, who had been converted in one of his meetings, he built the boat; a small engine, which would propel it at the rate of seven knots an hour, was purchased and put in and thus equipped Mr. Crosby resumed his labors.

The statistical results of these long years of labor are remarkable. There are now twenty-three churches in regular organization with day schools and Sunday Schools; a hospital under the charge of a skilful Christian physician; a large industrial school for girls with forty pupils, and a similar institution for boys where instruction is given in useful arts. There are eight ordained ministers, seven lay missionaries and eight native assistants. The churches are self-supporting and are in a most thriving condition. Looking back on the results of his thirty years of labor Mr. Crosby thanks God that he was led to take up this pioneer work and for the success with which God has rewarded him.

A PLEASANT MEMORY.

"HAVE you just come from Paris?" asked the Rev. Dr. John Cumming, as we clasped hands in the vestry of Crown Court Church, London. The French had surrendered at Sedan. I had been among the last to leave Paris after all Americans had been ordered out. I had run the risk of being arrested and imprisoned under suspicion of being a German, as was any man with light hair and whiskers. While standing examining in admiration the gate of the Tuileries, I found myself carefully watched of the city officials. I had arrived in London fresh from the scene of anxiety and turmoil. "Well!" said Dr. Cumming, "did I not tell you so? Have I not been telling the Christian world for years what would happen? Is it not coming true what I said about Napoleon, and what I said about the French nation? People have laughed and caricatured me for my calculation about the fulfillment of prophecy. There is no surprise to me in these modern occurrences. I read them long ago in my Bible." Dr. Cumming thus showed that he was entirely occupied with the exciting occurrences of the day. He asked nothing about America, but rained on me the questions about France, giving me no opportunity to answer more than one out of five or six of them. He impressed me as a man dreadfully in earnest, good and great. How a man had lived so long under such pressure of thought, and scrutiny of events, as though he were personally responsible, and absorbed in the destiny not so much of individuals as of nations and the world, was to me a matter of admiration. What a mighty work he achieved! Much of what he wrote and said I do not believe, but he believed it, and his influence in the aggregate was healthy, from the fact that it aroused much of the indifference of the Church about the things transpiring. He, at any rate, woke the Christian world from its lethargy, and compelled it to think. Even the titles of his books were startling: The Great Tribulation; The Last Woe; The Destiny of Nations; Apocalyptic Sketches, etc., etc. The Countess Russell, the Duchess of Sutherland, and the Queen of England, at different times, heard, with high approval, his discourses. At different times he ran the gauntlet of outrageous abuse and lampoonery. The most of the London press took after him as hounds after a hare. But for the most part he kept his temper, did his work, and now rests from his labors.

Born in 1810. Died in 1881. Some of his peculiar views he expressed in Exeter Hall when he said: "I have shown, first, that Christ's Advent is the prominent hope of the Church of God; secondly, that his Advent is a personal one; and, thirdly, that the millennial day succeeds, and does not precede, the Advent of Christ, just as the light follows the sun and does not precede it; and lastly, I have shown from the signs of the times that this Advent is near at hand, and that it becomes all to make ready for the coming of our blessed Lord. Let us now look more earnestly for the appearing of the Son of God and not quarrel. When our Lord comes there will instantly take place a resurrection of the dead in Christ. I hold that when Christ comes at the commencement of the Millennium, all brethren that have died in Christ, from Adam down to the babe that perished yesterday from its mother's bosom—the dead in Christ will instantly rise to welcome their coming Lord. All believers then living will moreover be gathered together with them, and both the dead in Christ will rise from the earth, but the living in Christ who do not die, but are changed, shall be caught up in the air, and shall there remain until the earth has undergone its fiery ordeal, just as the family of Noah was kept in the Ark. The rest of the dead will not rise till the thousand years are finished. That the resurrection of the dead in Christ—that is, of all true believers—takes place at the commencement of the Millennium, and Christ's Advent is pre-millennial, and not post-millennial."

The sentiments of Dr. Cumming thus quoted I am neither ready to accept nor dispute. Perhaps if I had studied those themes as long and as well as he did I might think the same. We shall all know more after awhile than we do now. But we must all rejoice in the work of a man who can demonstate that the Prophecies are not to be looked on as a dead-letter. Because we have a better dispensation we are not to regret the old. Because we have got into the castle is no reason why we should despise the drawbridge. Isaiah is almost as much an evangelist as John, and almost as much of an apostle as Paul. The Old Testament has not yet finished its mission in the world. Dr. Cumming brushed off most of the dust from the old parchments. Daniel and Jeremiah and all the prophets are more thoroughly and earnestly studied because of the resounding voice and far-reaching pen of the pastor of Crown Court Church. Among my happiest memories is the interview I had with this man, who has gone up to question in heaven the old prophets.

SACRAMENTAL DAYS.

IT is a good rule many people make always to be at home on Communion Day. The Sacramental Sabbath, whether it comes to an American church or an English chapel or a Scotch kirk, is more impressive than any other Sabbath. Its light is holier, calmer, sweeter; its voices more tender; its touch is softer; its memories are more chastened. The fruits of the Christian suddenly ripen, like orchards on the hill fronting the South. The wine of the Holy Sacrament seems pressed from the grapes of celestial vineyards, and the bread broken seems to drop from the hand of him who parted the loaves for the five thousand. We walk to the church of God with more thoughtful face and with quieter step.

The jubilant songs of other Sundays are struck through with pensiveness and are all a-tremble with tears, and when, at the close of the service, at the door we shake hands, it is with a more cordial grasp, because we feel thrilling through our body, and mind, and soul the great doctrine of Christian brotherhood; and our minds go back to our forefathers celebrating the sacrament in times of persecution in Scotland among the Highlands; commemorating the dying love of Christ, while they were pursued of their enemies, pouring the wine into rough wooden cups, dipping the waters of baptism from the mountain rock, until one day they heard the voices of their enemies coming up the hill, and the pastor cried out: "Oh Lord, the Shepherd, have mercy on the sheep!" and instantly there was a roaring heard as of great floods and sure enough a cloud had burst and there were great torrents running down the mountain side that whelmed their foes with sudden wrath. What a deliverance it was for them on that Sacramental Day! Oh! that on every Sacramental Day the cloud of God's mercy might burst and our sins be whelmed and our souls be saved! This is the amethyst of days. This is the pearl of days. This is the diamond of days. This is the day of days.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Mrs. J. W. Neefe, Sweden, Pa. How and when did Paul die?

According to Eusebius, he was beheaded at Rome, under Nero, about the same time that Peter was crucified there. Tertullian and Jerome adopt the same story of the great apostle's death.

T. S. Blouch, Exeter, Nebr., writes: "May I thank the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who so kindly responded to my request for the song, 'Will it Pay.' Especially are thanks due the reader from Englewood, Ills., who was the first to respond with a copy; also James C. Holt, Burton's Creek, Va.; John E. Morris, West Monroe, La., and Lillie Earsom, Mechanicsburg, O., for information where to get the book. I never before had it so clearly proven to me what a medium of good THE CHRISTIAN HERALD can be to those who use it."

Charles H. Davis, Crane, Kan. 1. What time in the history of the world was the period known as the "Dark Ages," and why was it so-called? 2. What nation or government burned the Protestant Bibles? 3. What and where is the "Circle of fire"?

1. From the beginning of the sixth to the end of the twelfth centuries. They were so-called because frightful wars and barbarian irruptions into Europe had brought about a condition of society in which education was utterly neglected, and science, literature, philosophy, and even the arts, were preserved only in a few out-of-the-way places. 2. Spain, England and Italy, at different times have permitted the Bible to be burned by fanatical Romanists. 3. Do you refer to the Rosicrucians or to the rites practised by the Druids?

J. W. Kemp, Chillicotte, O. What are the numbers and nationalities of the foreign-born population of the United States?

According to the latest official enumeration there were 9,249,547 foreign-born residents in the country, recorded as follows: Canada and Newfoundland, 980,938; Mexico, 77,853; South America, 5,006; Cuba and West Indies, 23,256; Ireland, 1,871,509; England, 909,092; Scotland, 242,231, Wales, 100,079; Germany, 2,784,894; Austria, 123,271; Holland, 81,828; Belgium, 22,639; Switzerland, 104,069; Norway, 322,665; Sweden, 478,041; Denmark, 132,543; Russia, 182,044; Hungary, 62,435; Bohemia, 118,106; Poland, 147,440; France, 113,174; Italy, 182,580; Spain, 6,185; Portugal, 15,990; China, 106,688; other foreign countries, 54,385.

M. M. Bromley, Vincennes, Ind. What is the "Grand Balance" in the Bank of England?

We presume you refer not to the cash balances, which are regularly shown on the bank's weekly statement, but to the remarkable pair of scales in the Bullion Office. These scales stand seven feet high and weigh nearly two tons. They are operated by hydraulics and are the most sensitive scales ever constructed, being capable of detecting a difference of a one thousandth part of an ounce. The mere weight of a postage stamp, it is said, will move the index several inches. The "Grand Balance" is used exclusively for weighing gold, and cost $10,000 to build. $500,000 in gold constitutes a fair day's weighing.

S. B. Gilbert, Melon, Miss. May we expect Christ's coming as near at hand as are the some prophecies which must be fulfilled before he comes?

There will be two stages in Christ's coming. The first will be when he comes as bridegroom unseen into the air and summons those of his people who are leading spiritual lives and are looking for him, to meet him. They will be caught up and their places in the world will be vacant (See 1. Thess. 4: 16 and other passages). That event may occur at any hour. We have not to wait for the fulfilment of any prophecy before it occurs. The second stage of his coming will be when he comes as Judge and King. Between the two events some years will elapse. Some think three years and a half, others five, others seven. During that interval many prophecies which relate to Antichrist's persecution, the Great Tribulation, etc., will be fulfilled.

F. Jannison, Montreal, Can. What part of the world has the longest day and which the shortest?

We do not infer that you mean to include the polar regions where the day is prolonged unto months. Spitzbergen's longest day is 373 months. Finland has probably the longest regular day, viz.: 22 hours, London and Bremen 16 1-2 hours, Stockholm 18 1-2 hours, St. Petersburg 19 hours, New York 15 hours, your own city (Montreal), 16 hours. Finland has also the shortest day, viz.: 3 hours, about Christmas.

Mrs. E. M. Evans, Atlanta, Ga. What does Paul mean by the thorn in the flesh (II. Cor. 12: 7)?

Nothing is known of it except what is stated in the passage you mention. From the context it would appear to have been some physical defect which was vexatious and humiliating. A common belief which has much in its favor, especially Paul's words in Galatians 4: 15, is that it was an affection of the eyes which incapacitated him at times from reading and writing. It was evidently something painful which God permitted to fall upon him as a discipline to keep him from growing proud.

J. F. Dodd, Delaware, O. Would a Christian in extreme peril be justified in telling a lie or suppressing facts to save life or property? Might he not tell the lie trusting that God will forgive him for Christ's sake?

We cannot conceive of any circumstances which would justify a Christian in telling a lie. If by suppressing facts you mean maintaining silence under questioning, there is no sin in that. A man who would deliberately commit sin trusting to God's forgiving him must have a very distorted idea of God's government. His conscience needs to be enlightened. A child who disobeyed his father wilfully and deliberately because he felt sure of pardon would deserve very severe punishment.

Subscriber, Bayfield, Ont. Is sanctification complete at death or does it continue in Heaven?

We cannot dogmatize about the state of the believer in Heaven. So little is revealed to us about that state, that absolute knowledge is impossible. Judging by what we do know, we infer that there must be a vast increase in knowledge of God and divine things which must have its effect on the character. Then, too, to be in the presence of God, and associated with pure and holy beings and liberated from the gross influence of the flesh would, we should imagine tend to elevate and ennoble and develop the spiritual nature. Perhaps it would be more accurate to describe the progress we expect as growth and development rather than sanctification.

D. B. Alexander, Winnebago, Ill. 1. Were the principles of the Jewish Sabbath incorporated in the Christian, Lord's Day? 2. Did our first parents possess a conscience before they fell? 3. Is love the greatest thing in the world as our minister recently declared?

1. The early Christians appear to have made the Lord's Day more of a festival than the Jews did of their Sabbath. They met together to praise and pray and celebrate the Lord's Supper. It appears to have been kept free of business and worldly cares, but not to have been surrounded with the strict, and somewhat ridiculous legislation of the Jews. 2. They certainly knew, according to the account given us in the Bible, that they were doing wrong in disobeying God and that would indicate the possession of conscience. The result of their sin was to make them know good and evil which is not the function of conscience. The narrative does not say that it made them know the difference between them. 3. Your minister has Apostolic authority for his assertion. (See 1. Cor. 13: 13, R. V.)

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE DESTRUCTIVE STORM.

IT will be long before the hurricane of Aug. 24th is forgotten on the middle Atlantic coast. The experts of the Life-Saving Stations say that not since the memorable storm of August 23, 1873, twenty years ago to a day, has any storm worked such havoc. Sailing craft came limping into port for two or three days afterward bringing new stories of death and destruction. More than eighty lives are known to have been lost and there is only too certain reason for believing that hundreds have perished, of whom no news has yet been received. On land, great trees were rooted up, houses blown down, railroad tracks torn up and electric communication cut off. But it was at sea that the deadly hurricane gathered its richest harvest. There, wind and wave seemed to have made a hideous alliance to tear in pieces everything at their mercy. The stories of disaster brought in, one upon the heels of another, were appalling in their details. The crews saw other vessels capsize and founder, while they were powerless to help and expected soon to meet the same doom. A fishing vessel, after bravely battling for an hour with the elements, sank with all hands; others wrenched and buffeted with the winds sprang a leak, filled and went down with their living freight. The shores of New Jersey were literally strewed with wreckage and, here and there among it, were corpses showing how the gallant men had struggled for their lives before they had yielded. Even the vessels which outlived the storm had contributed their quota to the awful death list. Five men from one, seven from another, the captain and three men from another had been carried away by the gigantic waves and drowned. One man was taken off the top-mast of a sunken vessel who had clung there for twenty hours; all his shipmates were dead in the vessel below him. A schooner from Demerara, dismasted and battered, was brought in by a tugboat, with less than half her crew. Her captain had been hurled against the fragment of a mast by a high sea and every bone in his body crushed. Others had been swept overboard, or beaten to death by the merciless billows. Many ships must have gone down in the first moment; for the hurricane came with appalling suddenness. Happily many ships were saved by the timely warning of the Signal Service. Twelve hours before the arrival of the hurricane the danger signals were flying and, some vessels which were ready to sail, delayed their departure. They owe their preservation to observing and heeding the danger signals, as many a soul in the voyage of life has owed its safety to heeding the warnings of God's Word. (Ps. 119: 9.)

The Oldest Pensioner.

The officials of the Pension Office will have to omit one name from the list next time they make out their checks, which has long been one of unusual interest. It is that of Mrs. Anne Hyde, of Fishkill, N.Y., who died on August 25 at the age of one hundred and four years. She was the oldest of all the many pensioners on the books of the Department. She drew her pension as the widow of an officer who fought in the war of 1812. She was born in Fishkill in 1789 and lived there all her life. For many years her home has been with a grand-nephew who was very much attached to the old lady and delighted to make her old age happy. Her mind suffered no impairment to the last, and beyond a stiffness of the limbs and slight deafness, she passed her hundredth birthday with scarcely a physical ailment. After that time her sight failed her and she was no longer able to knit, or to answer the many letters which came to her from persons in all parts of the country who had made her acquaintance. Her intelligence was remarkable and her memory singularly retentive. Visitors and members of her own family were charmed with her reminiscences of her girlhood and of celebrated persons whose names have passed into history, whom she had known. She attributed her wonderful preservation of life and health to her regular habits and quiet life, and could boast on her hundredth birthday that she had never had a day of sickness. Possibly her income being absolutely secure may have contributed to her longevity. It has often been observed that Government pensioners live longer than other people. They are relieved of the anxiety about their future livelihood which preys upon the vitality of others. Even the Christian is sometimes subject to that worry from which he might be relieved if he had as much faith in the promises of God as the pensioner has in the promise of the Government. (Isa. 33 : 16.)

An International Episode.

Disturbances in Rome and other Italian cities have caused an international difficulty which has now been peacefully settled, but at one time threatened to involve serious complications. The trouble arose out of the killing of a number of Italian workmen in the French town of Aigues-Mortes. The Italians were set upon by French workmen and took refuge in a farm-house. There they were surrounded and a fierce fight ensued. The police were summoned, but appear to have made little attempt to protect the Italians, their sympathies being with their assailants. Eventually the Italians left their shelter and tried to effect their escape; but the French mob followed them, beat them brutally and killed many of them. When the news reached Italy, it aroused great indignation. The people insisted on the government compelling the French government to make quick and full reparation. In Rome they collected around the French embassy and tried to burn it. In other towns they attacked monasteries of French priests, tore down the escutcheons and committed other acts of violence. By their lawless conduct they weakened the hands of their government in dealing with France, as it had to apologize when demanding reparation. Happily for France and the peace of Europe, Italy was more magnanimous in dealing with her than she was in dealing with Siam, in a similar matter and the concessions she made were accepted. Nations, like individuals, often forget that they may have to ask for themselves the magnanimity that they refuse to show to others. As Christ taught in the parable of the unmerciful servant, they who hope for God's forgiveness must be ready to forgive those who wrong them. (Matt. 18: 23-35.)

An Appointment Refused.

A stalwart young man of soldierly bearing was introduced to the commissioners of Police in Brooklyn, N. Y., one day last week by a roundsman of the force. He wanted a position on the force and said he had had some experience as a policeman on the other side the Atlantic. The roundsman, who is an Irishman, confirmed his statement and said that he had served with him some years ago and that he had an excellent record. The applicant answered the questions put to him with so much intelligence and seemed altogether so suitable a man for the office, that he was accepted. Before he was sworn in, he was asked about his nationality and when he said he was an Englishman, he was told he would have to abjure his allegiance to the Queen. His Irish friend was taking him away to have the little formality performed, when the other protested. Did it mean, he inquired, that he was to give up his nationality and no longer be an English subject. He was told that in no other way could he obtain the appointment. He might remain in the country and earn his livelihood in some other way, but he could not be a policeman without abjuring his allegiance and becoming an American citizen. He seemed much disappointed, but said he could not take the office on those terms, and to the amazement of his Irish friend he quitted the building and went off to look for some other kind of employment. It is much to be wished that the subjects of the King of kings were equally faithful and would refuse to be engaged in any business, however congenial and lucrative it may be, that separates them from their Lord. (II. Timothy 4: 10.)

The Siren Signal.

A writer in a scientific journal gives an account of his visit to a manufactory which is the only one in the world where the device known as the siren signal is constructed. The signal is for use in dense fogs and consists of an apparatus emitting a series of penetrating shrieks at regular intervals. A brass disk perforated with a certain number of holes is fitted to the end of a steam-pipe. From the centre of the disk protrudes a pivot, which serves as an axle for another disk of the same size perforated in exactly the same places with holes of the same size. A clock-work arrangement causes the upper disk to revolve, thus bringing the holes in the two disks over each other at one instant in every revolution. When the pipe is connected with the boiler, the steam rushing through the holes, every time they are brought together by the revolution of the upper disk, gives a shrill whistle, the timbre of which depends on the size of the holes. The device is intended for use on ships or on shores where fogs are frequent and a lighthouse would be of little service. The only attention the apparatus needs is to see that the holes in the exposed disk never become obstructed. If they become filled, the warning voice is silenced and ships are liable to be wrecked. An analogous result comes in the shape of moral and spiritual wreck when the Christian is so taken up with worldly concerns that the voice of God, which should reach the world through him, is obstructed. Opportunities of warning the sinner of the danger before him come to every man, but they are often missed through absorption in the things of this life. (Ezekiel 3: 17-18.)

Walking Forty Miles to be Married.

A justice, who lives near Paterson, N J., married an interesting couple on August 22. They arrived at his house in the evening and asked him to marry them. On being questioned, the man said that he was a resident of that township, but the girl was from Rockland County, N.Y. He had been visiting in the neighborhood of the girl's home and had fallen in love with her. She had accepted him and her family had consented to the marriage. It would have taken place at her home, but the young man wanted his father's consent, which he could not get without showing him the girl he wanted to marry. She was willing to be submitted to his father's inspection, so she set out with him for his home near Paterson. As their joint possessions amounted to only fifty cents, which might be needed for wedding fees, they decided to walk the entire distance, which is forty miles. They started before dawn and arrived weary and footsore after sundown. The bridegroom's father being satisfied with his prospective daughter-in-law, they had come to the justice's house to have the ceremony performed. The bride seemed surprised that there should be any wonder at what she had done; forty miles, she said, was not much of a walk when it was to be married to a man she loved. It should be so with those who are to form the bride of Christ. The toil and hardships of their journey through this world ought to appear of small account when they remember that at the end of their pilgrimage they will sit down at the marriage-supper of the Lamb. (II. Cor. 4: 17.)

Pensioners in Suspense.

A statement recently given out for publication by Pension Commissioner Lochren has caused some little surprise, and to some people some dismay. He says that cases of fraudulent dealing in securing pensions were traced to a certain pension agent, who had a very large business, and who, under the late Administration, had become famous for his success in securing pensions for his clients. In the cases investigated, it was found that the agent had secured the pensions by perjured testimony, and by paying bribes to officials, and that he had deceived his clients, extracting from them more than the legal fees. Mr. Lochren says that the evidence of the agent's culpability was so clear that the Department decided to suspend payment of every pension he had secured, until each case had been examined on its merits. There are more than two hundred of these cases, and all have been suspended. Some of them, Mr. Lochren has no doubt, are genuine cases, in which the people are deserving of a pension, but the fact of any person employing this agent and paying him the large fees he demanded, is regarded by the Department as sufficient ground for suspecting fraud. It is naturally inferred that no one would pay a high fee to the agent, if his services entitled him to a pension, and he could secure it in a legitimate way. Some, however, may have been duped into believing that the agent had influence with the Government, and could secure a pension for them which they could not obtain without his help. There are many who have that idea in spiritual matters. They beg the prayers of a priest or a minister or a class-leader instead of going to Christ themselves, relying on his promise to cast out none who come to him in faith (John 6: 37.)

BRIEF NOTES.

To any one of our readers who will send us the names and full addresses of twenty-five church officers, church members, or Sunday School workers, we will send a beautiful section of Olive-Wood cut from the Mount of Olives, polished by native workmen in Jerusalem and bearing on its face in English and Hebrew characters the name of the Holy City.

The "Heavenly Foot Society" in China is attempting a crusade against the practice of binding the feet of women.

Rev. Henry Varley arrived last week by the Campania to fulfil an engagement with Mr. Moody to take part in the Gospel work at the World's Fair, Chicago. The Rev. John Robertson of Glasgow, has also come to assist Mr. Moody.

Rev. George C. Needham, the evangelist, has sufficiently recovered from his recent severe illness to fill the pulpit of the First Presbyterian Church, Mount Vernon, N. Y., during the absence of the Rev. Mr. Lane on a vacation.

Mr. Moody has received an invitation signed by 702 London ministers and 553 laymen asking him to conduct evangelistic services there next winter. Mr. Moody has declined on the ground that there will be pressing work to do on this side this year.

Mr. Loomis, the agent of the American Bible Society in Japan reports that many of the native students in the Universities will act as colporteurs during the vacation. There are now sixty colporteurs carrying the Bible and Bible-portions into new districts in Japan.

The members of the Needham family had a reunion recently at South Peabody, Mass., in a grove on the very spot where the first of the family settled in 1620. It has been in the possession of some member of the family ever since. Five generations were represented.

The Canadian Revue of Montreal, has been exposing the immoralities of the priests of Quebec province and the archbishop has placed the Revue under his ecclesiastical ban. The paper has commenced a suit against him for damages and the outcome of the trial is watched with interest.

The Second Presbyterian Church in Chicago recently had a reunion of its pastors on one Sunday. The opening prayer was offered by its first pastor, Dr R. W. Patterson. The sermon was preached by Dr. J. Monro Gibson, of London, the second pastor, and Dr. S. J. McPherson, the third and present pastor, closed the services.

At Dr. L. W. Munhall's recent Bible Conference at Ocean Grove, N. J., much attention was attracted by two large blocks of artificial ice placed outside the building. The blocks were three feet long, two and a half feet wide, and a foot and a half thick. In the centre was an open Bible. The type was magnified by the crystal and each word could be plainly read.

The Turkish Government has issued an edict including the Jews in the Empire in the subjects liable to conscription. The Jews are horrified at the idea of serving under the banner of Mohammed and a special fast was proclaimed by the Rabbis. The synagogues were crowded all day by men who wept and wailed while they prayed and chanted selections from the Psalms.

Considerable excitement has prevailed in the West Central African Mission over the death of King Kwikwi, who first received American missionaries, afterward expelled them from his country, and has since been alternately hot and cold toward them. In the course of the funeral ceremonies, which lasted some time, Mr. Woodside, of the American Board, found opportunities for preaching the Gospel.

Dr. Samuel D. Ferguson, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Liberia, arrived in New York on the Etruria a few days ago. He reports that the Grebo tribe have been persuaded to abandon their fetich worship and accept the Bible as their rule of life. Dr. Ferguson, who is the only colored member of the House of Bishops, says that really industrious negroes especially those having a little capital would be welcome in Liberia and would prosper. It is a poor country for lazy men.

The Inter-Denominational Bible Conference recently held under the charge of Dr. L. W. Munhall at Asbury Park, N. J., was largely attended. Among the speakers were Prof. W. H. Green of Princeton; President H. G. Weston of Crozer; Prof. Howard Osgood of Rochester; Prof. Wm. G. Moorehead of Xenia; Drs. A. J. Gordon of Boston; A. T. Pierson; and Wm. J. Erdman of Asheville, N. C. At the conclusion of the Conference a great meeting was held on the beach at which Dr. Munhall preached. Fully ten thousand people were in the audience.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

A SECURE STRONGHOLD.

Sermon Preached last Sunday, Sept. 3, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.

Text: Nahum 1: 7, "The Lord is good, a stronghold in the day of trouble; and he knoweth them that put their trust in him."

THE name of the prophet Nahum means comforter or consolation. But in the Greek and Hebrew it appears as the seventh of the minor prophets; according to a Jewish statement of dates, however, he is the sixth. But little is known of his life except that he was a native of Elkosh, a village of Galilee. According to Kitto, he prophesied in Judah after the deportation of the ten tribes, and so toward the close of the reign of Hezekiah. He gives vivid descriptions of the destruction of Nineveh and of the Assyrian monarchy; he also describes in lively colors the relief of Judah from her grievous oppression. All biblical critics speak with enthusiasm of the classic beauty of his style; they also emphasize the fact that it is as marked for its clearness as for its elegances. Its rhythm is perfect, and the thought is continuous until the close of the last chapter is reached. Jahn reminds us that the language is absolutely pure, with a single exception found in the third chapter and the seventeenth verse. Nahum was a genuine poet as well as a consecrated prophet. His language now rises to the lofty and sonorous eloquence of a true orator, and then falls into the soft and murmuring spirit of the gentle poet; but most of all is he characterized by his and his devotion to duty. A great part of the duty of the true prophet and preacher is to comfort the people of God. Nahum in foretelling the destruction of Nineveh was a rebuke to Assyria, but a comforter to Israel. The first chapter opens with a magnificent description of the infinite justice, marked tenderness, parental compassion, and irresistible power of God. The world then did not know God; the world now does not know God. A great duty of the pastor is to make God known. One class of persons represent God as too gentle to be just, and another class represent him as being too just to be kind. There are those who speak of God in harmony with the French phrase, Le bon Dieu, representing him as a weak and indulgent being, near at hand when we need him, but conveniently absent when we do not desire his presence. Others represent God as a fierce taskmaster, standing over us rod in hand waiting for an opportunity to inflict a blow. An important design of the Bible is to teach us who and what God is.

The sublime description of God which we have in the first eight verses of this chapter represents him on two sides of his nature. This description seems to involve a contradiction; but this apparent contradiction is really a sublime harmony. One might ask, how can God be a jealous and furious being and at the same time be good and slow to anger?

No Contradiction

in the opposite representations of the divine Being. The opposing descriptions of God [illegible] characters among men. The differences in these descriptions grow out of the differences in the characters of those with whom he has to do. The cloud which accompanied Israel had its dark and its bright side, according as it stood related to Israel or to Egypt. So [illegible] he stands related to holiness or to wickedness. In himself he is infinitely glorious in all his perfections; in the presence of sin he remains immaculate in holiness; in the midst of change he remains without variableness or shadow of [illegible] ing as he stands related to differing characters [illegible]

Nineveh knew not God. God must, therefore [illegible] to her attitude toward him. God's wrath is here revealed against his enemies; but his [illegible] There is a true sense in which it may be said, that as we are toward God so is he toward us. His power is always infinite whether manifested in mercy toward his people, or in wrath toward his enemies. The greatness of his power and the terribleness of his wrath are the dark background against which the tenderness of his love and the manifestation of his goodness may appear in brighter colors. In the text God manifests his favor toward his people in the midst of the glowing descriptions of his power which makes the mountains quake, the hills melt, and the earth burn at his presence. It is impossible to find in any other literature than the Bible so majestic a description of great truths as we here find.

The Infinite Goodness.

Two beautiful thoughts are brought before us with special prominence in this text; first, the character here given to God; and, second, the description of the people of God. God is represented as being good, "the Lord is good." This is the language of all God's people in all the ages of his church. They are ready to say at all times, "O taste and see that the Lord is good." He is infinitely good in all the perfections of his nature; good in all the works of his hands; good in all the dealings of his providence; as good when inflicting deserved punishment upon sin as when rewarding virtue. Popular etymology has long made the word "God" to be a contraction of "good," and even though this derivation maybe shown to be incorrect, God still stands as the sum of all good in all his characteristics in himself, and in all his relations to his creatures. God's justice is simply his holiness flaming out in righteous wrath against human guilt. One of the very first experiences of the new-born soul is a deep sense of the goodness, long suffering and tender mercy of God. His goodness toward us can be matched only by our sinfulness toward him. His goodness is from everlasting to everlasting. No men doubt the goodness of God except those whose badness is conspicuous to their fellow men. God punishes sin simply because he is good; his severity against wrong is evermore the offspring of his love. The purer and truer a man is the more he resents a wrong done to his mother, his wife, or his child. The man who in such circumstances would not flash out his righteous indignation is not worthy the name of man. If God did not punish wrong, he would not be entitled to our respect. Eternal right demands eternal Punishment of Eternal Wrong.

God's punishment of sin secures the approval of every thoughtful human being. The atonement for sin made by Jesus Christ meets the demand of human as well as of divine justice. But those who are in Christ by a living and loving faith are not exposed to the wrath of God. It can be said of them now as when the apostle Paul wrote, "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus." Christ bore their sins in his own body on the tree. They are reconciled to God, and God is reconciled to them in Jesus Christ. Jesus Christ is the meeting place between a sinful soul and a holy God. All true believers are now able to say with the psalmist, "all the paths of the Lord are mercy and truth unto such as keep his covenant and his testimonies." True believers are dear to God as the apple of the eye; they are engraven on the palms of his hands. He rebukes them because he loves them; he chastens them because he esteems them; he places them in the furnace simply that he may consume the dross and refine the gold.

God is also represented in this text as being "a stronghold in the day of trouble." It is a striking and blessed name which is here applied to God. It suggests thoughts concerning him which awaken hope, inspire confidence, and enkindle zeal. It is true that the word reminds us of our exposure to danger, and this suggestion is in entire harmony with the facts of daily experience. We are exposed to serious danger; we are in an enemy's country. Parts of this territory have been captured for the Captain of our salvation, but great portions of the territory are still in the hands of his and our enemy. In many of the captured places he has erected a stronghold for the honor of his name and for the protection of his people; and this stronghold is a place of security from danger and of safety from serious attacks. A stronghold is a place of defence, fortified perhaps partly by nature and greatly by art. In a stronghold a small force is mighty against vastly superior numbers. It is this truth which made Thermopylæ so dangerous a pass, and which makes Quebec and Gibraltar almost impregnable fortresses. It is very blessed to observe here that God is especially a stronghold

"In the Day of Trouble."

Such a day is sure to come to every Christian believer. When most we need God we can have most of him. When men are rich, strong and great they can have most of the world; but when misfortunes come and they are weak and helpless, the world transfers its honors and affection from them to those who can reward it in kind. Many other words of Scripture set forth a similar truth, "the name of the Lord is a strong tower; the righteous runneth into it, and is safe." The psalmist strikes the same note, "the Lord is my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer; my God, my strength, in whom I will trust; my buckler and the horn of my salvation, and my high tower;" "for thou hast been a shelter for me, and a strong tower from the enemy." When we walk about Zion we discover that she has mighty bulwarks and lofty towers. Every attribute of God is a stronghold for his saints. Is it the day of trouble for any soul in this audience? Then know that God waits to be your strong tower, your sure stronghold, and your firm bulwark. Listen to the inspired exhortation, "Turn you to the stronghold, ye prisoners of hope." It is glorious to preach a Gospel which presents God as so mighty and yet so tender, so terrible to his foes and so loving to his friends. All his people in all the ages have found him to be their sure deliverance in the day of trouble. Let us again with the psalmist say, "for in the time of trouble he shall hide me in his pavilion." Into this pavilion no foe can come, and to the high rock, on which he sets us, no wave of sorrow can rise.

Personal Acquaintance.

Another characteristic of God is here given. "He knoweth them that trust in him." Our attention is often called in the Bible to the fact that "the Lord knoweth the way of the righteous." His knowledge of us is personal, peculiar, and discriminating. He knows his sheep by name, and the sheep know his voice: the knowledge between God and his people is mutual. He enters into a kind of secret relationship with each one of His children. His people have secrets between their souls and their Lord. They communicate with him by a sort of telegraphic cipher which only he and they can understand. This fact is suggested by the statement in Revelation regarding the white stone which is given to each of the saints with a name known only to the giver and the receiver. If there be two persons in this audience who know a fact of importance, which is known to them alone, these two stand in special relations to each other, and are so far separated from all others present. Such a relationship exists between God and each one of his children. He knows men in the mass because he knows each soul individually. He loved the disciples as a whole because he loved each disciple in a personal way. He had his chosen three within the circle of the chosen twelve. Peter, James, and John rightly stood in special relations to Jesus Christ. They were with him at the time of the raising of the daughter of Jairus, with him on the Mount of Transfiguration glory, and with him in the deeper recess of the garden when the wave of sorrow rolled over his soul. He loved all who gathered about him in social relations; but he had a special love for Martha and Mary and their brother Lazarus. He not only calleth his own sheep by name, but "he telleth the number of stars; he calleth them all by their names." Jesus is with God on behalf of his people; and the Holy spirit is the advocate with us on behalf of God. In some Oriental countries in ancient times, it was common for those who were summoned to appear before courts to have friends come as their patrons; these were called in Greek, paracletes, and in Latin, advocates. They were not hired pleaders; their services were entirely gratuitous. They were generally men of large social influence, sometimes of great political power, and they stood by the person arraigned before the tribunal, to give him the benefit of their legal knowledge, their social influence and their help in every way possible. Exactly that idea is in the service which Christ performs as our advocate. Sometimes we think we are alone, fighting the battle of life; but this conclusion is utterly erroneous. God fulfils his promise still that he will never leave nor forsake us. Let us trust him with our whole hearts; let us lean on his strong arm, and when weary with life's trials let us pillow our head on his loving heart.

We now reach the second thought in this text. The description here given of the people of God,—"they that trust in him." Many names are given in the Word of God as descriptive of the people of God. They are sometimes called "believers," as faith in God forms so prominent an element in their lives; they are often called "brethren," because fraternal affection should mark all their relations with one another; they are called "disciples," because they sit as pupils at Jesus' feet; they are sometimes called "saints," because holiness unto the Lord marks, or should mark, all the thoughts of their hearts and the actions of their lives. But whatever title may be given them the thought of trust or faith underlies every description. Sometimes in the Bible all of religion is suggested by a single word; that word may be faith, hope, love, joy, peace, or some similar expression. In this text trust is that word. Trust, rightly understood, includes all of religion. Like the thought of trust runs through the Bible. It must, however, be trust in God himself as a living, loving, personal God, Father, and Saviour. Our trust is not simply to be in the Bible, not in any revelation of God merely, but in God himself. All revelations of God are to be but the channel through which he comes to us in love, and through which we go to him in trust. When we give God our unquestioning trust he gives us his unbroken peace. We cannot expect that peace except we exercise this trust. Such faith is often on our lips, but it is too rarely practically in our lives. We fail to trust God because we do not rightly know God; "they that know thy name will put their trust in thee;" "but he that trusteth in the Lord, mercy shall compass him about;" "what time I am afraid, I will trust in thee;" "trust in the Lord with all thine heart and lean not unto thine own understanding;" "thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee; because he trusteth in thee;" "trust ye in the Lord forever; for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength." This present trust has been the characteristic of God's people in all generations. Of our spiritual fathers it is said, "our fathers trusted in thee." Abraham, Moses and Job, David and Daniel were heroes of faith, and so were true soldiers of God. Faith rises to its loftiest height when it can say, "though he slay me yet will I trust him." The same marks the life of the noble Paul, and of our blessed Lord himself. Trust in God, when rightly understood, becomes a dominant characteristic and an inspiring motive in our daily lives. It is not simply the profession of our lips but is the working principle in our lives. Such trust rests on God's eternal promise and knows that it never will be moved. Faith in the Lord Jesus is the beginning of true Christian life in the soul.

Spirit of Faith

Do you trust him as your personal Saviour? Are you one of God's dear people? Only as you trust in God can you claim him as your Saviour from sin and your stronghold in the day of trouble. If you do not so trust him then you have neither part nor lot in God as your stronghold. Only as we walk by faith and not by sight can we now get glimpses of the king in his beauty and cherish the hope of at last seeing him as he is. Only as we can say with deep humility and yet holy joy, "I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day," can we be sure that for us "The Lord is good, a stronghold in the day of trouble." If we have never so sheltered ourselves in God let me now, out of a full heart, give you this inspired exhortation, "turn you to the stronghold, ye prisoners of hope;" and then shall you by a blessed experience know that "the name of the Lord is a strong tower; the righteous runneth into it, and is safe."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

HOW THE MONEY CAME.*

WHERE did he get these 118,000 crowns? Did he send begging letters? Did he go to Holland, or cross to England, or ask a subsidy from the State? He is a foe to beggars. He will not tolerate them in his parish; his doctrine is that no Christian dare be a beggar, nor ask from any but God. No one acts so rigorously on these principles as himself. His scruples are almost prohibitory Beyond the barest outline of accounts, he excludes money matters and money difficulties from his paper; though the people are prepared with alms at the annual festival, he never speaks of his wants, nor asks a donation; when he is in urgent difficulty about money, he persists in silence. This may look singular and absurd. But it is not more singular that he has never found this course of conduct to mislead or disappoint him; that he has found his straightforward asking of God abundantly sufficient? When a man makes that discovery, who can blame him for using it?

Before his own paper was established, Harms put a brief report of his proceedings in two of the country newspapers. The unlikelihood of that report reaching far is self-evident, but almost simultaneously contributions came from New Orleans, Antwerp, Amsterdam, Odessa, and Narva. Harms has no doubt how they came. God put it into men's hearts. This is a cardinal point of his faith. "I can assure you," says Harms, "that to the question, Shall we print? we did not answer, Certainly we can; but we cried to the Lord, grant it to us. And he granted it, for we immediately received 2,000 crowns, although the thought had not been told to anyone; we had only to take and be thankful." "A short time ago I had to pay a merchant in behalf of the missions 550 crowns, and when the day was near I had only 400. Then I prayed to the Lord Jesus that he would provide me with the deficiency. On the day before, three letters were brought, one from Schwerin with 20, one from Bucksburg with 25, and one from Berlin with 100 crowns. The donors were anonymous. On the evening of the same day, a laborer brought me ten crowns, so that I had not only enough, but five over" "I must tell you what brought the tears into my eyes, and confirmed me anew in that word, before they call I will answer. A medicine chest was urgently wanted for the mission. I reckoned up to see if there was enough left to supply it. Before I had finished, and when I had not yet well begun to commend this matter to the Lord, a letter was brought, in which the anonymous writer stated that for some time he had been collecting for the mission, and had determined to purchase a medicine chest. The chest accompanied the letter; he only begged it might soon be sent out for the heathen." When the Refuge was projected, the great obstacle was want of money. After prayer, a pious farmer met him and asked him to mention any way in which he could assist the work, "I took it as a sign from the Lord, and mentioned to him what was in my heart. He sent me, through his wife, who was of one mind with him, 500 crowns. Immediately after the merchant sent me 10, a pastor 100, and then came anonymously 100 crowns. Meanwhile I had not made my intention known." "The year before," he wrote in 1858, "I needed for the mission 15,000 crowns, and the Lord gave me that and 60 over. This year I needed double, and the Lord has given me double and 140 over."

I have placed these extracts loosely together because they show with great clearness what Mr. Harms believes about his missions, and to what he attributes their success. There is nothing he insists upon with greater earnestness than that, be the expenses what they may, let them increase ever so suddenly, he has never begged. There is nothing he more enjoys telling than that he has prayed for every want, and that without special prayer he has received support in his life of faith.

THE ORIGIN OF THE COAT†

As the tunic came to be worn tight and close-fitting, an important change occurred in its general cut. It is hard to get into a tight tunic, unless it is very elastic, harder yet to struggle out of it. To facilitate these processes it has always been necessary, when the tunic was high in the neck, to cut it open for a little way down the front, and to fasten together the opening thus made with buttons. But when tunics came to be worn very tight, about time of the Renaissance, the opening was extended to the very bottom of the tunic. After a while it became the fashion to leave the tight outer tunic altogether unbuttoned, except in cold weather. Thus the garment which had been worn from the very earliest times, and called by a hundred different names, such as chiton, tunica, cotte, without any change of general character, suffered its first essential modification, and became the modern coat. The same garment when short is the jacket, when short and sleeveless the waistcoat.

Trousers appear to have been introduced into Rome at a comparatively late period, and as a part of the military uniform. They are worn by the Roman soldiers represented on Trajan's column, as well as by barbarians. The Greeks had never adopted them. With their instinctive sense of beauty they had recognized that these are the only garments that cannot possibly be made graceful. A sleeve may become a part of the drapery of a figure, a trouser-leg is more obstinate in its ugliness. If tight it bags at the knees on the thirdwearing. Yet this is perhaps its least objectionable shape. If somewhat loosely it takes petty and meaningless folds. Some Oriental nations have tried to disguise it as a sklrt, but the result is not entirely satisfactory. If the trousers do not appear to give freedom to the leg they have lost their principal merit. Compromise, which is the life of politics, is the death of art, which should always struggle after an ideal. So thought the Greeks when they entirely renounced for themselves the pantaloons.

THE BEAUTIFUL*

BEAUTIFUL faces are those that wear—
It matters little if dark or fair—
Whole-souled honesty printed there.

Beautiful eyes are those that show,
Like crystal panes, where earth-fires glow,
Beautiful thoughts that burn below.

Beautiful hands are those that do
Work that is earnest and brave and true,
Moment by moment the long day through.

Beautiful feet are those that go
On kindly ministry to and fro,
Down lowly ways, if God wills it so.

Beautiful shoulders are those that bear
Ceaseless burdens of homely care
With patience, grace and daily prayer.

Beautiful lives are those that bless—
Silent rivers of happiness,
Whose hidden fountains but few may guess.

Beautiful twilight at set of sun,
Beautiful goal with race well run,
Beautiful rest with work well done.

Beautiful grave where grasses creep,
Where brown leaves fall, where drifts lie deep
Over worn-out hands—oh, beautiful sleep!

The Lord's Warnings.*

Two Predictions Referring to Two Distinct Events Which are Often Misunderstood.

THE more carefully we compare Luke's report of the Lord's prophetic discourse with the reports given by Matthew and Mark, the more evident is it that the first two Evangelists are reporting one part of it and the third Evangelist another part of it. Matthew and Mark report the portion in which Christ is describing the events of his second coming, while Luke records the events relating to the impending siege of Jerusalem. The warning given by our Lord, as recorded in Matt. 24: 16, and Mark 13: 14, to those that be in Judea to flee to the mountains is the only part of their reports which has its exact counterpart in Luke's report and it applies equally to both events. There is, however, one point of difference as to that. The element of extreme haste which is prominent in Matthew and Mark is absent in Luke. The reason is obvius. Under no conceivable circumstances could the approach of a besieging army be so sudden as to leave a man no time to go down to the house to take anything out—no time to traverse the length of a field to take up his laid off clothes; and we cannot charge our Saviour with having in these words enjoined undue or needless haste. What, moreover, as a fact, took place at the time of the siege of Jerusalem? Everything in justification and literal fulfilment of our Lord's words as contained in Luke; and nothing that appears so obviously a fulfilment of our Lord's words as recorded by Matthew and Mark.

Jerusalem was encompassed by a Roman army under Cestius Gallus—and there was the sign. In a manner which Josephus describes as quite unaccountable, he withdrew; and the Christians, observant of our Lord's warning, retired to Pella and other places. But there was no need of the precipitate haste which the other sign would demand; nearly three years elapsed before the city was surrounded by Titus. If it were winter, therefore, flight might safely be delayed for more favorable weather, and certainly there was no such haste as rendered it imperative to fly, even though it might be the Sabbath day. In these particulars, therefore, we see what is quite inapplicable to the circumstances attendant on the Roman siege. To what events, then, you will say, are the injunctions found in Matthew and Mark applicable? To a siege of Jerusalem which is still future. At the time of the end as we learn from Joel and Zechariah, immediately before our Lord's Second Advent, Jerusalem will again be besieged and taken; and from Daniel we may gather that the wilful king at the head of the confederacy of the nations, will probably set upon Mount Zion some anti-Christian or Infidel altar. This would constitute the sign to flee—and from what? Surely from the impending earthquake described by Zechariah, in which it may well be supposed much of the city can hardly fail to be destroyed, and with it large numbers of the inhabitants.

In view of such a calamity, we can understand why our Lord urges such headlong haste as Matthew and Mark record. A moment's delay might be fatal. Whether in winter or summer, week-day or Sabbath Day, whether in the city or in the fields round about, even if only within the limits of what was understood by "Judea" instant flight only could secure safety; for any moment the Lord might stand on the Mount of Olives, and the overwhelming earthquake take place. The event, whatever it may be, presented to our Lord's prescient eye, no resemblance to an invading army. He did not say, "As it was in the days of Jehoiachin," or "as it was in the days of Zedekiah," when Nebuchadnezzar and all his army came against Jerusalem—but "as it was in the days of Noah"—"as it was in the days of Lot"—"even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of Man is revealed." And mark what follows: "In that day, he which shall be upon the housetop, and his staff in the house, let him not come down to take it away; and he that is in the field, let him likewise not return back." Can we avoid the conclusion that the day when the Abomination of Desolation shall be seen to stand in the holy place, is immediately connected with the day when the Son of Man is revealed?

To sum up, it may be urged that the view contended for seems consistent with the probable circumstances under which Matthew and Mark wrote their Gospels. It finds the parallel to Matt. 24, and Mark 13, in Luke 17, rather than in Luke 21, and in fact, clears the interpretation of all those difficulties and ambiguities which were regarded as inseparable from it.

LIGHT-GIVING.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Sept. 17. Rom 14. 21: Matt. 5: 6

LIGHT-BEARING and light-giving are expected of every Christian. "Ye are the light of the world," was Christ's own declaration. Elsewhere we are taught that "the spirit of man is the candle of the Lord." It is the divine nature imparted and placed in the earthen vessel that it may give light to others. As the light of the candle is the same in its essence as the light of the sun, so the divine life in every regenerated man is the same in its nature, however infinitesimal in degree, as that of the Deity. The world should see God in the Christian. It should see in his life the gentleness, the forbearance, the love, the tenderness which in their glorious perfection exist in God. It should learn something of what God is by what his children are. That it does draw that inference may be learned by conversation with almost any unconverted man or woman. One of the unfailing, stock arguments of opposers of Christianity is the inconsistency of professing Christians. They contend that Christians are like other men, selfish, unjust, contentious, unfeeling and that, therefore, there is no power in Christianity. Thus the Christian's example, with or without his consent has its effect. Men are estimating religion by the conduct of its professors. The responsibility of the Christian is consequently enormous. Is he misrepresenting his Lord? When he is tested in his conduct a copy of the Saviour's? Under undeserved abuse, under persecution, contumely and scorn, is he patient as Christ was? If he is not, his Lord suffers. He may be conscious that the fault is his own, but the world does not draw the distinction. It regards him as the accredited representative of Christ and judges of the Master by the servant. Thus the word preached is continually being tested, clumsily and on wrong principles, but with effect. "Christ can do this and thus for you," says the preacher to the worldling, "keeping you from sin, changing your nature, purifying and ennobling you." The worldling turns to the Christian and looks at him to see if the preacher's words are true. If he sees the Christian is not such a man as the speaker describes, he thinks the preacher has overestimated the power. It is so in other matters. A physician who professed to cure a certain disease would not have the confidence of the public if men who had been his patients were still suffering from the malady. It would be useless for him to explain that the patients were still suffering through having disregarded his injunctions; he would be regarded as responsible and his treatment be discredited. If his treatment were really genuine and if the patients who were treated by him might be cured by obeying his injunctions, how great an injury those patients would do both to the physician and to other sufferers! Men who might go and be cured would stay away because they had no faith and the physician would be deprived of patients. Thus it is with Christ, and so to every follower whom he has saved and cleansed goes forth, in the most pathetic accents, the appeal, "Let your light so shine before men . . . that they may glorify your Father."

IDENTIFIED BY THE CROSS

A young student who is one of a party engaged during the vacation in Christian work among the [illegible] in one of the city hospitals, in company with the pastor of the Mariner's Temple, distributing flowers to the patients. As we entered the childrens ward we observed that some one had [illegible] flowers was standing in a vase upon the table. "Some one has been here before us," I said to a woman who was sitting there with a child upon her knee. "Yes," she replied with a pleasant smile, "a very nice young lady came. I do not know her name, or where she came from, but she wore a little silver cross."

After a brief conversation we passed out of the ward with the woman's words fastened deeply in our mind. "But she wore a little silver cross upon her breast." That explained all. A daughter of the King had been there. It was the hidden meaning which she saw in the "little silver cross upon her breast" that prompted her hands to gather those flowers, that guided her feet to the hospital, that inspired the words of helpful sympathy to the needy ones there. "I do not know her name." Perhaps it were better so. The deed was done "In His Name," not in hers. It matters little if the name of the bearer is forgotten, if only the cross is seen. "God forbid that I should glory," says the apostle, "save in the cross."

THE BUILDING OF THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION, OF WICHITA, KANS.

was $75,000. The building is a notable illustration of the power of Western enterprise, for the population of the city was not over thirty-five thousand at the last census and the Association is not over eight years old. That under such circumstances so imposing an edifice should have been erected and more than two-thirds of the purchase money paid is astonishing. Our Kansas friends evidently have strong faith in their city growing and in the probability of the new citizens being of the class that will need a meeting-place of a Christian character. People who regard Christianity as antiquated and tending to become obsolete have plainly no representatives among the Association of this go-ahead Western city. The present membership of the Association is 277 of whom about one-third are on the active list. They have regular religious meetings with good attendance and there is also a well-conducted Bible Class. A library of six hundred volumes and a reading-room with newspapers, magazines, etc., are important and much appreciated features of the Association. Beside these, there is a well-equipped gymnasium, baths, etc. The Wichita Association deserves congratulation not only on its handsome home but on its enterprise and foresight.

AN EPWORTH TRAINING SCHOOL.

A suggestion has been made to Epworth Leagues which appears likely to be generally adopted, if we judge from the favorable reception it has met with in influential quarters. The idea is to have a practical training school for Leaguers in connection with the District Conventions. It has been found that many young people, really in earnest, join the League, as they do other organizations, who are unable to do effective work because they lack training. They wish to help, but do not know how. This difficulty is met with in all departments and it is suggested that if some practical instruction could be given, the young people would gladly avail themselves of it and would become more useful and efficient members. A writer in the Epworth Herald who strongly advocates the plan has prepared an outline of such a school of which the following are the chief features:

The chief aims of the training school are: 1. To promote the spirituality of those who attend. 2. To train the young people in practical methods of league work. 3. To afford encouragement and training to Sunday School teachers and workers.

The event of a training school being held should be widely advertised. A careful survey should be made of the entire field and a competent worker in each of the league departments selected to act as a leader of that department during the training-school. The appointments should be made so as to give ample time for preparation. In addition a thoroughly competent helper or two might be called in from a near-by district, or even from a distance, whose suggestions and inspiration would be valuable. Two full days should be given to the school. The delegates should not come for social pleasure nor even for religious enjoyment. These things will naturally be gained by those who attend, but the training school is not intended to provide "a good time" for anyone. It is designed for work.

Such a programme as the following would be effective: Meeting called to order at 8 A. M. Half an hour for devotions. An excellent opportunity to give a sample of an ideal devotional meeting. From nine to ten hold a Sunday School teachers' training class. Have a leader who knows how. The design is to show these young people how to teach the Word, why they have measurably failed, and how they may overcome obstacles. At 10 o'clock begin your "mercy and help" hour. Leader leads off with a ten-minute outline. Then twenty minutes may be devoted to "experiences" (one minute each) on different phases of the work. Then a twenty minute "quiz." A lively song now to rest the people. Then you are ready for your "literary" hour. Subdivide and take only a portion of the work today; the rest to-morrow morning. Talk about the reading course, for instance. Pursue about the same plan as during the "mercy and help" hour.

The first thing after devotions in the afternoon hold a model "business meeting" on the platform, so all can see and hear. Then let the president bring out some points learned from the model meeting. At 4 o'clock your Junior leader will conduct a model Junior League meeting. That may run a half-hour, and, after the children have been excused, the workers may talk about what they have heard and ask questions.

The evening session should be the great meeting of the day. Devote it to the department of "spiritual work." At first you might take up the question of how to get the most out of the weekly devotional meeting, or how the league may render more aid to the Sunday School or some such theme. But before long bring the thought of everyone to the one vital theme of this department, "How shall we win souls?" A half hour of experiences confined to this point may begin at about half-past eight. Then close with a pentecostal service. Two such days would be popular and stimulating, and confer upon every district League a degree of intellectual and spiritual inspiration that would push forward the work mightily in every corner of the land.

THE B. Y. P. U. PROGRAMME.

In an earnest letter to the Unions of Baptist Young People, Mr. Frank Harvey Field, whose portrait appeared in this journal last week, appeals to every Union to adopt the Christian Culture Courses familiarly known as "the three C's." He says: The whole purpose of the Young People's movement is the training of Baptist young people, not only for Christian service, but in knowledge of our distinctive principles and our denominational history.

A series of thirty lessons, prepared by Mr. Henry C. Vedder, under the general title of "The Dawn of Christianity; or Studies of the Apostolic Church," have been prepared and will shortly be published. This course of lessons will cover the entire field of Baptist principles and polity. By this is not meant that they will constitute a treatise on systematic theology, but that in tracing the organization and history of the Apostolic Church the distinctive beliefs of Baptists must necessarily be expounded and discussed.

Besides this course of lessons, the managers have provided courses in Bible study and missionary study. The Bible Readers' Course, in charge of Professor Ira M. Price, Ph.D., of the University of Chicago, will finish the historical books of the Bible and begin the prophetical books; the Conquest Missionary Course will study one mission field per month during the year, under the guidance of Sophia Bronson Titterington, the well-known missionary author. In every young people's organization, if there is not already an educational committee, let one be appointed now. This is a practical way by which all organizations of whatever name can affiliate with the B.Y.P.U.A. No Christian Endeavor Society, no independent society of Baptist young people, need change its name or alter its former methods of work; it need only add the educational committee to its already existing agencies, and the thing is done, so far as organization is concerned. Then let this committe, with the advice and direction of the pastor, arrange a class for the systematic study of these lessons. At the end of the course there will be an examination for all who choose to enter, and this, it is hoped, will be every one who joins a class and pursues the course.

Three banners will be presented at the International convention at Toronto, in 1894, one for each of the C. C. C's. Each banner will be given to the State or provincial Union whose total local records show the largest results in the course—it being understood that no one State or provincial Union can take more than one banner.

The Christian Endeavor Societies of the Maritime Provinces held their annual Convention this year at Halifax, N. S. 450 delegates were in attendance. The reports showed that there are in the union 397 societies; viz., Nova Scotia, 269; New Brunswick, 96; Prince Edward Island, 21; Trinidad and Bermuda, 7 and Newfoundland 4. Six evangelical denominations are represented: The Presbyterians lead, with 235 societies; Methodists, 65; Baptists, 31; Congregational, 16; Reformed Episcopalians, 2; Disciples of Christ, 2; and there are also 43 union societies.

Execution by Elephant.

A Frightful Form of Brutality in India, which Christian Civilization has Suppressed

SLOWLY but surely, the superstition and idolatry which have for long ages prevailed in India, are passing away before the benign influence of the Gospel. Many of the most frightful cruelties, which were countenanced and even encouraged by the Brahmin, Buddhist, and Parsee priests, have been abolished; but instances yet occur in localities remote from Christian influence, showing that the barbarism of centuries is not to be easily effaced.

In India, and indeed in all densely-populated Asiatic countries, human life is held very cheaply. It is true that there are no longer deliberate sacrifices of human beings at the great Juggernath festival, as formerly, and that the grim and terrible black goddess, Kali, the patron deity of the city of Calcutta, does not now exact her tribute of victims as she did at no very remote period. The suttee, whereby infatuated women submitted themselves to be burned on the funeral pyre of their dead husbands, is a thing of the past. Even the Khands and the Oriyahs, tribes of the hill provinces, are abandoning the abhorrent system of sacrifice to the Earth-Spirit, whom they believe to be in opposition to the Supreme Deity and whom they consequently try to appease with human blood. The victims of this peculiar barbarism were called "Meriah;" they were of either sex and were trained, delicately cared for and consecrated to the death that awaited them at the annual festival of the goddess Tari, which was held in a grove, after the manner of the ancient Druids. But there are still many places in India where the spirit of revolting cruelty lingers and at times breaks out in a manner which proves, far more strongly than mere words can express, how much remains to be done before that vast land can be wholly brought under the gentle dominion of the Saviour.

Baroda, or Varodah, the capital of the Guicowars, ("cattle kings,") is situated in a beautiful country, thickly populated, and abounding in temples, mosques, mausoleums and fortresses. Here elephants are trained for riding, hunting, war, and even as executioners and combatants. An elephant duel is one of the popular excitements, just as a bull-fight is in Madrid or the City of Mexico. The Guicowar or hereditary prince rarely goes out, even to worship, in a carriage, prefering to ride elephant-back. Nowhere in India were the people more completely given up to idolatry than in Baroda where a multitude of gods and goddesses, painted and otherwise, were worshipped, and the number of priests and priestesses was simply amazing. Under its present progressive and enlightened ruler, Baroda is emerging from its long thraldom of priestcraft and superstition, and many of the old-time barbarities have been abandoned, including the revolting spectacle of execution by elephant.

The last elephant execution in Baroda—and indeed in all India—was a memorable one. An attempt had been made on the life of the prince, Guicowar Khandi Rao, and an investigation disclosed the fact that the originator of the plot was a brother, and the prospective successor of the then regent, Mulhar Rao. The conspiracy was one in which a number of persons were involved. Mulhar Rao was sent to the fortress as a prisoner of state, and the man who made the murderous attempt was condemned to death by elephant. At that time there was a special street set apart for the carrying out of such sentences—a mode of death then not infrequent. The use of the elephant as an executioner did not offend the Hindoo view, as they held that a man should not be killed by men. In this instance, the sentence was carried into effect at a point outside the walls of Baroda. The scene—one apparently never to be repeated in India—was witnessed by the French traveler, Louis Rousselet, and a companion, and one of these gentlemen made the sketch from which the illustration on this page is taken. When it is remembered that the average full-grown elephant weighs about 6,000 pounds, and possesses the most colossal limbs of any creature living, the brutality of employing such a monster as a public executioner is apparent. Among the heathen nations of the world there are many hideous ways of inflicting the death penalty, but probably none is more revolting than this, where the huge pachyderm,

> Whose massive joints are not for courtesy;
> Whose legs are for necessity, not flexure, places his unwieldy foot on the head of the hapless victim, and, emitting a fierce, trumpet-like roar of anger, crushes the skull as though it were no thicker than a hazel-nut, bespattering the ground with blood and brains. The elephants used for such purposes were always the strongest and most powerful animals. They were fed with nourishment of an intoxicating character to excite them to greater rage and ferocity.

Similar executions were also held in Poonah in former years, but there, too, they have been discontinued. Thus the Hindoo, though he may not relinquish his ancient religion wholly, pays the tribute of recognition to the refining influence of Christian civilization.

A Home Engagement.

"My father did a strange thing a few nights ago," remarked a young man, who had been growing so accustomed to spending his evenings outdoors that his own household saw very little of him. "'Are you engaged for tomorrow night?' he asked me. 'If not, I'd like you to go somewhere with me.' 'All right,' I said; 'where shall I meet you.' He leaves the office about an hour before I can get my work finished. He suggested a restaurant at 7.30, and I was there, prepared for a quiet lecture on late hours. But when he appeared, he said he wanted me to call on a lady with him. 'One I knew quite well when I was a young man,' he explained. We went out, and started straight for home. 'She is stopping at the house,' he said, when I spoke of it. I thought it strange that he should have made the appointment for the restaurant under those circumstances, but I said nothing. Well, we went in, and I was introduced with due formality to my mother and sister! The situation was ludicrous, and I began to laugh, but the laugh died away. None of the three even smiled. My mother and my sister both shook hands with me, and my mother said she remembered me as a boy, but hadn't seen much of me lately. Then she invited me to be seated. It wasn't a bit funny then, though I can laugh over it now. I sat down and she told me one or two stories of my boyhood, at which we all laughed a little. When I finally retired, I was courteously invited to call again. I went upstairs, feeling pretty small, and doing a good deal of thinking. Then I made up my mind that my mother was a most entertaining woman, and my sister a bright and brilliant girl. Now I'm going to 'call again,' as I have been doing quite regularly for the last week. I enjoy their company, and I intend to cultivate their acquaintance."

WORSHIP IN THE FAMILY.

FAIR is the sight by Israel's psalmist sung,
Of those whom God hath in one household joined,
In peace, and unity, and love combined;
Most fair, when all assemble, old and young,
Parents and children, those who serve; among Those whom they serve; with social feelings kind
Each to the other, and with knees inclined
In patriarchal worship, heart and tongue.
List to the Saviour's words! "Where two or three Meet in my name, there in the midst am I."
Believe, and welcome to thy family
The gracious Guest: and by his blessing try,
How much domestic bliss and amity
Hangs on domestic worship's hallowing tie!

THE TRUE HOSTESS.

IF we live true lives, we can bring our friends home at any time that we choose to invite them, and we need not apologize for the simple fare. They will appreciate the old scriptural adage: "Better is a dinner of herbs, where love is, than a stalled ox and hatred therewith." She indeed is the truest hostess who makes her guests feel more at their ease, who, in the plain old Saxon, can make them at home. The opening of dusty shut-up parlors, which smell of moth-eaten carpets, the parade of the best china on the table with trembling care, lest a piece be broken, the setting forth of so elaborate a menu that it tends to gluttony, will never make our friends "at home."

If our parlors are always open, and we have no bric-a-brac too fragile to be admired by all the family, if no part of the house is too good for our own living, to be made use of whenever necessary; if, in short, we sacrifice entirely that gloomy sepulchral room, which is still maintained in many old families — the state parlor—we shall live much more natural, easy lives. We can then receive our friends into the living room, make them at home to the best that we have for ourselves, and we may always be satisfied that it pleases them better than any effort of strained hospitality.

She learns to be a true hostess who gives her guests their freedom, ever watchful of their wants, yet never allowing them to be aware of that watchfulness.

The Child of Many Prayers.

Toplady had been the child of many prayers, but to all the entreaties of his pious mother and others he answered by inwardly resolving not to become a Christian. When he and his mother were on a visit to Ireland, on the Lord's Day they went to a place where a good man was going to preach. He was very earnest in his sermon, and put the question to the unsaved present, whether they would give themselves to Christ or remain rebels? Every time the young man said in his own heart: "I will not yield, I will not yield." His heart was hardened against God's grace, and at the close of the sermon it seemed to be harder than ever it had been. When the sermon was finished, the minister gave out a hymn:

> Come, ye sinners, poor and needy,
> Weak and wounded, sick and sore.

The congregation, stirred by the earnest sermon, sang the hymn with their whole heart; and what a sermon could not do, the singing of the hymn did. It broke the hard, unyielding heart. He found God and gave himself to him. He lived to be an honored preacher of the Gospel.

Make the Table Pleasant.

Does it ever occur to you that the daily gathering around the family board is an opportunity for the pleasantest as well as the most lasting impressions? Nowhere are the amenities of life more enjoyable nor more quickly recognized than at the table. There, too, not only family affairs are discussed, but those of the State and nation. It is the place for ideas to be exchanged, the place for good cheer and sympathy. The common interests, the pleasant familiarity with different individual tastes combine to make each meal a pleasant season. Can you not recall delightful letters from some old friend that gave an unwonted zest to the dinners where they were read, or the amusing story your father told when he laughed until he cried? It was the tired, overworked wife of a poor minister that contrived to brighten her table as well as her children by placing at every plate a spray of red clover blossoms.

So when providing dainty appointments for the table and appetizing dishes, forget not to secure all the graciousness that you admire, some table-talk of charming things, some good thought, or helpful work to make it pleasant.

SUMMARY OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

The namesakes were two cousins, both named Guy Mo[illegible] Dangerfield, son of the father of one of them, was [illegible] old father. He [illegible] man about fifteen years before the opening of the story, had left home [illegible] and had soon afterward been accidentally drowned. On the day of his death his son was born and the widow had given the child his father's first name and, in compliance with a [illegible] had given him for his second name the name of the family of her husband's mother. Meanwhile her husband's younger brother, Charles, had remained at home, dutifully attendant on his aged father. He, too, had married, and, loving his brother and dead mother, had al[illegible] Moss-wood in memory of them both. He had several other children and then he, [illegible] He was [illegible] father-in-law and hoped that the old man would make her eldest son his heir. When she heard the old man's will read in which he left the bulk of his property to his "eldest [illegible] Dangerfield she was satisfied and took possession in her son's behalf. She did not know of the existence of her sister-in-law and her son, so when she accidentally met them in London some years afterward, she was alarmed. Her fears were allayed, however, when her nephew told her that he was born in the same year as her eldest son and his [illegible] As her son's birthday was in February it was he who fulfilled the conditions of his grandfather's will, in being the "eldest grandson." She took care of her sister-in-law, who was sick and poor, and promised to be a mother to the boy if, as seemed probable, his own mother should soon die. She learned, when the boy's mother was dying, that his birthday had been kept in April to avoid making the day of his father's death, on which he was born, a festival day, but he had really been born in January. Mrs. Dangerfield thus learned that her nephew and not her son was the "eldest grandson" and therefore entitled to his grandfather's property. She, believed, however, that the old man, like herself, did not know of her nephew's existence and had intended to make her son his heir. She therefore concealed her sister-in-law's family Bible, in which the true date of the boy's birth was recorded, and retained the property. She brought her nephew up as her own son and he and his cousin who was familiarly called Monk went to school and college together and loved each other as brothers. When they came of age, they, with Mrs. Dangerfield and her daughters, Yolante and Cicely and her other sons, Fulk and Humphrey, went to live at the family home, Dangerfield Park. From this point the story proceeds.

CHAPTER VI.
MONK'S FOLLY.

IN the young men's own room at Dangerfield Park, Monk and his brother Fulk were talking with Norman Conway, who in past years had been their playfellow. They had been speaking of Guy and Norman said: "Of course if he had chanced to be the elder of the two Guys, he would have come into the property, and you would only have had the ten thousand: but as you are the senior, I don't see that you need trouble your head over the matter."

"Well," said Monk, "I don't know if I am exactly bothered, but I want to be sure that everything is on the square. I admit that the old boy—our grandfather I mean—had the right to leave his property as he chose and I'm not fool enough to pretend it isn't a pleasant thing for a fellow like me, not overdone with brains, to be able to lead the life of a country gentleman, and be master of a place like this. But I'd rather sweep a crossing than do anything that wasn't fair and square. And the idea of taking advantage of Guy is simply disgusting. I wonder if the old man knew that he had another grandson."

"There seems no means of finding that out. But it is possible he suspected the possibility, because his will was so worded that any child of his elder son would come in for some provision. Guy has got a very fair competence, and there is no reason to suppose that he was meant to have more."

Monk heaved a deep breath partly of relief partly of an obstinate perplexity that would [illegible] quite leave him. "Well," he said, "I don't [illegible] upset everything, and set the whole place by the ears, and get into my mother's black books and all that, as I should do if I handed the place over to Guy—who by the by would not be likely to take it. But I confess I should like to be certain whether or not our grandfather was aware of Guy's existence when he drew his will: for if not, there is always the doubt whether he would not have left it to him if he had known."

[illegible] He liked Monk none the less for his honest detestation of injustice, even if his words were boyish and his thoughts immature. He could not help feeling that his sister Joyce would [illegible] the boy's opposing [illegible] that [illegible] lips. He was growing to like Monk very much: but he wished him to clear his mind of any doubts as to his own position before the intimacy between the houses went any farther. As things now stood he was made very welcome, and he was over frequently, and met Joyce several times in the course of a week. Norman knew, however, that were he not master of the Dangerfield estate, Lady Conway would give him no such open invitation to the Grange as she now bestowed, and he did not want trouble to fall upon his sister. However, Monk did not appear to have thought of this, and it was not for Norman to suggest the thought. It had relieved the owner's mind to discuss with an old friend the thoughts which had lately suggested, and to which Guy would not even listen seriously, and he felt that he had cleared his brain by ventilating the subject.

When Norman had gone Fulk laid aside his book and said, "What has put all this into your head, Monk?"

"I hardly know—several things. What do you think about it, old fellow? You have a good head-piece of your own."

"O, I agree with Norman that you can't change things now. There does not seem any reason to doubt that the old man meant you. But I do think that Guy ought to come next in succession: and if I were you, I should make a will, leaving it to him. Of course if you married it would be different—you would have to put your own children first; but then a fellow always has to make a new will when he's married, so you need not bother about that. If anything were to happen to you, I think the place ought to go to Guy."

Which was a piece of very disinterested advice on the part of Fulk for he was his brother's natural heir in such a case.

Monk sat still thinking. The same idea occurred to him. "Wouldn't that be rather rough on you?"

"Not a bit of it. I come off very well as it is, with the town house. I never cared for country life you know."

"Well, if you don't think it would be wronging you, I do think it would be the fairest thing to do. Not that there seems much reasonable expectation of my shuffling off my mortal coil prematurely: but of course no one ever knows, and it is always best to be prepared."

A silence followed these words, and Monk, who was wrapped in deep thought, saw Fulk raise his head suddenly, and look towards the angle of the room one side of which was formed by an open window.

"What is it?" he asked.

"I thought I heard a step," and Fulk walked across to the window.

"It was only a rustle in the laurels—I don't think anyone could have got away so fast. Well, I suppose it is about time to turn in. It can't be far from midnight."

"I suppose not. Conway stopped on a long time chatting. Guy went off some time ago."

But they found that Guy had not gone to bed when they went upstairs. He was reading in Monk's room, and said he had been out in the garden most of the time since leaving the smoking room. Fulk laughingly asked him if he had seen the ghost, and was a little puzzled at the sudden rise of color that followed the question, for Guy was not generally taken aback.

After he had got to his own room he wondered if it had been fancy that there had been a shade of embarrassment in his cousin's manner. Fulk had remarkably sharp eyes, and would note many things that would never occur to Monk.

"I wonder if it were he prowling about—but he would have said if it had been. He looked a little queer I thought. But if he had wanted to hear what we were saying, he had only to walk in. Monk never hides anything from him."

Next morning Monk made his way into his mother's room—at least into the library where [illegible] reading and [illegible] old letters was going regularly on, and planting himself before the empty hearth in his favorite attitude, he asked a question which was a great deal more startling to her than he had any notion.

"I want to know, mother, now that you are going over all the papers, whether you have found anything to lead you to suppose that our grandfather was aware of the existence of Guy when he made his will?"

"What makes you ask such a question, Monk?" she said, before attempting a direct reply.

"Why, don't you see, it might have made a lot of difference if he had. We always supposed that our uncle had died, and I fancy grandfather thought so too, or he would surely have sent for him when he was dying—fellows can generally be traced if one goes the right way to work. I can't help feeling that if he had known his elder son had left a child behind him, he might have acted very differently."

"I do not agree with you, Monk. Provision was made in the will for any children that Guy might have left. Mr. Lumly pointed out to me immediately upon the reading of it. He saw very plainly that there had been a motive for the rather vague wording of it. It was plain to his mind that Mr Dangerfield suspected, though he probably did not actually know that his son had married, and wished to act a fair part by any children that might be born: yet the very fact that with this thought in his mind, he made you his heir, shows that his mind was made up as to the prior claim of his younger son. You need not cherish any or these scruples and doubts, Monk."

"Of course I don't pretend I don't like my own position, or wish to give it up if it is fairly mine: only I do see, as I did not before we came here, that things have been rather hard on Guy, and I'd rather be anything in the world than feel that I was doing him an injustice."

"Well, you can set your mind at rest—you are doing nothing of the kind. I wish to speak no ill of the dead, but if you knew all that your father and I had to put up with during the last years of your grandfather's life—and indeed your father had been his butt from childhood, and though we both stayed here from a sense of duty, he did everything in his power to make our lives a burden to us. If you think of all this, and think, too, how Guy left home the moment life was not quite agreeable, and never came near his father again, you can hardly wonder that he was disinherited, and the son who had played the son's part, and that one of unusual difficulty, installed in the vacant place."

"Well, I see what you mean: but the fault was none of Guy's. However, I suppose things are all right as they are. But I should like to tell you that I have made up my mind on one point. I am going to make my will at once, and in it I shall make Guy my heir."

Mrs. Dangerfield made no immediate response. This was not the first time that her son's simple good faith had been something of a perplexity and annoyance to her. He was just like his father had been before him. There was no way of getting him to see more than one side of a question at once.

"You are your own master, Monk. You must do as you will with your own. But it will be something of an injustice to your own brothers: something of a slight, I would rather say—for of course such a will will never stand. You will be marrying in the course of a few years, and then you will take a very different view of the situation, whether you think so or not. Guy will not hold the first place in your heart much longer."

Monk did not laugh, as he would probably have done a month ago, and the color rose in his brown cheek: but his glance was steady and so was his voice: "I don't pretend that that might not make a difference: but I am too young to think of marrying for some years to come, and meantime no one can foresee the future, and if anything were to happen, I feel that Guy should come next. I thought it my duty to speak to you of my intention. It was Fulk himself who suggested the idea, so that you see he will not feel the slight. He does not wish for a country gentleman's life, and property would only be a burden to poor Humphrey. I have thought of everything and considered everything: and I wish to make Guy my heir."

"Very well, Monk, you must please yourself. I have no call to interfere, and I know you always act as seems right to you. But will you let me give you one piece of advice?"

"Certainly."

"Do not let Guy know what you are doing." Monk opened his eyes in surprise. "Why do you say that? Do you think it would hurt his feelings?"

"No, I hardly think it could well do that—it ought to act in a reverse way. But believe me, Monk, I advise you for your good. It would be far better your cousin should not know."

Monk knitted his brows in visible perplexity. "I don't know that I had thought of telling him—I hadn't considered the matter before: but I never kept a secret from Guy before. I'm sure it will all ooze out when we are talking, whether I mean to tell him or not."

Mrs. Dangerfield made a movement of impatience. "Monk, you talk like a woman."

"Do I? Well, there is nothing so very bad about a woman, is there?" responded Monk, with imperturbable good humor. "I hate mysteries and secrets, that is all, and Guy and I have talked all our lives without the smallest constraint. I don't see why he should not know, and that is a fact."

"Well, when you are as old as I am, and know the world as well you will understand better. Meantime can you not take it on trust, and believe that your mother advises you for your good?"

"I'm sure you think you do," answered Monk, heartily, "only I don't think anyone in the world understands the terms Guy and I are on. And I should like to know what you are driving at."

"You will not like what I am going to say, but I do not say it without due consideration. Guy has been so far as one of ourselves, I admit, but he is growing and developing, and there are those about us here who will put ideas into his head, and foment his natural jealousy all they can. Listen to me, I have been watching Guy of late, and I see that he is preoccupied and not quite what he used to be. Then again, he is consorting with some people who hate us, and will make an idol of him if they can—the clan of Stapletons, who were evicted from their cottages by your father for their outrageously bad conduct. It was only a few nights ago that I saw Guy in conversation with the worst of these people under the very windows of this house: and no Stapleton ever came near Dangerfield without meaning mischief."

"I do not yet see how all this bears upon what we were saying just now."

"It has this much to do with it, that if you die without heirs—die before your marriage in fact, Guy steps into this property. It means, in fact, that if you make this will and tell Guy of it, you give him a direct interest in your death. Now do you understand?"

Monk started very slightly, and drew his stalwart figure up to its full height, whilst he looked steadily at his mother with eyes that shone strangely. "Mother," he said in a clear low voice, "I think you cannot know what a hideous thing your words would suggest."

"On the contrary, Monk, I know very well. I have not spoken them willingly, but I consider it my duty to warn you. Do you think that all deeds of vengeful passion are obsolete? Can you take up a newspaper any day in the year without finding some allusion to some horrid tragedy, only too often prompted by a less strong motive than that of winning great wealth. I am making no charge, no imputation: but there was a vein of intense passionate fury in Guy Dangerfield's nature, and how do we know that his son may not have inherited something of it. And then there are others who would rejoice to see him in your place. Monk, Monk, do not be led away by your romantic attachment, which has always been extravagant and unnatural. Take the advice of your mother. Do not do this thing at all. Do not throw temptation in your cousin's way."

Monk's grim face relaxed into a very faint, peculiar smile. "I do not intend doing so."

"You will not make that will? O, I am glad indeed."

"I did not say that. I have not changed my determination on that point. I merely said I should put no such temptation in Guy's way."

"You mean to do it then?"

"Yes, and to tell Guy, too. You shall be made to see that the horrible thought you have admitted to your mind is as baseless and cruel as it is unfounded." And Monk's young face was almost stern as he turned it upon his mother. She saw it was useless to plead longer. She knew when words would do harm rather than good.

So she looked him steadily in the face, and said, "I will not pretend that I am not sorry: but you are your own master and must go your own way. I only hope the day may not come when you will regret the resolve that you have made."

A Missionary's Vision.

The Millions in the Chinese Provinces marching in a Procession a Hundred Thousand miles long.

OU have heard of them. You must continue to hear of them. They are forcing themselves on the world's attention, writes Rev. William Ashmore, D.D., in The Regions Beyond. They came into the great plans of God. Until they are converted, the world will not be converted. When they turn to the LORD, then it will no longer be any great goddess Diana, but it will be JESUS the Anointed, whom "all Asia and the world worshipeth."

But great numbers in one comment are vague. Let us take them in detail. The population of China has been set down at 400,000,000. A late statement, based on partial returns, puts it at 382,000,000. Some people are frightened at that; so we will take the old official census of 1812, which made it 360,000,000.

It was a solemn sight, and grandly impressive, when the armies of the LORD in the wilderness took up their line of march. No such review had ever been held, and none such has ever been held since. A nation of six millions on the march from one country to another, by the way of the Red Sea, the wilderness of Paran, and the river Jordan. What a pageant was that which passed before Moses, field marshal of the living GOD! In our days, though in a small way, kings, captains and generals are fond of imitating these ancient reviews. We had one such in our own land at Washington after the war, when, before the commander-in-chief and the assembled heads of the nation, with drums beating and colors flying, there marched along the army columns of the great Republic.

Nobody that saw it will ever forget it. We will borrow the designs for a missionary use. Let us make the different provinces of China pass in review before us, one at a time, each with its vast army of living men, women and children.

As each province passes, the population roster can be given; you can lump them afterwards. You can think of all these persons living and dying without CHRIST, without a Sabbath here, or a hope of a Sabbath hereafter. And you can think of the great commission and of him who gave it, and how long since he gave it, and of how many Chinese have lived and died since he gave it.

Soldiers marching in "close order" will take about two and a half feet to each man, but so much time will be required that we must put them closer than that, and save every inch we can and every minute of time. So we will expect them to march in "lock step," and allow only a foot and a half to each person. In one mile there are 5,280 feet. At lock step there will be 3,520 persons to each mile. Each million of them will stretch along for a distance, say of 284 miles.

Twenty miles a day is good work for a column on the march. We will reckon at that—it is fast enough for a column moving on to judgment—and so each million will require fourteen days in passing.

And now all is ready. When shall the column form and the review begin? We will pitch on the first day of June, with the whole of an all-glorious summer before us.

CHIHLI, means "direct rule." It is the capital province of the empire, and is about the size of the State of Illinois. Population, 27,000,871. They will reach 7,952 miles nearly. The line will stretch from the steps of the Capitol at Washington, across the Continent, and far away into the middle of the Pacific Ocean, and will require 397 days in passing.

SHANTUNG, "East of the hills." Here comes the banner of the second province. Population, 28,958,764, near enough to twenty-nine millions to call it that. They will reach 8,230 miles, and will take 411 days to pass. The previous division left you in July of the second year; thus one will keep on moving till August of the third year. Is it not solemn to look upon them as they move? And how many army chaplains ought to be furnished to meet the needs of such a host? If it were an army of the United States, there would be a chaplain to every thousand men, a thousand chaplains to each million, and twenty-nine thousand for them all. Of course we could not and would not send any such number as that; but then, we scancely send anybody. I do not know how it is just at this writing, but a little while ago there was not one preacher to a million.

SHANSI, "West of the hills." This is an inland province, much less thickly settled. It is smaller than Illinois, but it has 14,004,210 people. They will not occupy you so long.

They will reach 3,980 miles, and will be only 199 days in passing. In all these ages since Christ ascended, nobody has taken them the Gospel. Recently those Cambridge men went there, C. T. Studd, Stanley Smith, Montague Beauchamp, and others. Away off in those mountain regions, the Lord has worked with them with signs and wonders following. In the month of April of the past year there were 215 baptisms; yet ten years ago it was not known that a man of the whole fourteen millions had ever heard of Christ. Woe unto you Christian nations! for in the day of judgment the men of Shansi shall rise up and condemn you, for some of them repented under the first sermon they heard, while many of you have heard a thousand sermons, and are not so near the kingdom of God as when you first began.

HONAN, "South of the river," contains 23,037,171 people. Their column will be 6,534 miles long, and will require 426 days to pass along. There they go,—without hope and without God in the world, and without any one to teach them.

KIANGSU. Population, 37,843,501—enough to stock an empire of itself. Japan is an empire, yet it has not so many people as that one province. Great Britain is an empire; France has called himself and empire; Germany is an empire yet; but the population of none of them is much larger. The Kiangsu part of the procession will reach 10,750 miles, and will require in passing 537 days. Such numbers are appalling! While they are filing along by the million, seventy-seven Sabbaths will pass over your heads.

NGANHWUI. Here is another one nearly as large. Other great countries are groups of states and districts; China is a group of empires. It is a great empire, made up of smaller empires. The population of this province is 34,168,054. This line will extend 9,706 miles, and will take up 485 days of your time. Ah, but those empires do not make so much stir in the world as do our small States! Yes, just now; but before a half-century has rolled away, these minor empires will be heard from. They have been in the torpor of a winter millenniums long, but the ice age is passing by; they have been in the Nigban of Buddhism, but the mists of Buddhism are slowly lifting, while at the same time they are beginning to settle down in the theosophic circles of Boston and London.

You may not introduce Buddhistic ritualism in your cultured society, but you will surely feel the chill of Buddhistic teaching. The darkness of Egypt has' been upon this people for ages, while for ages you have been basking in the sunshine of Christianity, which has been shining steadily upon you ever since those early centuries, when foreign missionaries took the Gospel to your Druid fathers, howling and dancing around a human sacrifice. Give the Gospel a chance to thaw them out for just one century, and see what they will be, and how they will gain on the nations of the West.

Kiangsi, "West of the river." Population, 23,047,999, making a line 6,547 miles long, and requiring 327 days to pass along. They keep up their solemn, silent, and yet awfully voiceful tread. Whither are they bound? Do they know anything at all about God as a Saviour? Have they heard of him who was set forth to be a propitiation for the sins of the world? Why is it that these multitudes of Kiangsi are left to themselves? "No man careth for my soul," may be the refrain of them all. Nobody except a dozen men and women of the China Inland Mission.

Chzhkiang.. Once more, enough to set up one of the "great powers" of Europe; 26,256,783 people in a line, reaching 7,454 miles, and taking up in passing 372 days.

Fuhkien, "Happily established." This is a hilly region, and the population is not so large; yet there are 14,777,410 people, forming a line 4,198 miles long, and taking 209 days in passing. What the people lack in quantity they make up in quality. This, and some of the provinces that follow, contain the most vigorous population of China. They have the raw material for the highest forms of national greatness. Warriors, statesmen, scholars, and prosperous merchants are continually rising up among them. Young brethren in the ministry, tell me if it is not a worthy field for your abilities, where you can help mould the coming faith of coming millions.

Hupleh comes next,—another great nation in itself,—27,370,098 strong, stretching far away, the head and the foot of the line 7,775 miles apart, and consuming more than a solid year in the march. But this is wearisome and heart-sickening. The heathen are long and the time drags heavily. Would that the display were over! It is a terrible sight; will it never end? Yes, we can hasten.

Yonder comes the yellow imperial banner of Hunan, "South of the Lake." Following it is a file of 18,652,507 human beings who have never heard of Christ. They reach back 5,290 miles more. O Lord, deliver us from indolence and selfishness!

Kwangtung next,—Kwangtung that knows so much about the opium traffic and the coolie trade, with its 19,174,030, and extending the line 5,444 miles farther. O Lord, open the eyes of the ministers in our pulpits, and all the teachers in our colleges and seminaries, to the claims of Christ upon them to preach and teach a missionary Gospel!

Kwangsi, Yunnan, and Kweichow, three of them, by far the smallest of them all. We will put them together, for you are tired, and so am I, of this interminable march. All told, they have only about 18,000,000 between them, taking up over 5,000 miles more. O Lord; forgive us for our indifference!

Suchuen, one of the great provinces, with 24,435,078 people, making a line over 6,000 miles long O Lord, move on the hearts of young men to give themselves at once to this work! Make them willing to go forth and preach Christ among the heathen. Make them willing to go without waiting to be driven.

Shensi, with 10,207,256, and a line reaching over 2,000 miles. O Lord, loosen the moneybags of the people! Make them to send forth their rusted coin to help save the nations. "How shall they hear without a preacher, and how shall they preach except they be sent?"

Kansuh. It is nearly over. Here is the last column, 15,193,125 strong, and reaching over 4,000 miles farther. What a pageant! but it has been the pageantry of death. O Lord, have compassion upon the multitudes, for they have nothing to eat! O Lord, in our own land there is bread and to spare, but it comes not hither! Bless the barley loaves of thy servants, and make them feed a least a few of these provinces.

This procession has been over one hundred thousand miles long, and it has occupied more than thirteen years in passing.

While they have been on this move, one third as many more have been born into the world to follow after. O Lord of the harvest, awake a slumbering Church and a lethargic ministry out of this torpor of death!

21 Years of Pain

I suffered with eczema or salt rheum, in such terrible agony at times that I could not walk about the house. I had so many failures with medicines that when a friend urged me to take Hood's Sarsaparilla, I hesitated, but finally took it. The hoped for benefit was noticeable at the outset, and I have taken twelve bottles. I am completely well and feel like a new woman. I can't thank or praise Hood's Sarsaparilla enough for what it has done for me. MRS. JOSEPHINE BOYCE, 18 Division Street, Peekskill, N. Y. Be sure to get Hood's because

"His Happiest Day!"

How a Profane Man and his Household were brought to Christ — Our Sunday School Missionary's Progress

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday School Missionary in the Southwest, Rev. George W. Sharp, writes us a most interesting letter from Monroe Co., Me., in which he says: "I send you a photo of East Centre Church, and Sunday School, located in a country district of Adair Co., Mo. When I organized the Sunday School some years ago, it was on the night of a week day. The attendance was small and the prospect rather poor; but, as I have often found that small beginnings have become prosperous and successful, so it has been in this case.

"The school was started in a small schoolhouse; but the church house, shown in the picture, has since been erected. The church has regular preaching, the community is orderly and industrious, and the young people are being brought up under the benign influence of the Gospel. The older people take a good interest in the school and church, and the community has enjoyed a number of precious revival meetings. I do not know the number of conversions.

"Sometime after the church was erected, I visited the Sunday School in the morning and preached in the afternoon. The day was very hot, the people naturally thirsty. Taking a glass of water, I held it before them, to illustrate that salvation was as free as the water, quoting, 'Whosoever will'—any one that wants to—'let him partake of the water of life freely.' God gave his blessing, and several persons of different ages asked the prayers of the people that they might be saved. After personal interviews with them, and prayer, the service was closed, with clear evidence that God's blessing had been bestowed upon it very richly.

"On the following Thursday, I met the head of a family who had attended the service. Grasping my hand warmly, he spoke to the following purport: 'Brother Sharp, this is the happiest week I ever saw. I have been feeling for two years that I ought to be a Christian. I have been a profane man, and my children have heard me swear, and they are old enough to know what it means. I have felt badly over my wickedness before them, and have wanted to be a Christian. Still when I went to church last Sunday I thought little about it, and had no idea of being converted. But when you showed how free salvation was [illegible] and then he joyfully repeated the remark, 'This has been the happiest week of my life!'

"As he was a poor man, and said he had no Bible, I took him to my office and gave him one, understanding that his children who had heard his profanity, should thenceforth hear his prayers and thanksgiving to God."

RAISING THE FALLEN.

The readers of this journal who have sent money to help in furnishing the Bethesda Home in Brooklyn, will be glad to learn how much good has been done through their help. Mrs. McIntyre and Mrs. Halvorsen who manage the home had been much distressed at their inability to receive into the home several girls who, through their efforts and those of city missionaries had been persuaded to abandon a vicious life. The vacant rooms were there to shelter them, a kindly matron who gives her services free of charge was there to care for them, pray for them and help them; but there was no bed on which they could sleep, nor chairs to rest on. One and another came and turned away disappointed. One girl pleaded to remain and said she would willingly sleep on the bare floor. Poor creature! she perceived that it was her one hope of regaining her lost position and being saved from her evil life. The two ladies could not bear to turn her away and so finally a quantity of "Excelsior" was bought and spread upon the floor and on that she and two other girls spent the night. By a providential interposition two of those girls have already found homes in respectable families in the country where Christian love and kindness will, it is believed, complete the good work already begun.

With the money sent by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, the two ladies who are managing the Home, have purchased three cheap iron cots, mattresses and bedding, a few chairs and tables and other necessaries, and a quantity of muslin and material to be made into garments by the inmates. Mrs. McIntyre and Mrs. Halvorsen desire us to express their sincere thanks for the timely aid rendered by our readers. It encourages them to hope that the house will yet be furnished throughout and they may no longer have to turn a deaf ear to the women who plead for the opportunity to redeem their lost character. All contributions sent to this office for the furnishing of the Home will be acknowledged in these columns and will be carefully and economically expended.

From a letter just received from the Home, we learn that one of the inmates is just setting out for her home in a distant city. The fact of her repentance had been communicated to her husband whom she deserted a long time ago. He was delighted with the news and came at once to see if it was true. The joyful reunion achieved through the instrumentality of the Home will, it may be hoped, be only the first of many to take place under its roof. The readers of this journal have reason to rejoice that their gifts are helping to make [illegible]

DYSPEPSIA

Remarkable Cures by Spring No. 1

Buffalo Lithia Water

Dr. P. A. Flournoy, Charlotte Court House, Va., says:—"My nervous system was shattered, my digestion difficult and painful, the stomach often rejecting the highest possible articles of food. I was greatly depressed in spirit, and had but little hope of any improvement in my condition. Upon a diet of tea and crackers, I visited the Buffalo Springs, and put myself upon the water of Spring No 1. I was soon conscious of an increase of appetite and digestive power, and at the same time of a gradual, decided increase of nervous vigor. This improvement continued through a protracted stay at the Springs, and to such an extent that before leaving I was able to eat with impunity any article of food found upon the hotel table. I left the Springs fully restored, and returned home to enter upon the arduous duties of my profession."

The Professor of Anatomy and Materia Medica, at University of Virginia, Dr. Wm. B. Towles, at the time Resident Physician at Buffalo Lithia Springs, reports the following case:—"Miss ——, age sixteen, consulted me as to the use of the Buffalo Lithia Water; she was pale and emaciated, weighing but sixty-eight pounds. For several years she had suffered from a severe form of Dyspepsia with want of appetite, acid eructation, Nausea and vomiting after eating, Headache, Constipation, Hypochondriasis, etc. For twelve months she had not experienced the Menstrual Flow. She was put upon the Water of Spring No. 1, and directions given as to her diet. During a stay of two months at the Springs her digestion was restored, there was entire disappearance of other distressing symptoms and a return of the Menstrual Flow. She gained largely in flesh and left the Springs in good health and soon afterwards weighed one hundred and eight pounds."

Nervous Prostration.

A Powerful and Permanent Nerve Tonic

Spring No. 2

Buffalo Lithia Water

Dr. M. H. Houston, Physician to Randolph Macon College, Ashland, Va. [Extract from a communication in the "Virginia Medical Monthly"]. Having had an opportunity of watching very closely the action of the Buffalo Lithia Water in numerous cases which have fallen under my observation, I am prepared to impute to it one quality at least to which, it strikes me, sufficient attention has not been heretofore directed. I allude especially to its power as a gentle excitant of the Nervous System and as a Powerful and Permanent Nerve Tonic. To this particular property I am disposed to attribute much of its efficacy in the relief of many chronic diseases. Other mineral waters, with exhilarating properties, are sparkling in their appearance, and their exciting qualities are due to the gases which are disengaged, and which are consequently evanescent in effect. The Buffalo Lithia Water is without such impregnation of gases, and its effects are much more permanent."

Dr. Goodrich A. Wilson, Somerset, N. C., Member Medical Society of North Carolina, says:—"Hundreds of young females attain the age of puberty without realizing the healthful performance of their great function. They become nervous, hysterical, chlorotic. Hundreds of young men attain the same age without developing into manhood. They become pale, feeble, hypochondriacal, and perhaps the end is phthisis, or an insane asylum. In all such cases the best results may be anticipated from the use of Buffalo Lithia Water."

A Congress of Religions.

Jains, Theists, and many others, representing creeds and beliefs not enumerated above. When it is explained that many of those persons have traveled thousands of miles to attend the Congress, it will be more readily understood how much importance is attached to it by the leading religionists of the globe.

Since the Congress had its origin and the movement received its impetus in our own Christian country, it is probably natural to find that Christianity will have the largest representation of any of the creeds. It is quite within the truth to assert that every sect and denomination of the Christian Church will be represented at the Congress. Protestantism will have as its exponents such able and sterling advocates as Bishop Dudley of Kentucky, Rev. Lyman Abbott, Prof. George T. Ladd, and Prof. George T. Fisher of Yale, Rev. Henry Blodgett of Peking, China; Rev. Maurice Phillips of Madras, India; Prof. M. Valentine of Gettysburg; Bishop Thompson of the Protestant Episcopal Church; Rev. George T. Candlin, Prof. William Henry Green, Prof. Philip Schaff, Pres. Schurman of Cornell University; Prof. Richard T. Ely, Hon. Andrew D. White, Col. Thomas W. Higginson, Rev. Joseph Cook, Rev. George Dana Boardman, Dr. David J. Burrell, Prof. J. P. Landis, Dr. Henry Jessup of Syria; Dr. Francis E. Clark, Rev. Theodore T. Munger, Prof. William C. Wilkinson of the Chicago University; Bishop John H. Vincent, Prof. M. S. Terry of the Northwestern University; Rev. H. Grattan Guinness of London, and many others almost equally distinguished.

Among the foreign notabilities, who have aided in perfecting the arrangements and most of whom will probably attend, are the Anglican Bishop of Worcester; Sir Edwin Arnold; Editor Wm. T. Stead of the Review of Reviews; Prof. Hommel of Munich University and Profs. Doedes and Valeton of Utrecht University; Prof. N. J. Hoffmeyr of Stellenbosch, So. Africa; Rev. Zitsuzen Ashitsu of Omi, Japan; Dr. Adler, Chief Rabbi of the British Empire; Muni Atmaramji, High Priest of the Jain Community, India; B. Nagarkar, a Theist of Bombay, India; Prince Chandradut, Buddhist of Bangkok, Siam; Purushottam B. Joshi, a Hindoo of Bombay, and many more. Among the American delegates will be practically all the foremost preachers, thinkers and writers among the Baptists, Presbyterians, Protestant Episcopalians, Methodists and Congregationalists. There also will be a characteristically strong Catholic representation, including a cardinal, several archbishops and bishops. The Orthodox Greek and the Armenian churches will also be represented. Upwards of one hundred distinct schools or forms of religious thought will find opportunity for expression in the Congress. It is hoped that its deliberations may result in bringing all the creeds into closer relations and in strengthening the bonds of brotherhood and love among the nations of the earth. Such a union has no perils for Christianity which, while holding fast to the pure faith delivered to the saints and declared in the Scriptures, can yet afford to extend the generous hand of friendship and good-will to men of every race and creed, who are earnestly striving for truth and righteousness, although they may not yet have come into the light of the Gospel. As the Red Cross Society has established among the nations a common bond of helpfulness to the sick and suffering, so the new movement begun by this Congress may result in the establishment of a world-wide law of sympathy among the creeds, each toward the other, and toward all who are sincerely seeking after God and his righteousness.

The Gospel in Uganda.

Central Africa's Turbulent Kingdom Learning the Message of Salvation.

IN a recent letter from Uganda, Bishop Tucker writes: Early this morning large crowds went out to meet Sir Gerald Portal, the new British Commissioner. The principal chiefs, with their followers, joined the outgoing crowd. Accompanied by Captain Portal, I walked out a short distance and was a witness of the deep joy of the people at the arrival of the representative of the Queen. They feel convinced now that all will go well and that the country will not be abandoned. That they may be under the protection of England is to them a thought of great joy. It was really an impressive sight, the entrance of the travellers into Kanpula. They were all more or less sun-burnt and travel-worn, but thoroughly well and hearty. The Waganda, in their terra-cotta-colored barb clothes and their snow-white garments, lined the roads on either side. Now and again a great chief advanced and was introduced to the Consul-General as he rode on horseback; then he fell back to the rear and was succeeded by another, who in his turn made way for others who wanted to be introduced. Thus the progress was slow. Drums were beating on every hand, and as we drew near to the fort the clash of arms drew our attention to the Soudanese soldiers, who, in their snow-white tunics, were paraded outside the gates, and presented a very smart appearance as they presented arms.

On the following Sunday some fifteen adults were baptised and admitted into the visible Church of Christ. Later in the day an English service was held and attended by the Consul-General and all his staff. It was an interesting gathering; Mr. Millar read the prayers, and I preached from Psalm 119: 105. Next day the King held a barazza for the public reception of Sir Gerald Portal. The scene was a very brilliant one, the sun shining gloriously, and the white dresses of the chiefs and the glittering arms of the native soldiers seemed to sparkle in the sunlight. We of the mission party were already in barazza and as the King rose to greet the Consul-General we also stood, and remained standing until the King and his guests had taken their seats. All the great chiefs of the country were present; many of them were dressed in very gorgeous attire. The King sat in the gilt chair lately presented to him by the company.

The barazza did not last long. Greetings were exchanged. The Consul-General expressed his pleasure at being in Buganda; the King expressed his pleasure at seeing him; and so the interview ended. The King recently gave sentence against a man to this effect: "that so many cattle and sheep were to be paid by the offender as a fine, together with two women." The Christian chief interposed, "But Christians do not give men and women; they give cattle and goats, not human beings." The result was that the King altered the sentence to the effect that no women were to be given, only cattle and goats.

THE DAY'S WORK.

ALL in the day's work—tired heart,
Lift the load bravely, and do thy part.
God will do his:
"And be the day weary, or be the day long,
At length it ringeth to evensong."

All in the day's work—straight from Thee
Comes the right task—Love sets for me:
I will attempt it;
"For be the day weary, or be the day long,
At length it ringeth to evensong."

All in the day's work—let it be;
Or long or short, 'tis all for Thee!
Singing I'll do it;
"And be the day weary, or be the day long,
I shall sleep to awake with the angels' song."

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—IN COMPOUNDING, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. Acts mildly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SUPERSEDES ELECTROLYSIS.

Recommended by all who have tested its merits—Used by people of refinement

Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find much embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. German Scenes at the Fair.

The Architecture of Bavaria, Westphalia and the Black Forest Picturesquely Reproduced—Typical German Castles and Cottages.

BEWILDERED by the number and magnificence of the mammoth palaces at the World's Fair, and wearied by the seemingly endless variety in the panorama of national life and color found in the Midway Plaisance, the visitor to Chicago who is so fortunate as to pass a quiet hour or two in the German Village, finds there an agreeable change. He is at once transported to the Old World and absorbed in the contemplation of quaintly picturesque castles and cottages, some of them constructed on models that were old a century ago, yet which can be found in actual existence in Europe today. Several of this class are presented in the illustrations on this page, the drawings having been made for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with the Rhine as far as the Swiss border. These cottages are a mixture of the architectural styles of a Queen Anne structure and a Swiss chalet. The Black Foresters are usually engaged in the raising of cattle, and in farming, but they vary this with other industries. For many years they were famed for the manufacture of wooden clocks, machinery as well as framework being composed of that material. "Cuckoo-clocks" from the Black Forest are found all over the world. Another panel (No 3), shows a Hessian Town Hall or Rath-haus. Hesse lies to the south of the Black Forest, and in many of the towns and villages of that part of the German Empire may be seen buildings like the one shown in the picture. It is the meeting-place for the local councillors, the court of justice, and the scene of any general and evening. Probably the most interesting and unique in the group is the last, (No. 5), which represents a Westphalian farm-house. Many of the same quaint type are to be found in northwestern Germany, near Bremen and elsewhere. It is the most ancient form of a Saxon dwelling now known to be in actual use and doubtless furnished the original model for the cottage-builders of England, who still adhere to many of its features in their dwellings. A striking peculiarity about the Westphalian farm-house, found in few other dwellings is that its interior contains accommodation not only for the family, but for all their movable belongings, horses, cattle, wagons, stables and grain, all being enclosed within the ample space between no visitor to the Fair should neglect to enjoy.

Chicago claims to be the third German city in the world, and it is evident from the magnitude and costliness of the German exhibits at the Exposition, that the Fatherland appreciates the distinction. In proportion to our commercial relations with that country, the German display is probably the largest of any foreign nation, German manufacturers, the government and even the Emperor himself having shown a lively interest in its success. Herr Wernmuth, the German Commissioner to the Exposition, has won golden opinions for his tact and ability in engineering so marvelous an exhibit, which produces on the mind of

IN "THE GERMAN VILLAGE," AT THE WORLD'S FAIR.—(BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.)

1. A Typical "Pfalz" or German Castle. 2. Cottage in the Black Forest. 3. A Hessian Town Hall. 4. Bavarian Cottage. 5. A Quaint Westphalian Farm-house.

by Mr. Carl Henckel, our special artist at the World's Fair. In the centre of the group (No. 1) is a representation of a typical pfalz or small castle, such as many German nobles and landed proprietors possess and occupy as hereditary family seats. Those romantic piles, built in a style that is calculated to outlast generations, crowned with spires and bristling with gables and lattice-work, are the pride and joy of the German artist and tourist. On the right (No. 2), is a cottage in the Black Forest, a mountain range in Southern Germany, running parallel eral public assemblage or local festivity. Quite frequently, too, a portion of it does duty as a jail. The fourth panel shows a pretty cottage in the Bavarian highlands. Dwellers on the Tyrolean Alps are hardy mountaineers, hunters, cattle-raisers and farmers. They dress most picturesquely, the men in knee-breeches and both sexes in the distinctive Alpine hat and short jacket. They are famous singers and the musical "yodel" of the Alpine goat-herds may be heard floating across the valleys and over the rocky chasms, morning its four walls. This type of self-contained dwelling dates from a very remote age. That it ante-dates the introduction of Christianity is shown by the fact that even to this day a relic of primeval barbarism and idolatry is found in the wooden "horse-heads" which adorn the peak of the building and which, though now used merely as ornament, refer to a period when rude carvings of this character were objects of worship.

These are but a few of the instructive and beautiful sights in the German village, which the spectator an impression of the industrial and commercial resources of that country never before experienced in previous World's Fairs outside of the German Empire.

One of the most notable "National Days" at the Fair was "German Day," which brought out an attendance of nearly two hundred thousand persons. A feature was the procession of German societies 16,000 strong, furnishing one of those brilliant martial and musical pageants in which the sons of the Fatherland excel all other European nations.

The Tabernacle Pulpit

THE BATTLE OURS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning at the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text, 1 Kings 20: 27, "And the children of Israel pitched before them like two little flocks of kids."

WITH thirty-three kings drunk in one tent, this chapter opens. They were allies plotting for the overthrow of the Lord's Israel. You know that if a lion roar, a flock of kids will shiver and huddle together. One lion could conquer a thousand kids. The battle opens. There are a great multitude of Syrians under Gen. Ben-hadad, strong as lions. The Israelites are few and weak, like two little flocks of kids. Who beat? The lions, of course. Oh no; the kids. For it all depends whether God is on the side of the lions or the kids. After the battle, one hundred thousand Syrians lay dead on the field, and twenty-seven thousand attempting to fly, came along by a great wall, which toppled and crushed them to death.

Which was the stronger weapon—great Goliath's sword or little David's sling? David had five smooth stones from the brook. He only used one in striking down Goliath. He had a surplus of ammunition; he had enough to take down four more giants if they had appeared in the way. It all depends upon whether God is on the side of the shepherd boy or on the side of the giant.

There have been many in our day who have ventured the opinion that Christianity is falling back, and that in fifty years it will be extinct. They found their opinion on the assumed fact that the Bible is not as much of a book as it used to be, and that portions of it are repulsive to the people. I reply by asking, which one of the publishing houses of New York, Philadelphia, Boston or Chicago is publishing the Bible to-day with the omission of a single verse or chapter? Are not our publishers intelligent men? And would they, contrary to their financial interests, continue to publish the Bible without the omission of a single chapter or a single verse if it were becoming an unpopular book, and the people did not want it? If Harpers, or Appleton, or Scribner, or Lippincott should publish a Bible with the omission of one chapter, they would not sell ten copies in ten years. The fact that throughout Christendom there are hundreds of printing-presses printing the Word of God without the omission of a chapter or a verse, proves that the Bible is popular; and the fact that there are more being printed in this decade than any other decade, proves that the Bible

I go through the court-rooms of the country. Wherever I find a judge's bench, or a clerk's desk, I find the Bible. By what other book would they take solemn oath? What is very apt to be among the bride's presents? The Bible. What is very apt to be put in the trunk of the young man when he starts for city life? The Bible. Voltaire predicted that the Bible during the nineteenth century would become an obsolete book. Well, we are pretty nearly through the nineteenth century; the Bible is not obsolete yet; there is not much prospect of its becoming obsolete; but I have to tell you that that room—the very room in which Voltaire wrote that prediction—some time ago was crowded from floor to ceiling with Bibles for Switzerland. Suppose the Congress of the United States should pass a law that no Bibles should be printed in the United States. If there are thirty million grown men and women in the country then there would be thirty million people armed against such a law. But suppose the Congress of the United States should pass a law that Macaulay's History, or Charles Read's novels should not be read—could you get half as large an army, or the fourth as large an army? In other words there are, as you know and I know, a thousand men who would die for their Bibles, where there are fifty men who would die for any other book. The fact that there are now more Bibles being printed than ever before, that publishers find it a financial interest for them to continue the publication of the Bible, proves that this book is still the most popular book on the planet.

"But," say those who are antagonistic, "Christianity is falling back, 'from the fact that the church is not as much respected as it used to be, and is not as influential." I reply to that with the statistic that one denomination—the Methodist Church—according to a statistic given me by one of their bishops, dedicates on an average a new church every day of the year. Three hundred and sixty-five new churches in one denomination in a year, and over a thousand new churches built every year in this country. Does that look as though the church were failing in its power, and were becoming a worn-out institution? Around which institution in our communities gather the most ardent affections? The post-office, the hotel, the court-house, the city hall, or the churches? Why, when our old Tabernacle was burning, there were hundreds of men standing in the streets who never went to church, tears raining down their cheeks. It is because the Church of God stands nearer the sympathies of the American people than any other institution. Men may caricature the Church and call it a collection of hypocrites; but when their children are swept off with the diphtheria, for whom do they send? To the postmaster, to the attorney-general, to the aldermen, or to the pastors of the churches? And if there be not room for the obsequies in the private house, what building do they solicit? The Academy of Music, the hotel, public hall, court-house? No; the churches. And if they want music on the sad occasion, do they select the Marseillaise Hymn, or God Save the Queen, or our own grand national air? No; they want the old hymn with which we sang their old Christian mother to sleep; they want the Sunday School hymn that their little girl sang the last Sabbath afternoon she was out before she was seized with the awful sickness that broke father's heart and mother's heart. Oh, you know as well as I do—I shall not dwell on it any longer—the Church of God, instead of being a worn-out institution, stands nearer the sympathies of the people than it ever did and eclipses all other institutions.

THE SCEPTIC AND HIS VICTIM.

But our antagonists go on and say that Christianity is falling back, in the fact that Infidelity is bolder now and more blatant than it ever was. I deny the statement. Infidelity is not near so bold now as it was in the days of our fathers and grandfathers. There were times in this country when men who were openly and above-board infidel and antagonistic to Christianity could be elected to high office. Now, let some man wishing high position in the State proclaim himself the foe of Christianity and an infidel, how many States of the Union would he carry? how many counties? how many wards in Brooklyn? Not one.

Ah! my friends, Infidelity in this day is not half as bold as it used to be. If it comes now, it is apt to come under the disguise of rhetoric or fantastic sentimentality. I know if a man with great intelligence does become an infidel, and begins an attack on Christianity, it makes great excitement—of course it does, and people come to the conclusion, weak-minded Christians come to the conclusion, that everything is going overboard because some man of strong intellect assails Christianity.

If a man jumps overboard from a Cunard steamer, he makes more excitement than all the five hundred sane passengers who continue in the berths or on the decks; but does that stop the ship? Does that wreck all the five hundred passengers? It makes great excitement when a man leaps from a platform or a pulpit into Infidelity; but does that hinder our glorious Bible from taking its millions into the skies. I tell you Infidelity is not half as bold now as it used to be.

"But," say our antagonists, "Christianity is falling back because science, its chief enemy, is triumphing over it." Now, I deny that there is any war between science and revelation. There is not a fact in science that may not be made to harmonize with the statements of the Bible. So said Hugh Miller, so said Joseph Henry, so said Professor Hitchcock, so said Professor Silliman, so said Professor Mitchell.

Joseph Henry, the leading scientist of America, better known and honored in the royal societies transatlantic than any other American, lived and died a believer in the religion of Jesus Christ. Joseph Henry knew all the facts of Geology, and yet believed the Book of Genesis. He knew all the facts of Astronomy, and yet believed the Book of Joshua, the sun and moon standing still. Joseph Henry knew all the anatomy of man and fish, and yet believed the Book of Jonah.

If the scientists of the day were all agreed, and they came up with solid front to attack our Christianity, perhaps they might make some impression upon it; but they are not agreed. It is often said that we religionists are failing in our advocacy of Christianity because we differ in our theology. I tell you we do not differ inside the church in theology half as much as they differ outside the church in science. If they reject our religion because we differ on some minor points, we might just as well reject science because the scientists differ; but as far as I can tell, the war of infidel science against Christianity is not so severe as it used to be, because these men are antagonistic to each other; and as far as I can tell, it is going to be a war between telescope and telescope, Leyden jar and Leyden jar, chemical apparatus and chemical apparatus. They do not agree on anything

Do you suppose that this Bible theory about the origin of life is going to be overthrown by men who have different theories—fifty different theories—about the origin of life? And when Agassiz comes out and puts both feet on the doctrine of evolution, and says in regard to many scientists, "I notice that these young naturalists are adopting as theories in science things which have not passed under observation," Agassiz saw what we all see—that there are men who talk very wisely who know but very little, and that just as soon as a young scientist finds out the difference between the feelers of a wasp and the horns of a beetle, he begins to patronize the Almighty, and go about talking about culture as though it were spelled c-u-l-c-h-a-r—culchar!

It makes me sick to see these literary fops going down the street with a copy of Darwin under one arm and a case of transfixed grasshoppers and butterflies under the other arm, talking about the Survival of the Fittest and Huxley's Protoplasm, and the Nebular Hypothesis, and talking to us common men as though we were fools! If they agreed in their theories and came up with solid front against Christianity. I say perhaps they might make some impression; but they do not agree. Darwin charges upon Lamarck, Wallace upon Cope, Herschel even charged upon Ferguson. They do not agree about the gradation of the species; they do not agree about embryology. What do they agree about?

Herschel wrote a whole chapter on what he calls the Errors in Astronomy. La Place says that the moon was not put in the right place; that if it had been put four times the distance from our world, there would have been more harmony in the universe. But Lionville comes up just in time to prove that the Lord was wise, and put the moon in the right place. How many colors woven into the light? Seven, says Newton. Three, says David Brewster. How high is the Aurora Borealis? Two a half miles high, says Lias. One hundred and sixty-five miles, says Twinig. How far is the sun from the earth? Seventy-six million miles, says Lacaille; eighty-two million miles, says Humboldt; ninety million miles, says Henderson; one hundred and four million miles, says Mayer. Only a little difference of twenty-eight million miles! These men say we do not agree in religion. Do they agree in science? Have they come up with solid front to assault our glorious Christianity?

Even mathematicians do not agree. Taylor's Logarithms are found to have faults in them. The French metric system has wrong calculations. Talk about exact sciences! They are inexact. As far as with my little knowledge I have been able to explore, the only exact science is Christianity. There is nothing under which you can so appropriately write, "Quod erat demonstrandum."

"Gentlemen of the jury, have you agreed upon your verdict?" the court or the clerk says to the jury, having been out all night, on coming in. "Have you agreed on your verdict?" If they say yes, the verdict is taken and recorded. If they say, "No, we have not agreed," they are sent back to the jury-room. If one juryman should say, "I think the man is guilty of murder," and another juryman should say, "I think he is guilty of manslaughter," and another juryman should say, "I think he is guilty of assault and battery with intent to kill," the judge would lose his patience and say, "Go back to your room now, and make up a verdict; agree on something."

Well, my friends, there has been a great trial going on for centuries and for ages, between Scepticism, the plaintiff, versus Christianity, the defendant. The scientists have been impanelled and sworn on the jury. They have been gone for centuries, some of them, and they come back, and we say, "Gentlemen of the jury, have you agreed upon a verdict?" They say, "No, we have not agreed." Then we say, "Go back for a few more centuries, and then come in and see if you can agree, see if you can render some verdict." Now, there is not the meanest prisoner in the Tombs Court who would be condemned by a jury that could not agree, and yet you expect us to renounce our glorious Christianity for such a miserable verdict as these men have rendered, they themselves not having been able to agree.

But my subject shall no longer be defensive; it must be aggressive. I must show you that instead of Christianity falling back, it is on the march, and that the coming religion of the world is to be the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ ten thousand times intensified. It is to take possession of everything—of all laws, all manners, all customs, all cities, all nations. It is going to be so mighty as compared with what it has been, so much more mighty that it will seem almost like a new religion.

I adopt this theory, because Christianity has gone on straight ahead notwithstanding all the bombardment; and Infidelity has not destroyed a church, or crippled a minister, or rooted out one verse of the Bible, and now their ammunition seems to be pretty much exhausted. They cannot get anything new against Christianity; and if Christianity has gone on under the bombardment of centuries and still continues to advance, may we not conclude that as the powder and shot of the other side seem to be exhausted, Christianity is going on with more rapid stride?

I find an encouraging fact in the thought that the secular press in this day and the pulpit seem harnessed in the same team for the proclamation of the Gospel. To-morrow there will not be a banker on Wall street, or State street, or Third street, who will not have in his pocket or on his table treatises on Christianity, calls to repentance and Scripture passages, twenty or thirty of them, in the reports of the Christian churches of this city and other cities. Why, that thing would have been impossible a few years ago. Now, on Monday morning and Monday evening, the secular press spreads abroad more religious truth than all the tract societies of the country spread in the other six days. Blessed be the tract societies! We hail them, and we hail these others. I say it would have been impossible a few years ago. Hundreds of letters would have come to the secular newspaper offices, saying: "Stop my paper; we have religion on Sunday; don't give us any through the week. Stop my paper." But I have been told that many of the secular papers have their largest circulation on Monday morning, and the whole population of this country are becoming sermon readers. Besides that, have you not noticed that papers proclaiming themselves secular almost every week have religious discussion in them?

Go back a few years, when there was not a decent paper in the United States that had not a discussion on the doctrine of eternal punishment. Small wits made merry, I know; but there was not an intelligent man in the United States that as a result of that controversy in regard to eternal punishment did not ask himself the question, "What is to be my eternal destiny?" and so some years ago, when Tyndall offered his prayer gauge, there was not a secular paper in the United States that did not discuss the question: "Does God ever answer prayer? May the creature impress the Creator?" Are not all these facts encouraging to every Christian and every philanthropist? Besides that, the rising generation are being saturated with Gospel truth as no other generation, by this International Series of Sunday School lessons. Formerly the children were expected only to nibble at the little infantile Scripture stories, but now they are taken from Genesis to Revelation, the strongest minds of the country explaining the lessons to the teachers, and the teachers explaining them to the classes; and we are going to have in this country five million youth forestalled for Christianity. Hear it! Hear it!

Besides that, you must have noticed if you have talked on these great themes, that they are finding out that while science is grand in secular directions, worldly philosophy grand in secular directions, they cannot give any comfort to a soul in trouble.

Talking with men on steamboats and in rail-cars, I find they are coming back to the comfort of the Gospel. They say: "Somehow human science don't comfort me when I have any trouble, and I must try something else;" and they are trying the Gospel. Take your scientific consolation to that mother who has just lost her child. Apply the doctrine of the "Survival of the Fittest;" tell her that her child died because its life was not worth as much as the life of one that lived. Try that, if you dare. Go to that dying man with your transcendental phraseology, and tell him he ought to have confidence in the great "to be," and the everlasting "now," and the eternal "what is it?" and go on with your consolation and see if he is comforted.

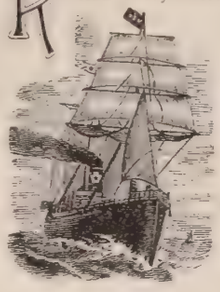
Go to that woman who has lost her husband, and tell her it was a geological necessity that that man passed out of existence, just as the megatherium disappeared in order to make room for a higher style of creation, and go on with your consolation and tell her that there is a possibility that ten million years from now we ourselves may be geological specimens on the geological shelf, petrified specimens of the extinct human race! And after you have got all through with your consolation, if the poor afflicted soul is not utterly crazed, I will send out the plainest Christian from my church, and with one-half hour of prayer and the reading of Scripture promises, the tears will be stayed, and the consolation, and the joy in that house will be like the calmness of an Indian summer sunset. There will be a glory flooding the house from floor to cupola. Oh! people are finding out themselves—and they all have troubles—they find that philosophy and science do not help them when there is a dead babe in the house. They are coming back to our glorious old-fashioned sympathetic religion.

Oh, young man! do not be ashamed to be found on the side of the Bible. Do not join those young men who in this day put their thumbs in their vest, and swagger about the streets and the stores, talking about the glorious nineteenth century, about its light being sufficient without any Bible, and without any Christ, and without any God. The time is coming—we may not live to see it, but I should not be surprised if we did see it—when this whole country is to be one great church, the forests the aisles the Alleghany and the Rocky Mountains the pillars, the chain of inland lakes, the baptistries, and the worship, the Hallelujah Chorus unto him who was, and is, and shall be evermore. Oh! come over to the majority—come under the banners of Emanuel.

Vernon was the son of an English squire. He was brought up in great elegance. There was a man working on the place by the name of Ralph. Vernon used to often talk with Ralph. After awhile Vernon went off to college, and came back with his mind full of scepticism. He talked his scepticism to Ralph the workman. After awhile Vernon went from home again, was gone for years, came back, and among his first questions when getting home was, "Where is Ralph?" "Oh!" said the father, "Ralph is in prison waiting for the day of execution." Vernon hastened to see Ralph. Ralph, looking through the wicket of the prison, said, "Vernon, how good you are to come and see me! I am glad to see you. I hardly expected you would come and see me. I don't blame you, I don't blame anybody: I only blame myself; but, Vernon, I want you to promise me one thing. Will you?" Vernon replied, "I will." "I want you to promise me never to talk scepticism in the presence of anybody. You see it might do them harm. When you used to say there was nothing in the Bible, and it didn't make any difference how we lived, we would come out happy at the last, somehow it had a bad influence upon me, and I went from bad to worse until I am here, and I must die for my crimes." By almost superhuman effort the sentence was changed, and he was to be transported to another country for life. The ship going there was wrecked on Van Diemen's Land. Among those who perished was Ralph, the victim of Vernon's scepticism. Vernon tells the story to-day with tears and a broken heart; but it is too late! Oh! do not talk scepticism, do not talk scepticism. Let God be true, though every man be found a liar!

His Life Voyage Ended.

Death of Captain Jas. H. Spencer, who took the first "Christian Herald" Food Cargo to the Russian Famine Sufferers.



READERS of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD everywhere, and more particularly those many thousands among them who sent in their offerings to swell the Russian Relief Fund raised by this journal last year for the succoring of the famine-stricken millions of Russia, will regret to learn of the death of Captain James H. Spencer, the gallant commander of the steamship Conemaugh. On his vessel was conveyed to Riga the first shipment of 2000 sacks of flour made by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund, to be followed shortly afterwards by the splendid cargo of 1500 tons of flour, corn, wheat and potatoes, sent to St. Petersburg on the specially chartered steamship Leo. Capt. Spencer was a fine specimen of the American sailor; bluff, hearty, vigorous and wholesouled, with a fund of curious and instructive information about the many different lands he had visited during his numerous voyages. For nearly forty years he had "followed the sea." In 1865 he was selected to take out to Russia the General Admiral, the largest ship ever constructed in America. He had seen considerable service in the United States Marine, especially in Mexican waters. For a number of years he was captain of the Inman liner City of Limerick, before assuming the command of the Conemaugh.

CAPTAIN JAMES H. SPENCER.

On the occasion of his trip to Riga with the relief cargo, Captain Spencer was accorded a notable reception by the Russian civic and military authorities. Twelve large steamers in that port were decorated expressly to honor the event, and their decks were crowded with the youth and beauty of the empire. Russian bands discoursed patriotic music, and the Greek Patriarch, assisting by a number of priests of that church, blessed the cargo. Toward the close of the reception ceremonies, Captain Spencer was presented with the freedom of the city and with a large loaf of bread and a golden salt-cellar on a silver tray. These official demonstrations only mildly represented the deep, overflowing gratitude of the people at the generous relief from America, and the popular joy found expression in festivities that lasted several days. Meanwhile the cargo of the Conemaugh was promptly distributed and the food, blessed by generous hearts and consecrated by prayer, was hurried forward to the afflicted provinces in the very heart of the empire.

CONVERSATION.

S S. Lesson for Sept 24.* Matt 12: 33-37. Golden Text, Col. 4: 6 By Mrs. M. Baxter.

CONVERSATION:—what a common thing it is! So ordinary and yet so important. Everybody talks: in the house and in the street, in the railway carriage and in the train, on the steamboat, in the drawing-room and in the kitchen, in the office and in the shop, people talk; and some cannot restrain themselves even when they enter into the house of God! Thus something is being poured out and something being poured in, from one mind to another, continually. When many meet together, children assembling for school, country people coming in to the market, people assembling for any public gathering and, generally people going out of a church,—what a buzz of sound there is—something is poured out, and something poured in.—what shall be the result of it?

One is Looking On and Listening; in his note-book every word of this incessant hum is being written down to be weighed in the balance of the sanctuary; and over against it all there is the solemn touchstone: "Every idle word that man shall speak, they shall give an account thereof in the day of judgment." Every idle word, every word which had no real purpose! People with empty minds are always great talkers, they no sooner get an idea into their heads than they want to tell it out, without considering what effect it might have on those to whom they tell it. What is their object? Only to indulge themselves, they like to talk, they like to occupy other people, they live unto themselves; and right over all this selfish, useless conversation is written down: Idle words, to be accounted for at the day of judgment!

Imagine for a moment, at that great day of account an hour of useless frivolous clatter tried in the scales. Such questions will surely be put as: By whose authority didst thou say this or that? For whose benefit didst thou make such and such a remark? Who gave thee the right to waste the time of such an one to whom thou wast speaking thoughtlessly? Thou hast misused the time of another, thou hast appropriated to thy own selfish pleasure, or vanity, the gift of speech which God gave thee to speak his praises and "to minister grace unto the hearers." "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh," by thy words thou art condemned; fruitless, barren, fit only for the fire!

Many Words.

And yet many, even many Christians will chatter on, without an idea that they are committing any sin by so doing. "I am sure I did not mean any harm," they will say, and they totally ignore that through this multitude of words, something is flowing out to the world which hastens or hinders the coming of the kingdom of Christ. "In the multitude of words there wanteth not sin, but he that refraineth his lips is wise."(Prov. 10: 19.) Never was there a tongue under such discipline as that of the Lord Jesus, therefore his words had such power: "I have not spoken of myself; but the Father which sent me, he gave me a commandment, what I should say, and what I should speak" (John 12: 49), and never, in any instance, did he speak his own words: "I speak to the world those things which I have heard of him;" "I do nothing of myself; but as my Father hath taught me, I speak these things. (John 8: 26: 28)

Conversation which is under the discipline of the Spirit is like the inspiration of mountain air, it quickens, it brings near to God: and he [illegible] one to another; and the Lord hearkened, and heard it, and a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon his name. And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels; and I will spare them, as a man spareth his own son that serveth him." (Mal. 3: 16, 17.)

Every conversation we hold with another is either a pouring out of our own self-life, or a pouring out of Christ. Just as fevered, poisoned breath pours out death into the atmosphere, so all conversation which is not under the discipline of the Spirit, spreads the elements of our self-life abroad. Impious conversation spreads out its baneful taint, corrupting and defiling all who hear so that they cannot be as though they had not heard this contaminating conversation, unless in God's wondrous grace, he miraculously preserves them from contagion. The bitter-spirited spread the evil and asperity of their own malice and envy abroad by the words they speak, unsettling those who would be contented by their representation of things which have become warped by passing through their own crooked minds. How many a man has lived a happy and contented life until some one came and aroused in his heart a sense that he was wronged and oppressed and then his own spirit became more bitter than that of the man whose conversation had infected him! Any conversation which leaves us with the worst feelings aroused within us can have been no blessing to us. Jesus says: "The tree is known by its fruit . . . how can ye that are evil speak good things? for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." (Matt 12: 34.) A man is amenable to the law if he robs another of money or of any of his earthly possessions, but if, in conversation, he robs him of purity, or of peace, or of contentment, or, above all, of faith in God, is he not ten times more guilty than

A Robber in the Sight of God.

"In many things we all stumble. If any stumbleth not in word, the same is a perfect man, able to bridle the whole body also." (James 3: 2; R.V.) Our beloved Lord was thus a perfect Man; and as man, the secret of his perfection in word was his absolute submission to, and trust in his Father. It is terrible to think how much harm Christians do in conversation. How can it be otherwise until they learn that they are not their own, and that their tongue is a member of Christ (1.Cor. 6: 15), and an instrument for God's use (Rom. 6: 13), to be used not by themselves but by him, to be kept, not by him; a means of communicating, not their thoughts, but his thoughts to others. Until we know by humbling, perhaps by bitter experience, how often we stumble in word, and come to trust the Lord alone for grace to restrain, and to use our conversation, we shall always be in danger of doing harm when we open our lips.

His conversation is a good guage of a man's depth of character. Those who talk out all they hear, even of the things of God, talk it away, and it does not take root. That which we go over with God first abides. Many think it is quite necessary to communicate bits of information about the Lord's work, etc., to others. But there are times when, if we are under the discipline of the Spirit, even this is checked by him. The person to whom one would speak is perhaps and even such a communication which at another time might be in place, would be a distraction to him just then. We cannot hurt others much by our silence, they may wonder at us but it cannot hurt them, while unnecessary words do infinite harm. But, after all, the close leading of God is needed that we may not stumble in word.

It is "out of the abundance, or overflow of the heart the mouth speaketh," just as flowers and fruit are the overflow of the life of the plant, so conversation is the overflow of the heart. If the praises of God come more readily to our lips than anything else, it is because our hearts are full of his goodness. If some unkind and depreciatory remark about another come most unbidden to our lips, it is because this thought of others has been rankling there and has superseded God's place within us, O when we meet again, at the great day of account, our useless, idle words, how deeply ashamed we will all be!

"He that hath knowledge spareth his words." (Prov. 17: 27.) There is a wonderful depth about men and women who have not the law of silence, not silence by constraint; but a silence which comes from unbroken communing with God, which instinctively passes all in review before him, and then being thus prepared, ventures to speak of it with man. It is impossible to be much in the presence of God and to be a chatterbox. Who would expect such men as Moses or Elijah to rattle on at any length with needless words or ordinary small talk? It could not be.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

REVIEW Sunday affords an opportunity, which the teacher cannot afford to miss, of collecting and grouping in a compact shape the lessons of the past twelve Sundays. Unless this is done, the study of the several subjects may be of transient value. Like desultory study of any kind, it will speedily pass from the memory if the connection and relation of one subject to another is not explained. In this instance, before passing from Paul's life to

SCENES OF PAUL'S MISSIONARY JOURNEYS.

Paul's teaching, the pause should be utilized in sketching the aspects of the Apostle's life and character which have been presented by the subjects of the past three months' lessons. Paul as a missionary, as a prisoner, as an orator, as a shipwrecked traveller, and finally as a teacher in bonds, should be the subject of the day. There is the more reason to present this general survey on account of the enormous influence Paul exerted on the infant church. There is no doubt that Christianity as it exists to-day is largely the result of his work. None of the other Apostles was capable of giving to the world the philosophic and spiritual conception of the religion of Christ which Paul gave, and it is evident that he was specially raised up and miraculously prepared for the purpose. A man of intense physical energy, and high spirituality, of profound learning, of brilliant literary ability, and of keen logical intellect, he presented Christianity not only as the outgrowth and culmination of the Jewish theology, but as the universal religion adapted to the needs of the whole human race. By his preaching Christianity was carried beyond the narrow confines of Judea into Europe; and by his pen, it has been carried down the centuries, its claims, its merits, and its divine origin maintained and advocated with indisputable logic and resistless eloquence. A session of the Sunday School may be given with advantage to the task of impressing on every mind a true conception of this most remarkable man.

I am with thee. (Acts 18: 10.) Although several times a prisoner and frequently in danger of assassination and lynching, Paul never wavered in his purpose, but preached whenever he had opportunity. The secret of his perseverance and his dauntless courage lay in the assurance given by God himself, "I am with thee." A similar conviction was the support of the great reformer who in character resembled the great apostle. When Luther was summoned to attend the Diet at Worms his friends, notwithstanding the safe conduct granted to him by the Emperor Charles V., apprehending danger to his person, would have dissuaded him from going thither. Luther replied: "I am determined to enter the city in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, though as many devils should oppose me as there are tiles upon all the houses in Worms." He was accompanied from Wittenberg by some friends and one hundred horsemen; but he took only eight horsemen into Worms. When he stepped out of the carriage he said in the presence of a great concourse of people: "God will be on my side."

The Lord had called us to preach the Gospel unto them. (Acts 16: 10.) Paul was never in doubt about his commission and never hesitated in going to fulfil it. The other apostles were for a long time doubtful about it being right to preach to the Gentiles, and to the last did not give the work their cordial sympathy. The same disposition survived till modern times. When in 1787 William Carey in a public meeting of ministers proposed as a subject for discussion, "The duty of Christians to attempt the spread of the Gospel among heathen nations," an old minister named Ryland reproved him sharply. "Young man," he said, sternly, "sit down! When God pleases to convert the heathen, he will do it without your help or mine." But five years afterward, mainly through the efforts of young Carey, the Baptist Missionary Society was formed, and thirty years later it was reported that twelve hundred heathen had been gathered into mission churches and the Bible had been translated into twenty languages. One of the first men to publicly express his thankfulness was Dr. Ryland, a son of the venerable minister whose voice had been so emphatically raised against the project.

As he reasoned . . . Felix trembled. (Acts 24: 25.) A better testimony to the power and faithfulness of Paul's eloquence could not be found than in the fact that such a man as Felix trembled under it. Preaching, to be effective must be personal and applicable to the audience, as Paul's speech was before the Roman governor. The story is told of a famous open-air preacher named William Dawson who was noted for his faithfulness in dealing with the sins common among the people who formed his audiences. On one occasion he was interrupted in the course of a sermon by the keeper of the village dry-goods store who rose to his feet flourishing what looked like a cane in his hand. He held it well up in sight of all the people and then broke it in pieces. "Now, Sir," he shouted, "you can go on." His conduct was explained afterward. It was his yard-measure that he broke. He was in the habit of using it as a walking-stick, knowing that it wore shorter by use. He had continued to use it as a yard-measure although it was then more than an inch less than the required thirty-six inches. Under Dawson's preaching he had been so moved as to resolve never to use it again and broke it on the spot.

Some on boards and some on broken pieces of the ship. (Acts 27: 44.) Such a scene of wreck as Paul was in occured near the Cape of Good Hope some years ago. It was on a desolate part of the coast where no help was likely to come. But a farm laborer named Altemade, a native of Holland happened to be there on his journey from one town to another. He was on horseback and was hurrying along through the storm as fast as his steed could carry him, when he heard cries and saw the men struggling in the water. The greater part of the crew had perished, but on every plank and spar in the surf were some men holding on for dear life. Altemade pulled in his horse, looked at them for a moment and then boldly plunged into the roaring breakers. Two men seized him; bidding them hold fast, he turned his horse's head and carried them ashore. Fourteen men were thus drawn out. Weary and almost exhausted and his horse weak, he went in for the eighth time. Again he reached two men and was returning when an enormous wave struck the horse and overturned it. Altemade's feet were entangled in the stirrup leathers and he was unable to extricate himself. He and his horse and the men he was trying to save were swept out to sea and drowned. He had sacrificed himself in the effort to save others.

With a soldier who kept him. (Acts 28: 16.) According to the Roman custom Paul would be chained to this soldier, yet Paul in these circumstances taught all who came to him and wrote his epistles. The prison has been more than once in modern times a scene of joy through the power of Christ. When Samuel Rutherford of Aberdeen was imprisoned for preaching the Gospel, he wrote to a friend: "The Lord is with me; I care not what man can do. I burden no man and I want for nothing. My chains are gilded with gold. This in haste from my palace in Aberdeen."

THE GOSPEL PIONEER OF JAPAN.

How Joseph Neesima the Japanese Aristocrat Came to America and was Converted and went back to Japan to Found a Christian College.

WE are indebted to Dr. H. Loomis, the famous missionary of Yokohama, Japan, for the following history of one of Japan's most eminent sons, who has done his native land a more valuable service than she yet understands. Leaving the country by stealth at the risk of his life he came to America, and through the kindness of a Boston merchant received an excellent education, became converted to Christ and went back to Japan to inaugurate a religious, moral, and social reformation. He was the founder of the celebrated university which under the name of the Doshisha is training Japan's noblest young men in the principles of Christ:

Joseph Hardy Neesima was born in the city of Tokio in Feb., 1843. He belonged to a Samurai, or soldier family, aud was given the early training which thousands of his class receive. As was the ordinary custom of the people he was instructed for several years in the Chinese characters and literature,in the art of fencing, horseback riding and other military exercises; and when quite young aspired to be a brave soldier, or man of honor, like those of whom he had often read in the traditions of his country.

That he might be successful in the use of arms he frequently went to the temple of the god of war, prayed sincerely that he might receive strength,and engaged in what he afterwards came to regard as very foolish worship.

He was taught like others the heathen systems of worship; and rose up early in the morning and went to the temple more than three miles distant; and,having worshipped,returned to his breakfast. This was done in order that he might not only obtain some blessing from the god, but also that he might receive the praise of his friends and neighbors.

But this worship of mere idols did not satisfy the deep and secret longing of his heart. As the Christian religion was then strictly prohibited he had never heard of the Gospel, but a shadowy conviction of His presence who is not far away from every one of us had dawned upon him and awakened strange aspirations after something better than he had yet experienced.

While in this state of mind a friend lent him a number of Chinese books to read. One of them was a historical geography of the United States, written by Rev. Dr. Bridgman. But what excited his interest and curiosity most were a few Christian books published at Shanghai. From these he first learned that there was one only and true God who had created all things. He also discovered that his other name was the "Heavenly Father," and this inspired still more reverence towards him because he thought he was more to him than a mere Creator of the world.

These books made such a profound impression upon his mind that he wished at once to visit America, to study its people, and know the God who is there revealed and worshipped. In his own words, he says: "Having recognized God as my Heavenly Father, I felt that I was no longer inseparably bound to my parents. A cord which had held me strongly to my home was broken asunder. At that moment I felt that I must take my own course. I must serve my Heavenly Father more than my earthly parents. This new idea gave me courage to become a Christian, to forsake my Prince, and also to leave my country and my home."

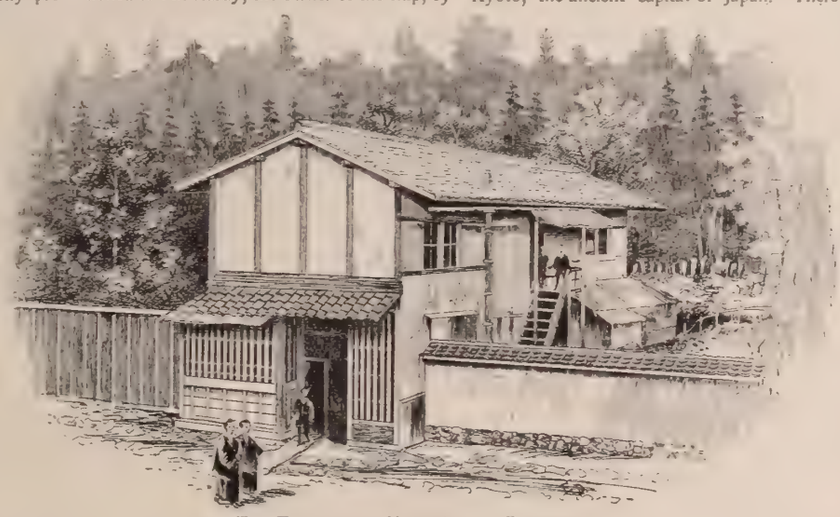
As the penalty for leaving his country, as well as becoming a Christian, was death, he did not dare to make his full purpose known. In the study of foreign books, also, his friends gave him no encouragement. His daimio cautioned him against the influence of foreign learning; to use his own language: "Perhaps it will mistake yourself." But of this he had no fear. And so earnest and persevering was he in the search after truth that the abridgment of the Bible was carefully read at night, lest (as he says) "the savage country's law would bring to death of the cross his whole family."

His purpose grew strong within him; and while walking the streets of Yedo, one morning, and wondering what to do, he met, quite unexpectedly, a friend, who informed him that a schooner would leave for Hakodate in three days; and it was suggested that he should take the voyage. Having got permission from his prince, he left his home not to return until his purpose had been accomplished.

After reaching Hakodate he obtained employment as teacher of Japanese to the now well-known Bishop Nicolai of the Greek church; and while thus engaged, looked about for some means of escape. At length a friend in charge of a foreign store secured a passage for him to Shanghai, on an American schooner. But when the time drew near for his departure, he momentarily hesitated to accept the offer, because of the grief, and perhaps the danger, that his going would bring to his parents. "But," he says, "I said, within myself, if I fail in my attempt altogether, it may be no least loss for my country; but if I am permitted to come home after my long exile to yet unknown lands, I may render some service to my dear country."

Taken on board of the ship in the disguise of a shop boy, and in the dead of night, he was locked up in a room and kept concealed until the vessel had been far of the harbor. Had he been found there he would have been put to death as it was then a capital offense for a Japanese to leave the country. As he had no money to pay his passage it was agreed that he should work for it. Upon reaching Shanghai the captain took an interest in his behalf and secured him a passage to America on board of tne ship Wild Rover, which belonged to the Hon. Alphæus Hardy, of Boston. Before leaving China he heard that Bibles were for sale there, and, unwilling to beg from his new friends, he sold his sword and bought a Chinese copy of the Scriptures; and this was his constant companion during the eight months voyage. The captain was extremely kind to him, and before reaching Boston he had learned the principles of navigation.

The case of the young wanderer was mentioned to Mr. Hardy, the owner of the ship, by the compassionate captain and Mr. Hardy thought at first that Neesima might become the house servant for whom he happened then to be seeking. But after receiving him into his home, a few days was sufficient to show that Neesima was no ordinary youth. Then Mr. and Mrs. Hardy took him into their family as a trust from God; and for ten yearsin the best schools of America he was carefully and conscientiously instructed; and this poor friendless Japanese boy, who stole out of his native land in darkness and secrecy was given a Christian home and the best advantages that money could procure.



THE THEOLOGICAL HALL OF THE DOSHISHA.

He was first sent to Phillips Academy, then to Amherst College, and afterwards to Andover Theological Seminary. One of his college mates says of him: "His English was broken then, and his vocabulary small, but his heart was big and full of love. Through every word and act, transparent showed the man,winning the respect of all. He was bright, keen, and full of fun. No one ever saw anything mean in him there was nothing dishonorable in his make up. He was modest, patient, brave, and the highest reach of his ambition was to lose himself in the consecration of his life and thought to his Master."

During the course of his studies the Japanese Embassy arrived in the United States, and needing an interpreter and translator invited Neesima to accompany the Embassy as an attache of the Commissioner of Education. His pardon for leaving his country was obtained; and in this official capacity he traveled through the United States, Canada, and Europe, examining the schools and educational systems of different lands. In this way he gained much valuable knowledge for his future work; and was greatly strengthened in his purpose to devote his life to the Christian education of his countrymen.

His integrity and great abilities so impressed the Embassy as to secure for him the warm friendship and esteem of many who have since become the most influential statesmen in Japan, and who have more than once shown their appreciation of him and his work. Having completed his studies, he was ordained in Boston in September, 1874. At the meeting of the American Board that year, in Rutland, Vt., he was put down for a five minute address. But abandoning the set speech which he had prepared he made a most touching plea for money to found a Christian school in Japan. This appeal secured in a short time a pledge of $5,000. With this sum of money he returned to his native land to found an institution in which the Christian principles of faith in God, love of truth, and benevolence towards one's fellow men should train up not only men of science, but men of conscientiousness and sincerity.

To his inexpressible joy he found that during his absence from his country all had changed. The old edicts against Christianity were no longer in force, converts were multiplying in various places, and a desire for Western science and improvement was spreading all over the land. He began at once to tell his people what he had seen and heard; and also spoke with great power and earnestness to the crowds who came to hear him of that God who so loved the word that he gave his only Son to die for sinners. At Annaka,where his parents lived, the largest temple was opened for his use, and even that was too small to hold the eager throng who gathered to see and hear him.

The chosen field for his future work was Kyoto, the ancient capital of Japan. There he first opened a Christian school, which was called the Doshisha, (School of one Purpose),with six pupils. By the aid of his friends in the government he was able to secure a most valuable location adjoining the old palace grounds and as circumstances have permitted the work has steadily grown in numbers and influence. For some time there was violent opposition on the part of priests and officials on account of its Christian character; but through the influence of a counsellor to the Kyoto Governor and some of the highest officials that opposition gradually diminished and the school became steadily popular. The number of students not only increased, but their character was such as to call forth the highest praise from the governor of the City.

Mr. Neesima taught a daily class in philosophy, but his chief work was in the theological department. As a resident of the school his duties were particularly onerous and difficult. But he acted with great wisdom and skill; and a distinguished cabinet officer pointed to that institution as one reason why he favored the spread of Christianity in Japan. Through his influence the foreign and native teachers were able to work together in harmony, and the students revered and honored him as a father or elder brother.

In speaking of his work Dr. Learned says: "Utterly renouncing all desire for worldly power and honor, seeking only the good of the school he toiled and suffered. The prevasive influence of his faith and unselfishness has been no small part of the educational work of the school."

So great was the change in opinion that the leading citizens of Kyoto, including the highest officials, pledged their support to a university of which he should be the guiding spirit; and his assistance was sought for in the establishment, or conduct of schools in all parts of the Empire.

THE LATE JOSEPH H. NEESIMA, LL.D.

But devoted as he was to educational matters, he always kept foremost the great work of evangelizing the country. This was the immediate object of all his work; and wherever he went he was ever ready to preach, and his services and addresses were both popular and effective. Of this department of his labor he writes with deepest interest "O if we had workers enough what will be the Lord's harvest?"

Impaired health at length obliged him to seek both rest and a change of climate. In 1884 he wrote "it is a great trial to leave Japan. But I can leave our school in our Father's hands, and come out with great joy and peace." On his way to America he wrote "Herewith I send you my special request that you will pray for the speedy conversion of Japan's enlargement intensely. My heart burns for her, and I cannot check it."

In 1885 he returned to Japan and effected a plan for the enlargement of the school into a university. So great was the confidence of the people in his ability and success that nearly $60,000 ($47,000) was devoted for this purpose by the leading statesmen and business men of Japan.

In October, 1889, he went to Tokyo to interest prominent men of the capital in a further endowment of the university. While there he took a severe cold,and was soon after completely prostrated. As his critical condition became known special meetings for prayer were held in many places; and great was the anxiety felt in his behalf. When told that he could not recover, he talked for hours about the Doshisha, and the best methods for the evangelization of Japan. He then indicated a well devised plan for the future enlargement of the missionary work. Loving messages were sent to his friends in America, to the trustees, teachers, students, and contributors to the college; and especially to the Japanese Missionary Society. As the end drew near he raised his hand saying "sufficient," and with the words, "Peace, Joy, Heaven," on his lips entered into rest.

It has been truly said "Neesima's love knew no limits; and the university which he founded is not the only monument, and does not represent the sum of his activity. For beyond all the energy and self-sacrifice involved in its foundation, are these personal and indirect influences upon men and society which cannot be estimated, and which widen from year to year."

THESE TRYING TIMES.

MAY the Lord God of nations help our Congress in their especial session. Our faith is in God and not in politicians. It is most evident that our national affairs are under divine management. Through what crises this nation has passed! Crisis of foreign war, crisis of nullification, crisis of civil war, crisis of financial panic, crisis of repudiation, crisis of electoral commission, crisis of assassination, crisis of presidential disability, and yet all is well. We have had wise statesmanship in cabinet council, and heroic deeds on battlefield; but this successful navigation of the American Government is of the Lord, and to him be the praise. Among other nations there have been no such frequent and mighty deliverances. I think I see that God intends us for still greater prosperity; but do not let us defeat his design of mercy by our own wickedness. National wealth, unsanctified, is voluptuous waste, is riot, is debauchery, is magnificent woe, is splendid rottenness, is gilded death. Woe to us for the wine-vats, if drunkenness wallows in them. Woe for the harvests, if greed sickles them. Woe for the merchandise, if avarice swallows it. Woe for the cities, if misrule walks them. Woe to the land, if God-defying crime debauches it. Our only safety is more Bibles, more pulpits, more free schools, more Christian printing-presses, more earnest men, more Sabbath-schools, more light. Nations, like individuals, are sometimes born again. By the same divine power that regenerates the soul, a state or an empire may come to conviction, to repentance, to conversion, to adoption, to sanctification.

NEWSPAPER INFLUENCE.

SAD things for friends who tarry, but fortunate for the world, that men do not live, as once, to two, or four or eight centuries. There are men in this country to-day, who, if they could live two hundred years, would put the United States in their vest-pocket. Fortunately for the world that the energies of most men are folded up before they become octogenarians. The psalmist's words may convey sadness for the individual, but they mean prosperity for the world: "The days of our years are three score and ten; and if by reason of strength they be four score years, yet is their strength labor and sorrow: for it is soon cut off, and we fly away." I imagine that the divine limit to human longevity is wisely put. Men are born at the right time, and they die at the right time. But while men die their works live on. It is especially so with those who work in the fabric of the immortal intellect. Editors make wars or stop them, advance civilizations or retard them. What for the last half-century was the influence of any other seven men in this country compared with that of Mordecai Noah, James Watson Webb, James Gordon Bennett, Horace Greeley, Henry J. Raymond, Erastus Brooks and Thurlow Weed? Like it or dislike it as you may, I simply state the potential and tremendous fact. The mightiest men of all departments have recognized the newspaper press as the most important agency for influencing the public mind. Andrew Jackson, who had no literary faculty, would lie on the lounge in the White House and smoke, while Amos Kendall, the cultured, would sit by his side and write editorials for the Washington Globe, expressive of the President's sentiments, the editorials printed or torn up according as they pleased or displeased the Chief Magistrate. So all great political, and social, and literary, and moral enterprises, if successful, have laid hold of the wheel of the printing-press. That wheel is either the front wheel of the car of Progress, or the front wheel of an awful Juggernaut. A comparatively few people read books. Why? Because the newspaper has for the great masses taken the place of the book. Look over the street-cars and ferryboats and the great railroad trains, and where you find one man with a book, you find thirty with a newspaper. Take one of the great dailies, and during the year it publishes medical information to more people than all the medical journals of America; legal information to more people than all the legal journals of the land; religious information to more people than all the tract societies of the country; agricultural information to more people than all the farming journals put together. So far from deploring this fact, it is a matter of congratulation. The newspaper is the universal channel of intelligence for the people. Portable and easily carried in hand or pocket, it is read on the way to business, or on the way home. That is about all the time our business and working-people have for reading. After a man has been all day bothered with dry goods, or stocks, or hardware, or bargain-making, you might pile around him a barricade of metaphysical treatises by Sir William Hamilton, and he would not read one of them. The newspaper has overcome the book. Our business is to pray to God for the elevation of the important agency I speak of, and to employ it in the distribution of the truth. The more good newspapers the less chance for bad ones. Let us fight bad pictures with good pictures, bad sentiments with good sentiments, fraud with honesty, lies with the truth.

POST-OFFICES.

WE notice that there are many changes of postmasters. The right administration of their office has so much to do with the public welfare, that no good citizen can be indifferent. What vast changes since, in the fifteenth century, the butchers and drovers were the carriers of letters from place to place, and the reception of perhaps half a dozen letters was more than the average of a lifetime, until now, on cheap paper, with cheap pen and cheap ink, we may put all we have to say in an envelope, and with a two-cent stamp on the outside, and the name and residence of our friend or correspondent on the back of the envelope, we may commit it for lightning travel to its place of destination! Let this blessing be rightly appreciated by all the people, and all attempts to injure the postal system by blackmailing, the transmission of the dishonest and unclean, come to exposure and imprisonment. What a day we live in! Through what quick and confidential modes the world is brought together in sympathy! May all these agencies, postal, telephonic and telegraphic, be consecrated to God and the world's betterment, and all we say, and all we write, and all we do, be productive of usefulness! But nothing will ever take the place of the letter. It has a privacy that never belonged to the telegram; it has a voice which never dies. Some of us have such letters stuck away among our valuables, and though the hand that wrote them long ago has turned to dust, the written words are to-day as warm with sentiment and love as the hour they were posted. A letter of Christian advice, a letter of kind admonition, a letter of condolence, is potent beyond the spoken word, and will live after the hand that wrote it has forgotten its cunning. Claudius wrote a letter to Felix; David wrote a letter to Joab; Mordecai sent letters to the Jews; Paul carried letters to Damascus; but all these have less meaning for you than the last letter written you by your departed father, or mother, or brother, or sister or child. May we all have the grace of Christian correspondence! May our lives, instead of being misdirected letters in the dead-letter post-office, be living epistles read and known of all men!

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Reader, Parallel, Kans. Who were the Nicolaitans mentioned in Rev. 2: 15?

It cannot now be answered with absolute certainty. Even the Fathers who wrote in the early centuries do not agree on the subject. The opinion which has the largest number of adherents is that they were a sect who disregarded on principle the injunction of the Apostles (Acts 15: 20) and while professing to be Christians joined in idolatrous orgies and led licentious lives.

Jas. Brewer, Harrisburg, Pa. What is the origin of the name Mephistopheles, as applied to Satan?

Some philologists assert that it is of Semitic origin, composed of two words, meaning "destroyer" and "liar." Others declare it has a Latin origin in the word "mephitis," signifying a noxious or sulphurous odor. Still others give it a Greek origin from three derivatives signifying "not light-loving." It was first used in English literature a little over 300 years ago.

Ira E. Hilton, Micosta, Mich., and Simon A. Campbell, Kinross, P. E. I. What is meant by Christ preaching to the spirits in prison (1. Pet. 3: 19)?

The passage is mysterious but the prevalent opinion among scholars is that the Apostle was asserting that the Antediluvians of whom he was speaking had not gone to their doom unwarned. That Christ by his Spirit had preached to them in their lifetime, but they had not heeded. As a preacher might say of a member of his congregation who had been sent to the Penitentiary, "I have preached to that man in the penitentiary," although the man was in the church when he preached to him.

George H. Clarke, Eleuthera, Bahamas. 1. Was the Prodigal Son a son of his father before, during and after his wandering? 2. Where did the spirit of Lot's wife go when she was turned into a pillar of salt?

1. As to the actual fact, of course, you are in no doubt. We presume your question refers to the analogical inference. Christ, in relating the parable was showing the readiness of God to forgive and welcome repentant sinners. That was the main purpose of the parable and you must not expect that all the accessories to the story have a spiritual meaning. Nevertheless, we are in a sense the offspring of God even when we are in sin; but only those who are brought by conversion into reconciliation with him enter into that new and closer relation which is described as sons of God. 2. It went where it would have gone if she had died any other kind of death. Her looking back to the city proved that her heart was there and that, unlike her husband, she had been happy there. It was the look of regret. Lot's soul having been vexed there from day to day (see II. Peter 2: 8), he did not look back with any regret at having to leave it.

P. T. Glass, Kenville, Tex. 1. At what time did the original Greek language cease to be spoken in its purity? 2. What is the language now spoken in Greece? 3. What nations have participated in the preparation and use of the International Sunday School lessons?

1. The first writer to discard the ancient or Attic form for a more modern dialect was Theodorus Ptochoprodromus, who lived in 1143-1180. His language is essentially modern Greek. The change, however, was a gradual one, going on for probably a century or two before it was acknowledged by the scholars. 2. The modern Greek, known as such all over the world. It is called "Romeka" by the natives of Rhodes, Cyprus, Smyrna and elsewhere. 3. Practically all the European nations and America as well; every nation where Christianity is taught and practised.

M. McC., Weimar, Tex. Where does the Presbyterian Church find its authority for baptizing infants and if that is the true baptism why were the converts mentioned in the New Testament not baptized until after they had repented and accepted Christ?

The Presbyterian Church regards baptism as an act of dedication. The parents of the child dedicate it to Christ by the rite he instituted. The fact that the baptism of the household is mentioned (as in Acts 16:15), when the head of the household was converted, is regarded as a sanction for the baptism of children. The reason why the baptism of adult believers is mentioned in the New Testament is that they were converts from another faith. The Presbyterian missionary in a heathen land would baptize an adult convert because he had not been baptized before and he would baptize his children in token of the family being henceforth a Christian family.

Miss Etta M. Blanch, Birchton, N. Y., writes: "There are several things which have been mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD within the last few weeks to which I must contribute as soon as I can. I have for several years past, given systematically a certain proportion of my income to the Lord's cause, and I will henceforth answer to every call for aid that is made in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD; though I cannot, as some, give my dollars, yet, I will give my cents; if I cannot give ten cents I will give five cents, if I cannot give five cents I will give three cents, and I think that if every reader would do as much as this, enough money would come in quickly to carry on all these charities."

C. C. McBride, Port Oxford, Oregon, writes: "In the July 26th number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, T. S. Blough of Exeter, Neb., requests some reader to furnish or tell where he can get the words of the song: 'There's a question that comes to us all.' I have a small book called Highway Hymns and Songs, which has the words. It is published at the Highway office, Nevada, Iowa."

There's a question that comes to us all,
And it comes many times in a day;
Oh, it comes as a kind angel's call,
That says, Count the cost, will it pay?
Will it pay in the conflict with sin,
Thus to barter this soul's life away?
Though the pleasures of time you may win,
After all do you think it will pay?

CHORUS:
Will it pay? Will it pay?
Thus to trifle this brief life away;
When the day of eternity's near
Oh, then, do you think it will pay?

J. M. H. Chase, Kan., writes: "T. S. Blough, Exeter, Neb., will find the song that he asks about in a volume entitled: Songs for Worship."

J. F. C., Crystal City, Mo. 1. Can a seeker after sanctification gain what he seeks if he smokes and occasionally drinks whiskey as a beverage? 2. What is the meaning of the words in the Lord's Prayer, "Lead us not into temptation?" 3. Why did Moses appoint cities of Refuge? Did he sanction the avenger of blood slaying a man who had killed another by accident?

1. We cannot understand how a man can be in earnest in seeking sanctification who indulges in those habits, and certainly no one can obtain the blessing without earnest seeking. If he really desires sanctification and earnestly prays for it strength, will be given him to abandon the habits. 2. The original words would be more correctly rendered, "Abandon us not in temptation." 3. In the condition of society at that time a relative of the deceased was regarded as justly entitled to kill the slayer if he could. The establishment of cities of Refuge was a step toward a better administration of the law. Civilization had to advance by degrees.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE CORINTH CANAL.

AN engineering feat which was projected more than two thousand years ago has just been completed. It is the piercing of the Corinthian Isthmus which united Morea, the ancient Peloponnesus, to Greece. The distance across the isthmus from the Gulf of Lepanto to the Gulf of Ægina is but little more than three miles, but it barred the passage of ships proceeding from the Adriatic to Constantinople and the Black Sea, involving a voyage of two hundred and fifty miles around the peninsula. The work has been done by M. Matsas, a Greek engineer, and has occupied eleven years. The canal is 72 feet wide and 27 feet deep. In one part of the passage, which is shown in the illustration, the cutting is through sandstone rocks 250 feet above the sea level. It is this section that involved the heaviest labor and expense. The canal will now be used chiefly by trading vessels from Brindisi to Smyrna. It has not the world-wide importance it would have had centuries ago, when the Mediterranean was the central sea of the known world and its waters were traversed by the world's greatest navies and commercial fleets. The project of cutting the isthmus was mooted by Periander 628 years before our era. Julius Cæsar, Caligula and Nero all had the idea under consideration, but the Roman engineers believed that the level of the water on the one side was higher than on the other, and apprehended that a flood would ensue from piercing the isthmus. Subsequently, when work was actually begun, it was abandoned, because the Roman laborers declared they heard groans proceeding from the ground, when they struck it with their picks. Thus superstition and ignorance prevented the barrier being removed, as they have prevented the removal of many other barriers to the world's progress. They are to-day the chief obstacles to the progress of Christ's kingdom and they will never entirely disappear until He comes in whose presence every valley shall be exalted and every mountain and hill laid low. (Luke 3: 5.)

A Section of the New Canal Across the Isthmus of Corinth.

Frozen in Torrid Weather.

A New York physician reports that one of the most critical cases on his hands is that of a man who was badly frozen during the severe heat of the latter days of August. The man is a butcher, of rather obese build, who suffers much in hot weather. On Aug. 28, when the thermometer was registering among the nineties, the butcher was oppressed as usual, and thought he would get some relief by sitting for a few minutes in the refrigerating room. He took a chair in and sat down. He thinks he dozed for a minute or two, and when he awaked he was struck with consternation at finding the door shut. His clerk had noticed the door being open, and not supposing any one was inside, had shut it and gone home. There was no way of opening the door from the inside, and the man shouted himself hoarse without getting assistance. He was bitterly cold, and was alarmed at finding himself becoming sleepy. He knew that if he yielded to slumber he would die, so he paced the room to keep himself awake. The desire to sleep continuing, he tried violent exercise, lifting down all the big joints of meat and restoring them to their hooks. He continued the work till his back ached, but he dare not desist. Just as he was becoming exhausted, his son came from his home to see what was detaining his father, and found him. When he was released he fainted, and has been seriously ill ever since. His physician, therefore, has the novel duty of treating a patient for frostbite in summer. Such a duty sometimes falls to the lot of a minister or Christian worker, and he finds it more difficult to cure him of the effects of the remedy he has taken than it would have been to cure him of the original malady. Such patients are those who, under the misery of conviction of sin, plunge into worldly pleasure and dissipation for relief (Jer. 2:13.)

A Child's Long Journey.

A policeman on duty at the Pennsylvania Railroad Station at Newark, N. J., noticed, one day last week, a little colored girl wandering about the station, she carried a small satchel and, attached to her dress, was a conspicuous tag. The girl referred him to the tag for an answer to his questions of where she was going and where she came from. On one side was written the name of a citizen of Newark and on the other the words, "This little girl wants to go to Newark, and conductor will please get her tickets in Washington and see her on the train to Newark, and oblige agent, Rectortown, Va." The conductor had done as requested and the child was safe in Newark. The police-matron took charge of her until the citizen to whom she was consigned could be found. Perhaps she would have reached her destination as safely without the tag, as she could have answered questions; but the child might have been misunderstood, or not believed, so the agent acted wisely in affixing the tag which stated plainly whither she wanted to go. A similarly useful purpose in the journey of life is served by church membership. Children are often discouraged from joining a church after they have been led to Christ, but it should not be done. Their church connection will be a plain intimation to all who may be associated with them of the place whither they want to go. (Heb. 11: 14-16.)

A Manufacturer's Difficulty.

Technical skill is required for success in all branches of manufacture, but in none more than in the production of the fabric known as "Gloria," which is now extensively used in dress-goods, umbrellas and other articles. It is made of silk and wool of fine texture. As it is usually dyed in the piece, after it has been woven, there is a great difficulty in obtaining a uniform color. The two fibres have different affinities for the various dyes and unless nice discrimination is used in selecting them, different shades result from the application of the same dye. The fabric then has a streaked or spotted appearance, the silk fibre being of one shade and the wool of another. When a shot effect is desired, the divergence helps to produce the effect, but in that case there is a difference in the mode of weaving the gloria. For a solid color, it is necessary that the fibres should be selected by someone who knows exactly the affinity each has to the dye that will be used. It is a curious fact that the Jews were forbidden by law to wear garments made of such materials. There was no prohibition against any material; they might wear linen or wool, but they must not mix them in the same garment. The prohibition is not binding under the new dispensation, which deals with the heart and life rather than with garments and outward signs; but the prohibition applies there with greater force, though it is often disregarded. The life and character of the Christian are frequently blotched by inconsistencies, showing that part of his nature is still worldly, though the Holy Spirit waits to make it all divine. (Jude 24.)

Interesting Junk.

A press dispatch from Chicago states that the World's Fair Commissioners will soon be ready to receive bids for the purchase and removal of the beautiful buildings of "the White City." It is expected that the only persons likely to make offers will be dealers in junk. The white plaster cannot be put to any other use, so that the only material which can be turned to available account will be the timber and the iron and steel arches. This fact must involve an enormous depreciation of value, and it is thought that only a very small sum will be realized from the sale. The dispatch states that the buildings which cost the most money to erect will be those for which the lowest prices will be obtained. The Manufactures and Liberal Arts Building, which cost more than a million and a half dollars to build will, it is expected, realize nothing at all, as it will cost almost as much to tear it down as the material is worth. It is believed that any man may have it for nothing who will undertake to clear it away. It is difficult to realize that edifices so beautiful and so costly are so worthless. Yet there is no mystery about the fact. Being intended for only a temporary purpose they were not built of substantial materials. It is so with all human work. The man who builds for time, seeking only the praise and admiration of his fellows, will find in the day of final test that popularity is of no account, and if he has done no permanent good his work will perish like stubble in the fire (1 Cor. 3:12, 13.)

Repenting a Foolish Bargain.

Justice Van Brunt of the Supreme Court of New York granted an injunction last week restraining a lady in the city from taking action on a deed in her possession. It appears from the defendant's story that about two years ago she made the acquaintance in a boarding-house of a lady from Ohio, who had come to New York to seek employment. She had been unsuccessful, and was urgently in need of money. She said that she had four brothers and sisters, and when her father died his estate would be divided among them, in equal shares, so that eventually she would be well off, but for the present she was in straits. After several conversations of the same kind, in which various plans for raising money were discussed, a bargain was struck between the two ladies. The Ohio lady was to convey to the New York lady her interest in her father's estate whatever it might be worth and whenever it might accrue, for fifty dollars in money and a diamond ring worth two hundred dollars. The consideration was duly paid and the Ohio lady signed the deed of conveyance. The lawyer who drew it up says that he fully explained the effect of the deed to her and she appeared to understand him. Now, however, that her father is dead and his property is divided, she finds her share is six thousand dollars. She naturally regrets her bargain and has applied to the Court to have the deed of conveyance set aside. Regret infinitely more poignant will be felt at the last by all who have preferred present gratification to the eternal inheritance. Every man makes a foolish bargain who barters his hope of heaven for wealth or pleasure. (Matt. 16: 26.)

BRIEF NOTES.

To any one of our readers who will send us the names and full addresses of twenty-five church officers, church members, or Sunday School workers, we will send a beautiful section of Olive-Wood cut from the Mount of Olives, polished by native workmen in Jerusalem and bearing on its face in English and Hebrew characters the name of the Holy City.

The house in the north end of Boston which Lyman Beecher occupied as a parsonage is now occupied by the students of Boston University as a social settlement.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

A GLORIOUS METAMORPHOSIS.

Sermon Preached last Sunday, Sept. 10, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.

Text: II. Cor. 3: 18, "But we all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord."

THE apostle Paul's masterful ministry as an apostle of Christianity was due in the second degree to the thoroughness of his discipleship in Judaism. The noble apostle always meant to be loyal to the Messiah. His opposition to Jesus of Nazareth was due to the fact that he did not know him to be the Christ of God. When on the Damascus highway he was stricken down, light regarding the character of Christ illumined his soul. He then realized that the Nazarene was the Messiah, and he cried out, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" He then understood the true relation between Judaism and Christianity; he then saw that Judaism was the root and the trunk of the tree of which Christianity is the flower and the fruit; he then saw that Judaism was the gray dawn of the morning and that Christianity is the full splendor of the noonday sun. Ever after, he loved to compare the two dispensations that he might see the superior glory of Christianity.

Reflected Glory.

In the connection in which the text stands we are carried back to the time when Israel was gathered on the plain at the foot of Mount Sinai. Moses had gone to hold converse with God. The days slowly pass. Moses now returns, and the lingering traces of the glory of the Lord are still seen in his shining face. His appearance inspired terror rather than joy; and Moses vailed his face for the sake of the people. The apostle Paul finds deep significance in this act on the part of Moses. The vailing was not merely because of the dazzling splendor which made it difficult to behold him. The apostle sees that the vailed face was symbolic of important spiritual truths; he sees in that act a picture of the old dispensation. It was only a partial revelation; it expressed itself through a vail, revealed itself in typical rites and in obscure prophecies. But Christianity comes to us with the light on its face and with the vail entirely removed. Doubtless there was divine wisdom in the partial concealment of spiritual truths in the old dispensation. The ultimate design of these Mosaic institutions the people could not in the early day fully understand. For a time the brightness was mercifully concealed; the fulness of time had not yet come. God as a wise teacher taught the people as they were able to understand. They were slow pupils. The end shadowed forth by these types was Jesus Christ. Over the glory of Christ the vail had for a time to be thrown as over the face of Moses.

The apostle sees that to the Jews, Christ's glory is still prefigured, is still vailed. Their self-imposed unbelief Vailed their Hearts.

Christ's life and character they would see to be the reconciliation of all apparently contradictory prophecies, did they but take the vail from their faces. Their minds were obscured by prejudice and unbelief.

If with unclouded face they could look upon Christ they would see him as a mighty prince, a glorious conqueror, and a peerless king, but yet as the child of the manger, the man of sorrows, and the offering on the Cross; they would see that he fulfilled even the apparently contradictory prophecies of the Old Testament. All these prophecies become sublime and divine harmonies in Jesus of Nazareth. When the heart turns to him the vail is taken [illegible] whole line of Old Testament history. The cross is the key to God's thought in prophecy [illegible] eternity. The apostle shows us here that the spirit of the Lord is the spirit of love, liberty, [illegible] ing, it dispels the mists of doubt, difficulty, [illegible] thought and feeling clear and crisp as a winter morning. Judaism and Christianity are then seen to be parts of one whole. Judaism disappears in the brighter light of Christianity, as the stars of the morning are obscured by the splendor of the risen sun.

We see here, in the first place, who are the subjects of this glorious metamorphosis; they are those who with open face behold in a glass the glory of the Lord. It is the duty and privilege of all Christians to behold that glory. Christians of Christ with unvailed face. That glory shines resplendently in the Gospels. In the life and history of Christ, the beauty of the Lord our God is unvailed. Christ is the brightness of the Father's glory and the express image of his person. Walking with Jesus in the Gospel story, he causes our hearts to burn within us, and then he reveals himself to our wondering eyes as he did to the two disciples on the way to Emmaus. There is some difference of opinion regarding the exact meaning of the phrase, "beholding as in a glass." MacKnight, as quoted by Barnes, renders it, "we all reflecting as mirrors the glory of the Lord." Doddridge gives it, "beholding as by a glass;" and Locke, "with open countenances of mirrors, reflecting the glory of the Lord." The Greek word used in this connection is used nowhere else in the New Testament, hence the variety of opinions in rendering it. We know that the mirrors of the ancients were of burnished metal, and they often threw their own splendor on the face of the person who looked upon them. The thought here is that of the Gospel, like burnished metal, receiving and reflecting the glory of the Lord. Christians looking into the Gospel behold as in a mirror the glory of Christ, and this glory which shone upon the face of Paul shines also upon their own faces. There is no vail on this glory, nothing whatever to diminish its brilliancy, or to lessen its beauty as it is reflected in the faces of beholders. The perfections of God thus shine out of the Gospel as mirrors, and are then thrown upon the faces of true believers, transforming them to some degree into the divine image. This is an unspeakably sweet and precious thought; it sets forth the truth that in the face of Christians may be seen

Can now Look on the Glory

Reflection of the Infinite Glory of God. In the Lord incarnate the majesty and holiness of God was revealed; in Jesus of Nazareth, God's attributes of mercy, justice and goodness are displayed. He that hath seen the Son hath seen the Father. If we put ourselves before this mirror our own faces shall not be long in darkness. For a time, indeed, Christ may travel with us incognito along life's highway; but soon he will make himself known to us, and then our hearts shall burn within us. The light of Christ in the Gospel is bright, but not dazzling; it is warm, but not scorching. The incarnation of Christ enables us to look without blindness and even without weariness upon his person. We could not gaze upon the unclouded glories of the Son of God. He dwelt in light to which no man could approach; in his presence even the angels veiled their faces. His incarnation for a time drew a cloud across the face of the sun; he laid aside a portion of his glory in consenting to become the child of the manger. This temporary concealment of his glory was a part of his voluntary humiliation. His human body was, so to speak, a mirror in which we might gaze upon all of his divine splendor which human eyes may be permitted to see. In the Palazzo Rospigliosi in Rome, amid many remarkable frescoes and other treasures of art, there is in the principal hall a famous ceiling by Guido Reni—Aurora strewing flowers before the chariot of the god of the sun. The coloring is worthy of special notice both because of its brilliancy and harmony. The strongest light is thrown upon the figure of Apollo who appears with hair and body of golden hue. The nymphs nearest to him are of corresponding tint in their yellowish robes, while the dun-colored horses harmonize with the clouds in the background. All critic agree that this is the artist's finest work of its kind. But the neck and eyes of the beholder grow utterly weary in the effort to study this picture on the ceiling. A happy thought suggested itself to those in charge; opposite the entrance they have placed a mirror in which the painting appears in all its details of figure, color and movement. In this mirror, as one sits by it and looks down upon it, the painting may be carefully studied with care and without weariness. Such a mirror was the humanity of Jesus Christ. In marvelous condescension he became a babe honoring the cradle, a boy glorifying manhood, and a man exalting manhood to the divine standard; and now we may gaze with mingled love and admiration upon the linaments of divinity softened as they are seen in The Mirror of Humanity.

Oh, come into that mellowed light today. Sit with Mary now at the feet of Jesus, and you shall learn of him. Make him the object of your prolonged and loving contemplation; and the glory of the King in his beauty shall assuredly shine in your face.

We now notice, in the second place, the metamorphosis itself. We see clearly from this text the great change which results in the case of those who constantly, trustfully and lovingly gaze on Christ; for we are told that we "are changed into the same image." Just as the reflection from the burnished metal was cast on the face of all who beheld, so the glory of the Lord as first seen in the Gospel is reflected from our faces, if we contemplate that glory as there revealed This is a figure of great beauty and inspiration. If we place ourselves within the light of the Gospel, if we steadily contemplate this glory, we ourselves become changed into the likeness of that glory and become conformed to the character of Christ himself. We know that it is a law of our being that we become assimilated to the persons with whom we constantly associate, whom we daily contemplate, and greatly admire. Insensibly our thoughts, words and acts become like theirs; unconsciously their opinions become ours, their manners ours, and their conversation, even to its tones, becomes ours. Books, pictures, sculptures exercise similar influence upon our lives. This law should make us extremely careful concerning the persons with whom we associate, and the mental and moral atmosphere which we breathe. By living a worldly life we may throw a shadow over but by living with Christ we gain his image, we have his thoughts, we live over again his life. There may thus be a progressive conformity to the likeness of Christ during our earthly life. This is the wonderful, the glorious, the divine metamorphosis of which the apostle here speaks. As we gaze steadily upon Christ our own characters reproduce his image. Love makes us like those we love. Reverence for Christ transforms our nature into the divine likeness. It is not, however, the occasional look upon Jesus, but the steady gaze of love and trust that by silent sympathy reproduces in us something of his divine beauty.

The Brightness of our Piety;

The thought of metamorphosis is in harmony with the ideas of many heathen poets and philosophers. They imagined a metamorphosis of men into gods, and of gods into men, and of men even into animals. The ancient heathen poets sung in their loftiest strains of such transformations. The story of Daphne, who when wooed and pursued by Apollo, prayed to her mother, the earth, which opened and received her, and she soon again appeared changed into a laurel tree sacred to Apollo and to all poets and heroes, is in harmony with this conception. So is the fable of Juno, the queen of heaven when changed into a bear, and of Diana transforming Actaeon into a stag to be hunted by his own hounds; and many other similar fables are in harmony with the same conception. In heathen temples in China are still seen plaster representations of the transmigration of souls. Such human fancies are of higher truths. Man's creation itself suggests a recreation or transformation. He stands on creation's pedestal as made in the divine image. The actual facts of daily experience prove the reality of this metamorphosis. Men are by the alchemy of God's grace literally transformed in our day. They are not simply translated from the kingdom of darkness into the kingdom of God's dear Son, but they are literally transformed in character. Along the whole line of the Christian church we see evidences of the transforming power of God's grace in rescuing great sinners and in making them great saints. All about us are living witnesses of God's transforming power manifested in this way. Miracles, more wonderful than any performed by Christ during his earthly life, are performed by him to-day in the moral lives of men. There are about us now, men whose faces shine like that of Moses, because they are living with Christ and thus gaining his image. There are men and women now who dwell on the mount of transfiguration, and whose faces glow with heavenly splendors. It is said that one grain of iodine will give color to seven thousand times its own weight of water. It is certain that the grace of God received into the heart will give shape, color, power and glory to the lives of all who receive the heavenly gift. Oh, blessed light and heat which come to us from contemplating Christ! It is the heat which melts the cold heart; and it is light which illumines the face with the glory of the Lord.

The text also teaches us, in the last place, that this metamorphosis is progressive—we "are changed into the same image, from glory to glory even as by the spirit of the Lord." We make progress from one degree of glory to another. The more steadily we gaze on the glory of the Lord the more do we reflect its brightness and beauty; the more profoundly we contemplate the truths of our holy religion the more completely do we represent these truths before our fellow men. Christians may live in increasing light and in Growing Love.

They go "from strength to strength," they advance from one degree of holiness to another; they go from one experience of blessing to a higher until they enjoy the beatific vision of God in his immediate presence. Now they see the king in his beauty in the land that is afar off; but one day they shall be in that land, and shall cast their crowns at the king's feet; one day they shall see Jesus as he is, and be made entirely like him. This metamorphosis is carried forward by the spirit of the Lord. His influence changes the heart and remodels the life. Only as we are led by the spirit of God can we know that we are the children of God. We must submit fully to his leadership and thus shall we partake completely of the character of the sons of God. We must associate on the most intimate terms with Jesus Christ if the reflection of his face is to be seen in ours. We are told that the nearer the moon comes in conjunction with the sun the brighter is her light towards the heavens and the earth. It is certain that the nearer we come to Jesus Christ, the Sun of righteousness, the more shall his light shine upon our faces and the more shall we shine in that light among men. We must not permit the world to come between us and our glorious sun. If the photographer did not take off the curtain from his instrument no image could be produced though one sit long before it. We must live in the presence of Christ with no veil of worldliness between his face and ours if we are to gain his image; then men shall take knowledge of us that we have been with him.

An Inner Change.

The glory we behold when gazing upon Christ sinks into our souls, changes our inner being, and then, as a natural consequence, our outer life. Gazing downward we lose hold of all that is noblest and divinest in human life. We may thus sink deeper and deeper until all the angelic in us becomes Satanic. The title of this sermon is suggested by the Greek word used by the Apostle and translated by us, changed or transformed. Many kinds of metamorphoses are spoken of by scientific and other writers. There is that metamorphosis which results from development, as in zoology. Entomology illustrating the changes in human, animal and insect life. The same is true in botanical life. The term also is employed by Liebig and others as descriptive of various forms of chemical action. The poets have caught the same thought and use this term to express various poetic conceptions of miraculous transmutations of persons, animals or things. Browning in the "Ring and Book" asks,

> Where is the gloriously decisive change,
> The immeasurable metamorphosis
> Of human clay to divine gold?

But the most wonderful, the truly miraculous, the gloriously divine metamorphosis is that by which a sinner becomes a saint, a child of Satan, a child of God, an heir of perdition, a joint heir with Christ to immortal glory. The wonders of grace surpass those of nature. God in re-creation gives us grander displays of wisdom, power and glory, than in creation in its highest development. The glory attained by the child of God now is but the promise of that fuller blessedness which shall one day be his. Finely has it been said that in the presence of Christ we have not the twilight of evening but of morning, and however bright the light may now be, we know that the curtain shall one day lift higher and higher and beyond we shall have glory on glory.

MARTYRED IN CHINA.

Dr. Griffith John Sends the Details of the Attack on the Swedish Missionaries Wehhalm and Johanssen at Sung Pu.

THE cable message, announcing the murder by a mob of the two brave young Swedes, has now been supplemented by a letter from Dr. Griffith John, the famous missionary whose portrait we published a short time ago. It appears from his account of the trouble that last April Wehhalm and Johanssen settled at Sing-pu, which is about fifty-three miles from Dr. John's station at Hankow. Though the people generally were pleased to have the missionaries dwell there, a few of the baser sort seemed bent on driving them out if possible. These men had recourse in the first instance to the method of issuing anonymous placards, charging the foreigners with inhuman practices. The attention of the district magistrate was called to these placards, and the offenders were fined. The man whose house the missionaries occupied was, however, apprehended and severely punished. Certain charges were trumped up against him, and ostensibly he was punished on account of these. But every one knew that he was guiltless of the crimes laid to his charge, and that the real cause of his arrest and imprisonment was his letting his house to foreigners.

For more than a month after this matters went on quietly with the missionaries. The landlord was released, and the enemy was silent. The Great Festival was held in the Sung-pu region. On the first day of the festival everything passed off quietly. The second and third days passed off in a like manner. On the fourth day, however, everything changed like magic. Early in the morning, before the dawn of day, the multitude began to gather in front of the house. Before 10 o'clock there were from ten to twenty thousand people in the streets, ready for action. The little official of the place made his appearance, and tried to assuage the tumult. But he was powerless, and had to beat a hasty retreat. Then the mob began to attack the house occupied by the missionaries. They began by throwing stones and brickbats on the roof; but ere long they made a rush at the door, burst it open, and took possession. What they could steal they stole, and the rest they smashed to pieces. The missionaries and their native helpers made their way into the landlord's house, through a private door in the common partition wall. Thither the mob followed.

The missionaries made their way into the next house, hiding themselves in the garret, while the native helpers concealed themselves in a small room below. The mob soon discovered the hiding place of the missionaries and began to tear the boards, with the hope of bringing them to the ground. The missionaries then made their way through the roof, hoping to find there some way of escape. No sooner, however, were they seen on the roof than the mob began to pelt them from below with stones and brickbats. Four men, famous pugilists of the place, rushed up the roof with iron rods and knives in their hands. The missionaries ran along the roofs of the houses, followed by these demons, until they reached the end of the last house. There was nothing left for them to do but to leap. They did so, and in a moment the mob was upon them. Some were armed with stones, some with sticks, some with iron-spiked carrying-poles, and some with other instruments of torture. Within a few minutes these two brave young fellows were dead men, their heads crushed, and their bodies fearfully mangled. Their remains were left for several days uncovered in the open street.

A DECISION AT THE TURNING.

An evangelist relates the following incident: "A young man who was anxious about his soul was on a walking tour. Before leaving his home his heart had been troubled, and in order to get rid of his anxiety he had gone off on a holiday. He was making his way from one town to another, and enquired his way from a peasant. How far was it to C——? Oh, about five miles. How should he go? Straight on till he came to the cross roads, then turn to the right. On he walked, thinking little of his directions until he came to where four roads met, then he remembered. 'Turn to the right.' All at once it struck him. 'How appropriate to my spiritual needs. I am at a cross road. I feel I must choose either Christ or the world. Shall I not turn to the right? I know it is what I should do.' At once, instantly, like a flash of lightning, the decision was made; the young man turned to the right, to Jesus, to life, and has kept on the right road ever since."

CONTENT.

(Philippians 4: 11.)

HOW sweet to hear the word "content!"
Was sweeter message ever sent
To cheer the little lowly home
Whence parents feared the child would roam?
Here luxuries were seldom found
But love did everywhere abound.

When the dear old folks are left alone:
When all the little "birds" have flown,
But one returns to seek the nest,
Finding the world too harsh at best.
And this one at their side hath bent,
And softly whispers, "I'm content."

Contentment, ah! how much you mean!
You are the mighty power unseen,
Which wearied hearts has ever soothed
And many a wrinkled brow hath smoothed.
You make a hut a palace grand
Where e'en a king might long to stand.

'Tis not enough our lot to bear,
And to endure our load of care.
it is the peace world cannot give,
Oh! may it with us ever live.
And may we learn, what e'er is sent Therewith, like Paul, to be content.

SLIPPING AWAY.

THEY are slipping away, these sweet, swift years,
Like a leaf on the current cast;
With never a break in the rapid flow,
We watch them, as one by one they go
Into the beautiful past.

One after another we see them pass
Down the dim lighted stair;
We hear the sound of their heavy tread
In the steps of the centuries long since dead,
As beautiful and fair.

There are only a few years left to love;
Shall we waste them in idle strife?
Shall we trample under our ruthless feet
These beautiful blossoms, rare and sweet,
By the dusky way of life?

There are only a few swift years—ah! let
No envious taunts be heard;
Make life's fair pattern of rare design,
And fill up the measure with love's sweet wine,
But never an angry word.

THE SEALED ROLL.

The Significance and Import of the Document of which Christ takes Possession

BY REV. JOHN STORIE.

IMMEDIATELY after the raising and rapture of the saints the movements commence that are to make way in the world and its nations for the reign of the Son of Man. And, first, there is seen by John (Rev. 5: 1), on the right hand of him that sat on the throne—the Almighty, the Eternal—a Book or Roll of seven leaves, and sealed with seven seals. It lay there, not grasped nor held back, but ready, waiting for the one who is able to claim its possession, and to take it. It is not words, predictions, revelations, that are engrossed in that Book, but acts and deeds, dooms and destinies. It is known by all assembled within that Upper Court to be that legal deed which contains the final issues and decisions of Jehovah in respect to this world; that deed which is to convey the title, authority, and possession of it to him who is able to claim all this by a Redeemer's right; and who can dare to break with unshrinking hand the seals that have so long restrained his conclusive action?

Amid the silence of heaven, while every eye is drawn to that Dread Roll, the voice of a mighty angel is heard to proclaim: "Who is there that is worthy to open this Book?" and none rose to the challenge. "No one in heaven, nor earth, nor under the earth had the power to open that roll, nor to look into what was written therein." But, as John wept in distress that this roll should remain unclaimed and unopened, one from among the Elders said to him, "Weep not; behold the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the root of David he overcame" in that mighty contest in which a world had been lost and more than a world regained. "He has the power and the right," as Redeemer and Conqueror, to take that roll from the hand of the Almighty; to open and to break its seven seals. Then, as John looked, "there stood in the midst of the throne and of the living ones; and in the midst of the elders," that glorious Redeemer, not in form of a lion, but of a lamb; a lamb bearing the marks of death and sacrifice; but alive, risen, in calm majesty; having on his head the emblems of irresistible power, and endowed with the fulness of that Divine Spirit who had been sent forth into all the earth to convince and convict of sin, of righteousness, and of coming judgment.

"He came and took the roll from the hand of him that sits on the throne." He takes it only now; and this explains why he is here in the heavens; why waiting here; and why delaying his Epiphany. The act of his was the lifting from the Father's hand of the title deed. "He said therefore to them, A certain nobleman went into a far country, to receive for himself a kingdom and to come back." (Luke 19: 12.) That Book vests in him, but only now, the right and power to take legal possession and all that was lost in Adam, and to remove from this world forever all that the Devil and transgression have done to degrade its perfection and darken its primal glory. That act of his calls forth the homage and praises of the redeemed, and sends a thrill through the heart of the universe. The living ones and the elders fall down before him and sing that "New Song"—never sung till now—for which they have so longed and waited: "Thou art worthy to take the Book and to open the seals thereof;" and why? for thou hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every tribe and nation, and hast made us kings and priests to God."

With their homage, they present in golden bowls of incense, "the prayers of the saints," —prayers that have ascended in long succession from living witnesses and dying martyrs:— "Thy kingdom come; Thy will be done on earth as in heaven." Not one of those prayers lost! For the time to fulfil them is come; the time to cast out the powers of darkness that have so long enslaved the world; the time to restore it to fertility and peace; the time to establish on it the throne and rule of righteousness; "and Lord! we shall reign on earth with thee." Then follows the mighty anthem of praise—angels and living ones and elders uniting in the grand song to him that sitteth on the throne, "the blessing, the honor, the glory and the dominion, for ever and ever;" as though sin and rebellion were now to be subdued, not only on this earth, but through God's wide universe.

Where, in all the Revelations of Eternity, is there such another scene; a majestic movement, a crisis, and a preparation like this? The conclusion is inevitable. There must be in all that follows a divine significance commensurate with commencing solemnities so awful and so sublime.

HOW GOD HELPS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing September 24. I. Peter 3 :15, 16; Psalms 94: 17-19.

THE kind of help a man gets in an emergency often has a lasting influence on his future. It may be transient help which merely delivers him for the moment, leaving him exposed to a recurrence of his difficulty; or it may be help that places him under an obligation that will ever afterward be irksome to him; or it may be help that maims and cripples him by dishonor. Or, on the other hand, it may be help that is permanent, placing him beyond the reach of similar trials, or by wise counsel teaching him to help himself. How has God helped us? We may learn, by recalling the nature of the emergencies in which we have needed his help. When trial of any kind comes upon us, the most important thing is not so much that we should be relieved of it, as that we come out of it in the right way. In Bunyan's matchless allegory, Christian and Pliable both fall into the Slough of Despond, and both get out of it, but with this difference, that Christian gets out on the side nearest to the heavenly city, while Pliable gets out on the side nearest to his old home. So out of every trial the sufferer emerges either beaten and discomfited, or farther in advance toward his goal. The best help we can get, therefore, is help onward. When temptation comes and the assailed man needs help to withstand it, if he looks to God for it, that is the kind of help he will get. He is enabled to triumph over it and to come from the conflict strengthened by victory. If he needs help in sickness, or poverty, or bereavement and has recourse to God, he comes forth purified and ennobled by experience. It is not that the burden has been merely lifted from his shoulders; he has gained strength to bear other burdens, or to help some other burdened soul. He has been helped in himself. In spiritual difficulties at the outset of the Christian life the help is of the same kind. The man is surrounded with evil influences, and knows that he will inevitably yield to them. It is useless to resist; one day or another he will fail. He knows their strength and his own weakness and has no hope of victory. But if he look to God for help, he obtains a new heart, the Holy Spirit lives in him and he has divine strength to resist the evil. That is how God helps. Every conflict, every difficulty becomes not an evil but a stepping-stone to a higher plane. Every Christian knows by his own experience that it is so. His duty and joyful privilege, therefore, is to point others to the same source of help, with the testimony of how God has helped him.

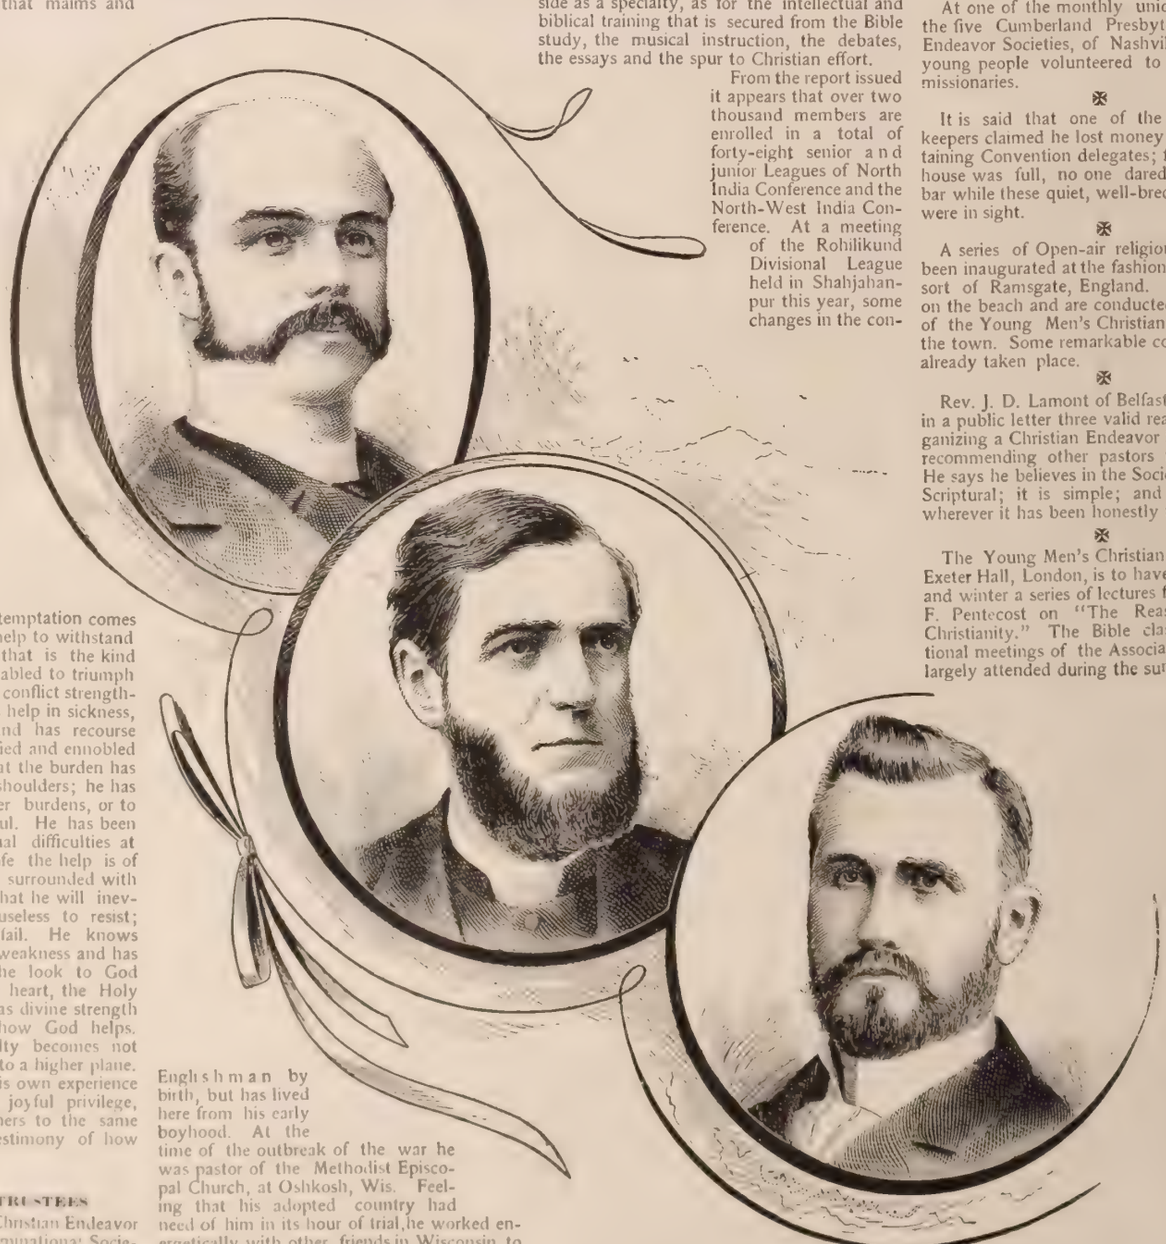
THREE Y. P. S. C. E. TRUSTEES.

In the effort to make the Christian Endeavor Society the really inter-denominational Society it was designed to be, provision has been made for having every denomination that is engaged in the work represented on its Board of Trustees. Three eminent members of the Board, representing respectively the Methodist, Reformed Episcopal, and the United Brethren churches are those whose portraits appear on [illegible] Dr. [illegible] Methodist Church. He is professor of Chemistry and [illegible] of the four Universities of the Maritime Provinces. He is the son of a Methodist minister and was born at Canton, Ont. He joined the church at the age of eleven years, and has been an enthusiastic Methodist ever since. He has given evidence of his earnestness and vigor by doing five years hard missionary work in Manitoba. Subsequently, he served as pastor of St. Claren's Avenue Church, in Toronto, where he formed a strong Christian Endeavor Society. After a very successful pastorate of three years he resigned to accept his present office.

The second in the group is the Right Rev. Samuel. Fallows, D.D., the presiding bishop of the Reformed Episcopal Church. He is an Englishman by birth, but has lived here from his early boyhood. At the time of the outbreak of the war he was pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church, at Oshkosh, Wis. Feeling that his adopted country had need of him in its hour of trial, he worked energetically with other friends in Wisconsin to organize the Fortieth Regiment of Wisconsin Infantry of which he was made Lieutenant-Colonel. He continued in active service till the close of the war and quitted the army with the brevet rank of Brigadier-General Returning to civil life he served several churches, and for some time was President of the Wesleyan University at Bloomington, Ill. He subsequently quitted the Methodist Church and became rector of the Reformed Episcopal Church of St. Paul, at Chicago. In 1876 Dr. Fallows was elected bishop, and on three occasions since that time he has been honored by being elected presiding bishop.



THREE TRUSTEES OF THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR.

The third of the group of portraits is that of Dr. Richard L. Swain of the University of Otterbein, Ind. His father was a Roman Catholic but became converted and was a successful preacher among the Wesleyans in England. Dr. Swain was born in Iowa and for some years roughed it in that State as farm-boy and miner. He joined the United Brethren and at seventeen years of age was well known in his neighborhood as an effective preacher. He was remarkable for his singularly beautiful voice and with this and a good knowledge of music which he acquired in the intervals of labor, as his capital, he entered himself as a student in Western College. Subtequently he went to Union Biblical Seminary at Dayton, O., after which he took a course at Yale. During the entire ten years which his studies in those institutions occupied he supported himself by teaching music. He is now College pastor at Otterbein University and is doing most successful work.

THE EPWORTH LEAGUE IN INDIA.

The Epworth League is receiving general acceptance in all the Methodist Episcopal Churches of India. The demand, says the Indian Witness, is not so much for the devotional side as a specialty, as for the intellectual and biblical training that is secured from the Bible study, the musical instruction, the debates, the essays and the spur to Christian effort.

From the report issued it appears that over two thousand members are enrolled in a total of forty-eight senior and junior Leagues of North India Conference and the North-West India Conference. At a meeting of the Rohilikund Divisional League held in Shahjahanpur this year, some changes in the constitutions were made. The points of emendation are that membership shall consist of three classes, Active, Associated and Honorary members. The Active members must consist of converted persons who take the pledge.

The Active members alone have the power to vote and they elect all the officers. The pledge is found to be very good for the educated and advanced Christians but it is a little in advance of many of the village Christians who, under the old constitution have done good work and made commendable progress. For the time being, it has been decided to retain the constitution that has been adopted by the Central Board of Control and each local League inserts in its own by-laws its conditions of membership, the prayer meeting pledge, and any other items the local League may desire.

Most of the Leagues hold prayer meetings immediately preceding the Sunday afternoon service. In the newly formed village churches, the untrained Christians prepare very creditable programmes; one young man who has received only the elements of a vernacular training, prepared and delivered an excellent oration; his diction was good, his thought was clear and well defined, and his delivery showed a clear apprehension of the need in a speaker of effective enunciation and suitable gestures.

In all the native Leagues, Hindustani music is cultivated and native musical instruments are utilized; there is no question but that Hindustani music for the average native Christian or non-Christian is far more acceptable than European music. In each literary session, written questions on the Bible lesson are distributed to the members present, and they are expected to give the proper answers.

NOTES OF THE ORDERS.

At one of the monthly union meetings of the five Cumberland Presbyterian Christian Endeavor Societies, of Nashville, Tenn., four young people volunteered to go as foreign missionaries.

It is said that one of the Montreal hotel keepers claimed he lost money through entertaining Convention delegates; for, though his house was full, no one dared to go to the bar while these quiet, well-bred young people were in sight.

A series of Open-air religious services has been inaugurated at the fashionable seaside resort of Ramsgate, England. They are held on the beach and are conducted by members of the Young Men's Christian Association of the town. Some remarkable conversions have already taken place.

Rev. J. D. Lamont of Belfast, Ireland, gives in a public letter three valid reasons for his organizing a Christian Endeavor Society and for recommending other pastors to do likewise. He says he believes in the Society because it is Scriptural; it is simple; and has succeeded wherever it has been honestly tried.

The Young Men's Christian Association at Exeter Hall, London, is to have during the fall and winter a series of lectures from Dr. George F. Pentecost on "The Reasonableness of Christianity." The Bible classes and devotional meetings of the Association have been largely attended during the summer.

A Christian Endeavor Society has been organized among the soldiers at the Jefferson Barracks of St. Louis, Mo. For two years past no religious services has been held at the Barracks but that of the Society, and a service once a month under the auspices of the Women's Christian Temperance Union.

The Senior Christian Endeavor Society of the Flanders Street Baptist Church, Adelaide, South Australia, has eight committees: lookout, home mission, Indian mission, social, corresponding, Bible and prayer, gleaners, and calling. That in the Southwark Baptist Church has also a tract committee. That of the Broken Hill Society has a Dorcas Committee.

We shall be glad to receive from readers who are members of Christian Endeavor Societies, the King's Daughters, etc., reports of the progress of the work in their localities and of any new methods which have been found successful.

TRUST THE CHILDREN

TRUST the children! Never doubt them!
Build a wall of love about them.
After sowing seeds of duty,
Trust them for the flowers of beauty.

Trust the children! Let them treasure
Mother's faith in boundless measure;
Father's love in them confiding;
Then no secrets they'll be hiding.

Trust the children, just as He did,
Who for "such" once sweetly pleaded.
Trust and guide, but never doubt them;
Build a wall of love about them.
